The alleged representations were all material. The statement that the Trembleys were worth $150,000 was in the nature of an assurance that they were financially able to complete their purchase of the 264 acres of land, included in which was the Hillyard tract. Their failure to acquire title meant the certain destruction of Hillyard's title. The Hillyard tract constituted the security, if the Trembleys fulfilled their contract, for the payment to the plaintiffs of the amount unpaid on the Hillyard contract, and it is self-evident that the value of the security for an indebtedness is a material matter. A payment by Hillyard of $2,000 in cash long before it was due under his contract of purchase would not only indicate a thrifty debtor, but the fact of putting that sum of money into the property would act as an inducement for him to complete the purchase by paying the remainder of the purchase price.

The representation that the Trembleys were worth $150,000 may be dismissed from consideration on account of want of proof as to its falsity, but the proof of the other representations mentioned and their falsity is such as to show clearly that it was error to enter a judgment of nonsuit. "The misrepresentation of even a single material fact upon which the plaintiffs had a right to and did rely will suffice to support plaintiffs' cause of action." Harris v. Miller, supra.

[6] The trial court seems to have been of the opinion that because "there was a delay of about twenty days before any notice of rescission was given," the plaintiffs were guilty of laches. The evidence does not show that the defendants suffered any injury on account of this short delay, and it is clear that such delay was not unreasonable. French v. Freeman, supra; Powell v. Oak Ridge Orchards Co., supra; Dickey v. Dunn, supra; Stone v. McCarty, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

SMITH v. SMITH. (Civ. 3492.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 27, 1928.

Divorce §182—Court may order husband to pay wife's attorney fees and costs on appeal, though interlocutory decree required parties to pay own costs (Civ. Code, § 137).

Under Civ. Code, § 137, trial court after decree in divorce proceeding awarding wife alimony had jurisdiction to order payment of counsel fees and costs by husband to enable wife to properly present cause on appeal taken by husband, notwithstanding provision of interlocutory decree requiring each party to pay own counsel fees.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Elaine T. Smith against Sidney V. Smith, Jr. From an order requiring defendant to pay attorney's fees and costs to enable plaintiff to present cause on appeal, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 267 P. 709; 270 P. 463.

Henry & Bedeau, of Sacramento, and Alden Ames, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Charles A. Wetmore, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. On December 12, 1927, the trial court made and entered its order that the appellant pay to the respondent herein the sum of $500 as and for her attorney's fees and actual costs not to exceed $100—the order being made to enable the respondent to properly present her cause on an appeal taken to this court by the appellant herein from an order theretofore made awarding the plaintiff and respondent alimony in a divorce proceeding theretofore tried in the superior court of Yuba county between the parties hereto. The order awarding alimony, as herein stated, was made on the 21st day of October, 1927. The final decree in said cause was entered on the 24th day of October, 1927, in which was incorporated a provision requiring the payment of $175 per month for the support and maintenance of the respondent, the plaintiff in that action, until the further order of the court. The defendant and appellant herein having appealed therefrom, the court, upon application of the plaintiff and respondent herein, made and entered the order first above referred to.

The appellant's contention upon this appeal is that the superior court was without jurisdiction to make the order awarding the plaintiff suit money upon this appeal, because of the provisions of the interlocutory decree in the main case which required that each party pay his own counsel fees. It is then assumed that the interlocutory decree is res adjudicata upon the question of attorney's fees; that it establishes the law relating to this proceeding, and therefore that the trial court possessed no jurisdiction to make any provision awarding counsel fees and costs to the respondent upon this proceeding. In making this contention appellant overlooks the fact that the power of the court in this proceeding is not controlled by the terms of the interlocutory decree. The court had in view the making of an order which would enable the respondent to properly present her cause in opposition to the contentions of the defendant in his appeal from the order of the trial court made on the 21st day of October, 1927, requiring payment of alimony. The respondent's opposition to the defendant's appeal being made in good faith, the trial court, under the terms of section 137 of the Civil Code, had jurisdiction to make the order allowing the counsel fees and costs involved in this proceeding. Some questions are raised upon this appeal which were presented to this court in an action between the same parties, numbered 3469, and decided adversely by this court to the contentions of the appellant herein on September 18, 1928, in an action wherein the parties are the same as in this proceeding.

Precisely the same contention made in this case was ruled adversely to the appellant in the case of Whiting v. Whiting, 62 Cal. App. 157, 216 P. 92. In that case the interlocutory decree provided that the parties thereto should pay their own costs. Afterwards, upon an appeal, the court awarded the respondent a certain sum for attorney's fees and costs, and it was from this order that an appeal was taken and the contention made as is made here. We quote from the opinion:

"Defendant strenuously insists that the order appealed from cannot be sustained and enumerates the following grounds why the same should be set aside: First, the court, at the conclusion of the trial of the action, having entered its decree that each party pay its own costs, and denying plaintiff's application for attorney's fees and alimony, this decree was res adjudicata, and the court had no jurisdiction to grant a subsequent application for either alimony, costs, or attorneys' fees."

The further objection was made that the plaintiff had means of her own, which is not involved in this action. In a somewhat extended opinion the court reviewed the cases having to do with the allowance of suit money, and held that the contention of the appellant was untenable. The cases of Bacigalupi v. Bacigalupi, 72 Cal. App. 654, 238 P. 93, and Howell v. Howell, 104 Cal. 45, 37 P. 770, 43 Am. St. Rep. 70, related only to the power of the trial court to make an order allowing alimony under the provisions of section 139 of the Civil Code, and therefore have no bearing upon the issues tendered upon this appeal, as this appeal is governed solely by the power given to the trial court by section 137, Civil Code. That a trial court has power to award suit money to enable a wife to present her cause upon appeal, irrespective of whether any allowance therefor has been made in the interlocutory decree, is amply supported by the following authorities: Whiting v. Whiting, 62 Cal. App. 157, 216 P. 92; McCahan v. McCahan, 47 Cal. App. 173, 190 P. 458; Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 87, 118 P. 445. In this last case the power of the court under section 137, Civil Code, is fully considered and set forth. The recent decision of the Supreme Court in Lamborn v. Lamborn, 190

Cal. 794, 214 P. 862, supports the order of the trial court in this action. The case of McCaleb v. McCaleb, 177 Cal. 147, 169 P. 1023, contains nothing which in any manner limits or abridges the power of the trial court to award suit money under the provisions of section 137, Civil Code, as set forth in the cases herein cited.

As no contention is made that the amount allowed is excessive, it follows that the allowance made by the trial court should be approved, and the order is therefore affirmed.

Ex parte PERRY. (Cr. 1493.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 4, 1928.

1. Habeas corpus ☞31—Defense of former acquittal or conviction affords no ground for release on habeas corpus.

Defense of former acquittal or conviction in one trial is a matter of defense, to be relied on in a second trial, and does not go to jurisdiction, so as to afford ground for release on habeas corpus.

2. Criminal law ☞739(4)—Former jeopardy or former acquittal on charge of carrying concealed weapons, by reason of acquittal of charge of robbery on same date on ground of insanity, is for jury (St. 1923, c. 339, § 2).

Question of former jeopardy or former acquittal of crime of carrying a concealed weapon, in violation of St. 1923, c. 339, by reason of former acquittal of charge of robbery in violation of chapter 339, § 2, on the same date, by reason of insanity at precise time robbery was committed, presents a question for jury, in that evidence might show that weapon was carried at a different time from robbery, and when defendant was perfectly sane.

Original application by Robert Perry for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged.

Harry S. Whitthorne, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Matthew Brady, Dist. Atty., and August L. Fournier, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is a petition to this court in behalf of Robert Perry for his discharge on habeas corpus. The petition was filed by Harry S. Whitthorne. A hearing was had and the following facts appeared:

Robert Perry was charged with robbery, committed on the 3d day of March, 1928. On June 19, 1928, he was convicted by a jury in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco of robbery in the first degree. On June 21, 1928, the same jury found him insane at the precise time that he committed the robbery. Thereafter, and on the 13th day of July, 1928, said Robert Perry was charged by an indictment returned by the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco with a felony, to wit, a violation of section 2 of chapter 339, Statutes of 1923, the charging part of said indictment being as follows:

"Robert E. Perry is accused by the grand jury of the said city and county of San Francisco, state of California, by this indictment, of the crime of felony, to wit: Violating the provisions of chapter 339 of the Statutes of 1923, committed as follows: The said Robert E. Perry having been, before the 3d day of March, 1928, in the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, convicted of the crime of felony, to wit, grand larceny, and upon said conviction was delivered to the state penitentiary at San Quentin, California, for confinement on the 4th day of October, 1924, and he, the said Robert E. Perry, did thereafter, to wit, on or about the 3d day of March, 1928, in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, and feloniously possess and carry concealed upon his person a certain firearm, to wit, a loaded revolver, less than 12 inches in length, and then and there capable of being concealed upon the person.

A bench warrant was issued upon this indictment, and Perry was arrested, and in default of bail is now held in the county jail. On July 27, 1928, Perry was duly and regularly arraigned in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco under said indictment and entered five separate and distinct pleas, among them being the following:

"Second. The defendant pleads that he has already been acquitted of the offense charged by judgment of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, department No. 12 thereof, rendered at San Francisco, state of California, on the 21st day of June, 1928.

"Third. The defendant pleads that he has been once in jeopardy for the offense charged by judgment of acquittal in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, department No. 12 thereof, at San Francisco, state of California, on the 21st day of June, 1928.

"Fourth. The defendant pleads that he is not guilty of the offense charged, because he was insane at the time that he is alleged to have committed the unlawful act."

After the entry of these pleas, the trial court regularly set the case for trial, and the said Perry is now in the county jail awaiting trial.

The principal grounds upon which Perry bases his application for a release are that he has been "once in jeopardy" and that he has been acquitted of the same offense by reason of the fact that the jury found him insane at the precise time that he committed the robbery, and that, as he used the pistol in the commission of the robbery, he, therefore, cannot now be tried for the separate offense of having the pistol in his possession, or, in other words, it is claimed that the possession of the pistol is a necessary and inseparable part of the crime of robbery in the first degree, and that a finding by the jury that he was not guilty of the robbery by reason of insanity, necessarily includes therein the finding that he was also not guilty of having the pistol in his possession.

[1] The law is well settled that the defense of former acquittal or conviction in one trial is a matter of defense to be relied upon in the second trial; it does not go to the jurisdiction and affords no ground for release upon habeas corpus. In re Collins, 151 Cal. 340, 90 P. 827, 91 P. 397, 129 Am. St. Rep. 122; Ex parte Hartman, 44 Cal. 32. Therefore Perry, having entered his plea of "once in jeopardy" to the indictment for the possession of the pistol, merely puts in issue in that case the question as to whether or not he has been actually acquitted of that charge, and that is a matter to be determined first by the trial court. Petitioner is, in effect, asking this court to say, in advance of the trial in the superior court, that Robert Perry's pleas of "once in jeopardy" and "former acquittal," etc., are good. This we are not called upon to do in this proceeding. It is to be presumed that the trial court will rule correctly upon all defenses and pleas made by Perry in the case of People of the State of California v. Robert Perry, now pending in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. If not, the error can be corrected on appeal.

[2] Petitioner further contends that there is no dispute about the facts, and therefore the question of "former jeopardy" or "former acquittal" is one of law for the court to determine. We cannot agree with this contention. The case has not yet been tried, and no one is now able to say that there will be no dispute about the facts when the case is tried. The evidence may show that Perry had the pistol the day before the robbery or even ten minutes before the robbery, and at a time when he was perfectly sane. If such be the case, his pleas of "once in jeopardy" or "former acquittal" of the robbery charge would avail him nothing.

Other points raised by petitioner do not require discussion. The said Robert Perry is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and the writ is discharged.

PEOPLE v. JAMES et al. (Cr. 1712.)★

Rehearing Denied Oct. 24, 1928.

1. Witnesses $\S$ 380(5)—Witness failing only to give certain expected testimony favorable to prosecution could not be impeached.

Where state witness failed to give certain expected testimony favorable to prosecution, without having made unexpected adverse statements concerning facts connected with crime, there was no right of impeachment, since mere failure to testify favorably does not entitle party to show that witness has elsewhere made contrary statements concerning facts sought to be elicited.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 1170½(1)—Error in permitting deputy district attorney to attempt impeachment of state witness held harmless, in view of evidence establishing guilt.

Any error in permitting deputy district attorney to lay foundation for impeachment of state witness on ground of surprise held harmless, in view of uncontradicted, positive, direct testimony, establishing guilt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William T. Aggeler, Judge.

Roy James and another were convicted of robbery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

E. R. Simon, of Los Angeles, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. The defendants, James and Whitfield, were convicted on an information charging robbery as stated in count 2 of the information. Counts Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6 were dismissed during the trial on motion of the district attorney. Their codefendants Reynolds and Sampson were acquitted. From the judgments of conviction and the order denying their motion for a new trial this appeal is taken by defendants, James and Whitfield.

Count 2 of the information charged all four defendants with robbery of the cashier of the Toloma Creamery Company, in the city of Los Angeles, on March 31, 1928. The cashier and two of his assistants identified the two defendants, Whitfield and James, as being the two men who perpetrated the robbery. Another witness testified that she was present when all four of the defendants returned from the robbery and that she saw them divide the money.

Reversal of the order denying a new trial and reversal of the judgment is sought on account of certain questions asked by the district attorney, in which he attempted to cross-examine one of his own witnesses, Gerald Reynolds, who was the brother of defendant Leo Reynolds, who was found not guilty. Objection was made to the statements made by the deputy district attorney, as follows:

"If the court please, the people are taken by surprise with the testimony given by this witness and desire to cross-examine him for the purpose of laying a ground for impeachment.

"The Court: All right, you may do so.

"Mr. Shaw: Well, we object—

"Mr. Crail: What is that?

"Mr. Shaw: All right.

"The Court: You may proceed."

Thereupon, the deputy district attorney attempted apparently to lay a foundation for the introduction of evidence (by way of impeachment) that the witness, Gerald Reynolds, made statements to officers Chitwood and Luquet that he had a certain conversation with his brother after the robbery about the commission of the crime and that he had a conversation with Mr. Sampson concerning the holdup; and that he had conversed with the defendants as to money taken and about checks taken during the holdup. Also that the witness had told the officers about conversations he had with the defendants, prior to the robbery, concerning the commission of the crime, and as to the advisability of holding up the place.

[1, 2] The surprise expressed by the district attorney concerning the testimony given by the witness related only to the failure of the witness to give certain expected testimony favorable to the prosecution. It could not have arisen from unexpected adverse statements by the witness concerning facts connected with the crime, for no such statements had been made. Under such circumstances, no right of impeachment of the witness had arisen, and it was useless to attempt the laying of a foundation therefor. "The mere failure of a witness to testify favorably for the party calling him, unaccompanied by any testimony which would tend to the prejudice of the case of the party calling the witness, will not entitle such party to show that the witness has elsewhere made contrary statements concerning the facts sought to be elicited from him." People v. Sliscovich, 193 Cal. 544, 554, 226 P. 611, 615. If, however, any harm was done by the statement of the deputy district attorney as to his surprise, and if any error was committed in asking the questions asked, we cannot see that it would be reversible error, or that it did cause any serious harm to the defendants. The defendants were convicted upon positive, direct testimony, which was wholly uncontradicted.

The instructions of the court relative to the case, which were given to the jury, were sufficient to cure any such impression if the district attorney's remarks could have been considered to have caused any such impression as feared by the appellants' attorney.

As we have said before, the evidence introduced clearly shows, without contradiction, the guilt of the appealing defendants, and therefore no miscarriage of justice could possibly have resulted from the remarks of the district attorney complained of.

The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

(Civ. 6253.)

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. Oct. 2, 1928.

1. Judgment ¶780(1)—Lien does not attach to naked title, but only to judgment debtor's interest in real estate.

Lien of judgment does not attach to naked title, but only to judgment debtor's interest in real estate, and if he has no interest, though possessing naked title, no lien attaches, and court of equity will permit real owner to show that apparent ownership of another is not real.

2. Attachment ¶178—Attaching creditor obtains lien only on title or interest debtor has at time of levy (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542, 688).

Creditor, attaching property for debt under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542, 688, obtains lien only on title or interest which debtor has in property at time of levy, and if, at that time, all title and interest has passed to third person, creditor gets nothing by levy.

3. Records ¶6—Neither attachment nor judgment is "instrument," within statute protecting purchaser or incumbrancer acquiring title or lien by instrument first recorded (Civ. Code, § 1107).

Neither an attachment nor a judgment is an "instrument," within meaning of Civ. Code, § 1107, protecting purchaser or incumbrancer who in good faith and for valuable consideration acquires title or lien by instrument first duly recorded.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Instrument.]

4. Judgment ¶780(1)—Where vendor had been paid in full for his interest before creditor attached property and obtained judgment against him, judgment lien did not attach to land (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542, 688).

Where defendants attached property and acquired judgment against vendor after plaintiffs had contracted to purchase land, and had paid vendor in full for all his interest in property, and parties had agreed that balance should be paid directly to mortgagee, vendor had no interest subject to attachment, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542, 688, or to judgment lien, and lien did not attach to land.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Hagop Iknoian and another against Karl Winter and others.

TYLER, P. J. Action to quiet title. On July 9, 1919, defendants Karl Winter and Mary, his wife, were the owners of certain lots in Sanger Colony, in the county of Fresno. The property was subject to a purchase-price mortgage in favor of Mary M. Barbour for $7,800. On the date last mentioned Winter and his wife entered into a contract with the plaintiffs for the sale to them of the property for the sum of $10,000, the terms being $1,000 cash; $1,000 and interest on or before November 1, 1920, $1,000 and interest on or before November 1, 1921, and a like sum and interest on or before November 1, 1922; $5,000 and interest on or before November 1, 1923, and the balance of $1,000 and interest on or before November 1, 1924. The parties agreed that the purchasers might make any of the payments agreed to be made, upon and towards the payment of said mortgage, and when so paid the amount would be credited upon the purchase price.

The evidence shows that plaintiffs paid Winter the sum of $4,000 in conformity with the terms of the contract, and at the time the last payment of $1,000 was made Winter only had coming to him the sum of $200 on the principal over and above the existing mortgage; that he received this $1,000 from plaintiffs, and paid $800 of the same on the mortgage, and informed plaintiffs that all future payments were to be made to the mortgagee or her representative, as he had been fully paid for whatever interest he held in the property. Plaintiffs then asked for a deed. Winter informed them he was busy at that time, but would execute one later. The deed was finally executed March 28, 1925. The evidence further shows that all subsequent payments were made by plaintiffs to the mortgagee in conformity with the agreement of the parties. At or about the time Winter received his last payment he was in financial difficulties. On the 10th day of January, 1923, appellant G. H. Salwasser in an action brought against Winter attached the land in question. Salwasser obtained judgment against Winter in the sum of $2,690, and thereafter he assigned an undivided one-half interest in such judgment to Philip Conley, and an undivided one-half interest to J. W. Meux, appellants herein.

The present action to quiet title to the land was brought by plaintiffs against Winter, his wife, the Commercial Bank of Sanger, which had a separate claim, G. H. Salwasser, Philip Conley, and J. W. Meux. The sole question here presented is whether or not the judgment lien acquired by appellants in the manner indicated affects the property in question.

[1-4] It is appellants' contention that at the time of the attachment the legal title to the property was in Winter, notwithstanding his contract of sale with plaintiffs, and that therefore the judgment lien of Salwasser attached to the property, for which reason the judgment in the present action quieting the title of plaintiffs is erroneous. The contention is without merit. It is true that under our Codes any interest, legal or equitable, which a defendant has in lands, is subject to attachment. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542, 688; Fish v. Fowlie, 58 Cal. 373. Under this rule the interest of a mortgagor in lands contracted to be sold is bound by the lien of a judgment recovered against him while the contract is unexecuted, to the extent to which it is unexecuted. Godfrey v. Monroe, 101 Cal. 224, 35 P. 761. But there must be an interest to which the lien can attach. The law is well settled that the lien of a judgment does not attach to a naked title, but only to the judgment debtor's interest in the real estate; and if he has no interest, though possessing the naked title, then no lien attaches. Riverdale Min. Co. v. Wicks, 14 Cal. App. 526, 112 P. 896. Thus a creditor who attaches property for his debt obtains a lien only upon the title or interest which the debtor has in the property at the time of the levy, and if at that time all title and interest has passed from him to a third person, the creditor gets nothing by the levy. Nat. Bank of Pacific v. W. P. R. Co., 157 Cal. 573, 108 P. 676, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 987, 21 Ann. Cas. 1391. The interest which the lien of judgment affects is the actual interest which the debtor has in the property, and a court of equity will always permit the real owner to show that the apparent ownership of another is or was not real, and, when the judgment debtor has no other interest except the naked legal title, the lien of judgment does not attach. Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 357; Black on Judgments (2d Ed.) §§ 420, 421; Hays v. Reger, 102 Ind. 524, 1 N. E. 386.

Here, at the time the judgment was docketed against Winter, he had no interest in the land, as he had been fully paid the amount over and above the mortgage, and by agreement of the parties the amount of this mortgage was to be paid by plaintiffs directly to the mortgagee. The mere fact that Winter had failed to comply with his agreement to execute a deed until after the rendition and docketing of the judgment in no manner affects plaintiffs' rights. One who conveys property by an unrecorded deed conveys title which is good against the grantor and every one claiming under him, except a purchaser or incumbrancer, who in good faith and for a valuable consideration acquired a title or lien by "an instrument first duly recorded," who is protected under section 1107 of the Civil Code. But neither an attachment nor a judgment is "an instrument" within the meaning of that section; an unrecorded deed takes precedence over a subsequent attachment or judgment against the grantor. Hoag v. Howard, 55 Cal. 564; Wolfe v. Langford, 14 Cal. App. 359, 112 P. 203. Here, as above, plaintiff had paid his vendor in full for all of his interest in the property. Under such circumstances there remained no interest in the vendor that was subject to the attachment or the judgment lien in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

Where information charging defendant with violating Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended) further alleged that defendant had been convicted of three felonies, but prior to trial two of former convictions were stricken from information, verdict finding defendant guilty of violating act as charged and finding charge of previous conviction was true established only one previous conviction.

2. Criminal law § 1177—Where verdict established one prior conviction, defendant convicted of violating Poison Act was not injured by further proceedings renewing charges of other prior convictions which were not sustained (Pen. Code, § 969a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1064; State Poison Act).

Where two of three prior convictions were stricken before trial from information charging defendant with violating Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended), and verdict found defendant guilty of violating Poison Act and only single prior conviction, further proceedings under Pen. Code, § 969a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1064, under amended information renewing charges of former convictions previously stricken, one of which was again dismissed and the other found to be not true by jury, held not injurious to defendant even if objections thereto were sustainable.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. [1] By amended information filed on May 24, 1928, the defendant was charged with the crime of violating the state Poison Act (St. 1907, p. 124, as amended). It was further alleged that prior to the commission of said offense the defendant had been convicted of a felony in the county of Imperial, that he had been convicted of a felony in the county of Sacramento, and also that he had been convicted of a felony in the county of Maricopa in the state of Arizona. On the 11th day of June, immediately prior to the trial of the case, the charges of former conviction in Imperial county and in Arizona were stricken from the information. It follows that when the jury rendered its verdict finding the defendant guilty of violating the state Poison Act as charged and further found the charge of previous conviction "true as charged in the amended information," only one previous conviction was established.

On June 22, 1928, a second amended information was filed in which said charges of former conviction in Imperial county and in Arizona were renewed. At that time the defendant stood mute on the matter of said second amended information. Thereupon the court pronounced judgment and transferred the cause to another department for further proceedings. In that department at a later date a trial of the issues (as to these two former convictions theretofore undetermined) was had, in which the jury found the charge of prior conviction in Arizona to be not true. The jury being unable to agree upon said charge of prior conviction in Imperial county, the court dismissed said charge.

[2] As the record now stands, the defendant has had imposed upon him, only a judgment commensurate with a conviction of a violation of the state Poison Act and only the one prior conviction of robbery. The defendant therefore was not injured by reason of the further proceedings above noted, even of appellant's objections thereto were sustainable. It should be noted, however, that these additional proceedings, which affect the penalty only, are provided for by section 969a, Penal Code, as added by St. 1927, p. 1064.

There was a direct conflict in the evidence, and there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict of the jury as was announced by this court at the time of the oral argument herein. At that time the court held the case open only upon the question whether the superior court erred in ordering the second amended or supplemental information to be filed and a trial to be had of the issues as thereon presented.

The record clearly discloses a verdict with one prior conviction only, as heretofore stated in this opinion; therefore no harm could possibly have resulted to the defendant in so far as the judgment appealed from is affected. He may have had to stand trial uselessly as to the charge of second and third prior convictions, but the result of that second trial did not in any way affect the matter now before this court.

As was stated to counsel at the oral argument, we are of the opinion that there is nothing in the instruction which would be misleading to the jury.

The judgment and order denying motion for new trial are affirmed.

RIGGS v. GUEDEMANN et al. (Civ. 6289.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 1, 1928.

Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 607(1)—Filing notice of appeal constitutes waiver of notice of entry of judgment as respects filing notice requesting transcript (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Filing of notice of appeal amounts to waiver of notice of entry of judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, providing that notice requesting transcript must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of judgment, and, in absence of prior service of notice of entry of judgment, time allowed for filing notice requesting transcript begins at once on filing of notice of appeal, and second notice of appeal was unauthorized, in view of Rules of District Court of Appeal, rules 1 and 5.

Action by Fred L. Riggs against Ralph H. Guedemann and others. From an adverse judgment, defendants appeal. On plaintiff's motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Marshall A. Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Horace Wilson and Constan Jensen, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal of defendants from a judgment entered against them on the 23d of July, 1928. The motion is made on the ground that appellants have not filed in this court a transcript of the record, and that the time allowed therefor by law and the rules of court has expired.

Appellants filed their notice of appeal on July 31st, and a second notice of appeal on September 4th. There has been no motion for a new trial, and no proceedings for a bill of exceptions are pending. No application for reporter's transcript under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, was made until September

1st. The reporter's transcript was filed with the clerk of the superior court on September 17th and presented to the judge for approval. The judge refused to certify the transcript, and there is not now pending any proceeding relating thereto.

The second notice of appeal was unauthorized. Brown v. Plummer, 70 Cal. 337, 11 P. 631; Nathan v. Porter, 36 Cal. App. 356, 359, 172 P. 170. The 40 days allowed appellant for filing his transcript of record expired on September 9th. See rules I and V of this court. Counsel for appellant contends that his time to file notice requesting transcript has been extended, and in fact has not commenced to run, for the reason that, as shown by the clerk's certificate presented with this motion, notice of entry of the judgment has not been served upon appellants. This contention is without merit. It is true that section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the notice requesting transcript must be filed "within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment," etc., but the decisions are uniform that the filing of a notice of appeal amounts to a waiver of notice of entry of judgment, and that, in the absence of prior service of notice of entry of judgment, the time allowed for filing notice requesting transcript begins at once upon the filing of the notice of appeal. Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 P. 611; Brown v. Superior Court, 175 Cal. 141, 165 P. 429; Gross v. Hazeltine (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 925.

The appeals are dismissed.

AREGOOD v. TRAEGER, Sheriff.
(Civ. 6168.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 2, 1928.

Appeal and error § 345(1)—Notice of appeal from superior court, filed later than 30 days after entry of order determining motion for new trial, is too late (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 953a).

Code Civ. Proc. § 939, provides the only method of appeal from superior court, so that notice of appeal filed later than 30 days after entry of order determining motion for new trial, the time limited for appeal by such section, is too late, and appeal will be dismissed; section 953a not providing for a notice of appeal, but its purpose, in connection with following sections, being merely to provide a method of preparing record or transcript to be filed in appellate court in support of appeal, and intent to change such purpose, so as to include a method of taking an appeal, not being evidenced by the amendment of such section in 1915, or by the repeal in 1921 (St. 1921, p.

193) of sections 941a-941c, which had provided an alternative method of taking an appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action by F. S. Aregood against W. I. Traeger, Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Charles W. Cradick, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Youngworth, McClean & Hartman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground that the notice of appeal was not filed within the time required by section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Judgment was entered on August 13, 1926. Notice of intention to move and motion for a new trial were filed on October 1, 1926, and an order denying the motion was entered in the minutes on January 21, 1928. Notice of appeal was not filed until July 6, 1928. Prefacing the more general discussion and to avoid possible confusion, it should be added that no notice of entry of judgment appears to have been filed; hence under the opinion in Deacon v. Deacon, 201 Cal. 190, 255 P. 798, the power of the court to pass upon the motion for a new trial had not expired at the time of the entry of the order denying it on January 21, 1928. No notice of this latter ruling was served upon defendant. The appellant contends that, where a motion for a new trial is pending the time within which an appeal may be taken does not expire until "ten days after notice of decision denying said motion, or of other termination thereof." He bases this argument upon his assertion that section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure from which we have just quoted provides an alternative method of appeal and places great reliance upon a sentence found in Deacon v. Deacon, supra, as follows:

"The time within which the motion for new trial must be passed upon would not have expired within the sixty-day period provided by section 660 of the Code of Civil Procedure, since no notice of the entry of judgment had been given as provided in said section, and the notice of appeal herein would therefore have been in time, since the same was served and filed within the period after the determination thereof, provided in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure." (Italics ours.)

The question whether the notice of appeal was filed within time after the order dismissing the motion for a new trial was not involved in the Deacon Case, the notice of appeal having been filed on the same day the order was entered in the minutes. The point there involved was whether the power of the court to pass on the motion for a new trial had expired. It is obvious therefore that the portion of the sentence which we have italicized is dictum, and it is not at all clear that "953a" was not inadvertently used in place of "939." At least it cannot be said to be controlling. On the other hand, our courts have uniformly declared that sections 953a, 953b, and 953c, provide an alternative method of preparing a record on appeal. Magee v. Magee, 174 Cal. 276, 162 P. 1023; Schmitt v. White, 172 Cal. 554, 158 P. 216; Anderson v. Standard Lumber Co., 60 Cal. App. 445, 213 P. 65. In denying a hearing in the Supreme Court after decision by the District Court of Appeal in the case of Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 P. 1026, the higher court said:

"The District Court of Appeal, in its opinion, says that section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure 'provides that the appellant shall file his notice of appeal with the clerk.' This section has been misapprehended by some practitioners, and lest there be further misapprehension by reason of this language we take this occasion to correct it.

"Section 953a does not provide at all for a notice of appeal. The purpose of that section, in connection with sections 953b and 953c, is to provide a method of preparing the record or transcript to be filed in the proper appellate court in support of the appeal. None of the proceedings there prescribed are jurisdictional to the appeal."

This language is so clear and unambiguous that it would preclude further argument or observation were it not for the fact that appellant urges that when, in 1915, the Legislature inserted in the section the words, "or for the purpose of presenting a record on appeal from any appealable judgment or order, or for the purpose of having reviewed any matter or order reviewable on appeal from final judgment," it evinced an intent to change the purpose of the act so as to include a method of taking an appeal, which intent he says is further evidenced by the fact that the Legislature in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 193) repealed sections 941a, 941b, and 941c, which sections had provided an alternative method of taking an appeal. We do not interpret the legislative mind in this manner. In 1915 the right of an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial was abolished by other amendments to the Code of Civil Procedure and provision was made whereby the appellate courts might review any order on motion for a new trial upon an appeal from the judgment, a thing which was not theretofore possible. In order to accomplish this purpose procedurally, it was necessary for the courts to have the record subsequent to judgment and the Legislature added the words, "or for the purpose of having reviewed any matter or order reviewable on appeal from final judgment," and also provided that the notice prerequisite to the preparation of the transcript should not necessarily be given until after the motion for the new trial was disposed of. In support of this interpretation of the section reference may be had to Schmitt v. White, supra, and also to two late cases, wherein it is said that "it is no objection to the notice that it is a part of the same paper that directed the clerk to prepare a record as the dual purpose may be accomplished by one paper." Anderson v. Standard Lumber Co., supra, and Wright & Hogan, Inc., v. Heide, 72 Cal. App. 16, 236 P. 219. Our conclusion is that section 939 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides the only method of taking an appeal in this character of action, and that, inasmuch as that section limits the time to 30 days after entry of the order determining the motion for a new trial, this notice of appeal was filed too late.

Appeal dismissed.

Evidence held not to support finding that manager of oil-mining plant received payment in full for his services under contract for reimbursement entered into by trustee.

2. Trusts ⇨225—Trustee is personally liable for obligations incurred, in absence of express authorization in declaration of trust or otherwise.

While trustee acting within scope of his authority may bind trust property to same extent that agent can bind principal, trustee will nevertheless be deemed personally liable for obligations incurred, in absence of express authorization in declaration of trust or otherwise.

3. Trusts ⇨225—Trustee not authorized to charge trust estate held personally liable for materials furnished and services rendered by manager whom he employed (Civ. Code, § 2343).

Trustee, employing manager for oil-mining plant without express authority under declaration of trust to incur obligations to become a charge against the trust estate, held personally liable to manager for his purchase of materials and performance of labor, under Civ. Code, § 2343.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants in an action for labor performed and materials furnished. The complaint contained four separate counts. The first cause of action charged the defendants George M. Dormer, William J. Larkin, and his wife, Emma, as copartners doing business under the fictitious name of Emma Belle Mines Company, with being indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,750 for labor performed. The second count alleged an indebtedness of $497 against the same defendants, in the same capacity, for materials furnished. The third cause was against these same defendants, for the same amounts, as trustees of the Emma Belle Mines Company. The last count was against the same defendants, as individuals, for the same value of said services and materials furnished. The trial was in the nature of an accounting, nearly every item of which was contested. February 28, 1923, the defendants were organized as an express trust for the purpose of operating an oil-mining enterprise at Kelso, Cal. About the middle of May, 1923, the defendant William J. Larkin met and employed appellant to take charge of their plant as manager. The amount of his salary is in dispute. Appellant claims that he was promised $250 per month for his services, while Mr. Larkin asserts that he was hired at $5 per day. The appellant employed two workmen to assist him. The respondent William Larkin admitted that these men were to receive $4 and $5 per day, respectively, for their services, less $1 apiece per day for their board. It appears that appellant and these two helpers worked substantially seven months, from May 18th to December 18, 1923. Some machinery and materials were purchased by appellant and used in the operation of the enterprise, the value of which was disputed. The respondent William Larkin claimed to have paid appellant the sum of $1,457.57. This was conceded by appellant, who claimed that he had expended in behalf of his employer the total sum of $3,705.31, and that no part of his wages had been paid. At the rate of $250 per month appellant's wages amount to the sum of $1,750, while the admitted net wages of the workmen aggregated the additional sum of $1,470. The only evidence of the payment of appellant's claim consists of the testimony of William J. Larkin, as follows:

"Q. And in compliance with that agreement, did you make any payments to him for his services? A. Yes; I sent him always more than enough over the men's wages to pay him.

"Q. Over and above other men's wages? A. Yes.

"Q. Then you sent a lump sum every so often, and he was to pay himself and pay the men out of that? A. Yes; and sometimes a great deal more.

"Q. And he was allowed out of those remittances you made Mr. Duncan, for himself. A. Well, he paid himself."

But the admission as to the specific amount which was in fact paid, to wit, $1,457.57, clearly leaves a balance due to the appellant. In fact, the respondent William Larkin admitted that there was still due to appellant the sum of $200 or $300. Mr. Larkin testified:

"Q. Is there any money unpaid to him now, for his services? * * * A. Well, in the neighborhood of between $200 and $300."

The court found that the alleged copartnership did not exist, but that the defendants were duly organized as a trust under the name of the Emma Belle Mines Company; that the appellant was employed in May, 1923, by the respondent William J. Larkin at a salary of $35 per week for a period of 6½ months, but that he received payment in full for such services; that the appellant also purchased certain machinery and materials which were used in the operation of the mine, for which he was also paid in full; that said employment was contracted for solely by the respondent William J. Larkin, as an individual, who therefore became liable for such obligations; that the appellant then had no knowledge of the existence of said trust organization. There was neither evidence nor findings to the effect that the respondent William J. Larkin was authorized by the declaration of trust, or otherwise, to incur obligations to become a charge against the trust estate.

[1-3] The appellant contends that the findings are not supported by the evidence. It is apparent that this is true, and that the undisputed record shows that the appellant was not fully paid. While it is true that a trustee, acting within the scope of his authority, may bind the trust property to the same extent that the acts of an agent will bind his principal (Civ. Code, § 2267; Cullinan v. Mercantile Trust Co., 80 Cal. App. 377, 385, 252 P. 647), yet, in the absence of express authorization either in the declaration of trust, or otherwise, he will be deemed to be personally liable for obligations which he incurs (Hall v. Jameson, 151 Cal. 606, 611, 91 P. 518, 12 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1190, 121 Am. St. Rep. 137). In 26 R. C. L. 1316, § 175, it is said:

"The general rule undoubtedly is that a trustee cannot charge the trust estate by his executory contracts unless authorized to do so by the terms of the instrument creating the trust. On such contracts he is personally liable, and the remedy is against him personally."

Having obtained personal credit for the purchase of materials and the performance of labor, without disclosing the existence of the trust organization which he represented, or his agency therefor, the respondent William J. Larkin became personally liable for such obligations. Civ. Code, § 2343.

For the reason that the record indicates that this respondent is personally liable for the obligations sued upon, and that the appellant has not been fully paid, it necessarily follows that the judgment should be reversed.

It is so ordered.

BOYER v. SON.

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Sept. 29, 1928.

Executors and administrators ⚡501—Court cannot make allowance of fees to special administrator within year following admission of will to probate; "any administrator" (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1417, 1616).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1616, authorizing allowance of compensation to any executor or administrator after one year from admission of will to probate, court cannot make allowance of fees to special administrator within year following admission of will to probate, since words "any administrator" include special administrator, in view of section 1417, as amended in 1921, providing that special administrator's fees and those of executor or general administrator must not amount to more than total allowable under section 1618.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Any Administrator.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Henry M. Willis, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Herman H. Boyer, sometimes known as H. H. Boyer, deceased. On Lucille Boyer's petition an order was made fixing fees of special administrator on rendition of final account, and Charles A. Son appeals. Reversed.

Crail, Shutt, Penprase & Miller, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph M. Maltby, of Long Beach, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J. This is an appeal from an order of the trial court fixing the fees of a special administrator upon the rendition of his final account and within one year following the admission of a will to probate. The only question to be determined is whether the court had jurisdiction to fix the fees within the time stated.

The point to be settled depends upon the construction of certain sections of the Code of Civil Procedure. As originally enacted in 1872, section 1417 provided merely for the rendition of accounts by special administrators. The section was amended in 1907 by adding a sentence to the effect that a special administrator "is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services, to be fixed by the court at the time of the settlement of his final account." The section was recast in 1921 by the introduction of much new matter, but the verbiage of the amendment of 1907 was then omitted. The only language of the amendment of 1921 which bears upon the point presented on this appeal is to the effect that the fees of a special administrator—

"shall be fixed by the court: Provided, however, that the total fees paid to the special administrator and executor, or to the special administrator and general administrator of an estate must not, together, exceed the sums provided for in section 1618 of this Code, including the further allowance therein provided. * * * And when the same person does not act as both special administrator and executor, or as special administrator and general administrator, of the estate, such fees shall be divided between the special administrator and executor, or between the special administrator and general administrator of the estate, in such proportions as the court shall determine to be just and reasonable."

Section 1616 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads in part:

"At any time after one year from the admission of a will to probate, or the granting of letters of administration, any executor, or administrator, may, upon such notice to the other parties interested in the estate as the court shall by order require, apply to the court for an allowance to himself upon his commissions, and the court shall on the hearing of such application make an order allowing such executor or administrator such portion of his commissions as to the court shall seem proper, and the portion so allowed may be thereupon charged against the estate."

Other parts of the section show that the fees or commissions referred to are the same as those alluded to in section 1417; that is, those provided for in section 1618. It is not necessary here to further state the provisions of the latter section.

Respondent contends that the expression "any * * * administrator," contained in section 1616, does not include a special administrator. In view of the provision of that section to the effect that an allowance on commissions may be made at any time after a year following the probate of a will or the issuance of letters of administration, the Supreme Court has uniformly held, in effect, if not expressly, that such an allowance may not be made to executors or general administrators within the year. Estate of Jones, 166 Cal. 147, 135 P. 293; Estate of Piercy, 168 Cal. 750, 145 P. 88. There appear to be no decisions which bear specifically upon the rights of special administrators who seek an allowance of fees before the close of administration, and it is in view of this fact that respondent makes the contention already mentioned. In view of the matter imported into section 1417 by the amendment of 1921, it is reasonable to believe that the Legislature intended the words "any * * * administrator," found in section 1616, to include a special administrator.

As a special administrator's fees and those of an executor or general administrator must amount, when added together, to no more than the total allowable under section 1618, it is reasonable to suppose that the Legislature did not intend an allowance to a special administrator until a time when the court, in making the allowance, could determine, with some degree of accuracy, what should be the total apportionment of fees as between a special administrator and the executor or general administrator, as an aid to concluding what partial allowance should be made to the special administrator. It would appear that the Legislature determined that a sufficient time would elapse, for the purpose of making an intelligent solution of such a question, after the passage of one year. Indeed, if section 1616 were to be disregarded, and the question were to be solved according to section 1417 alone, there is great reason to believe that a special administrator could receive no part of his fees until the close of the estate over which he acts. Special administrators were doubtless in this unfortunate position under section 1417 as originally enacted. The code commissioner said, in explaining the amendment to the section, adopted in 1907:

"As the law now stands, the compensation of a special administrator cannot be fixed until the final settlement of the estate."

The amendment, as already observed, provided for a fixing of the compensation after final account. In 1911 the provision for an allowance on fees at the conclusion of a year was first inserted in section 1616. From that time forward, for 10 years, the law thus stood: Under 1417 a special administrator could ask for an allowance on filing his final account, while under 1616 an executor or general administrator could make a similar request at the expiration of the year. At the end of the 10 years, in 1921, the Legislature so amended 1417 as to strike out the provision for an allowance to special administrators on final account. It would appear that, if this amendment did not bring into play the words "any * * * administrator" in 1616, as affecting special administrators, those representatives were remitted by it to the state of the law under 1417 as originally enacted. Such a view would be unfair to them, and calls for a construction of 1616 which would afford them relief. We see nothing to interfere with such a construction. In any event, we cannot so read the law as to see anywhere a jurisdiction conferred upon the superior court to make an allowance of fees to a special administrator within a year following the admission of a will to probate, or following the issuance of general letters of administration.

Order reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, of San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by A. E. Stratton against the Mountain View Water Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Roland Rich Woolley, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Leonard, Surr & Hellyer, of San Bernardino, and E. H. Jolliffe, of Ontario, for respondent.

WEYAND, Justice pro tem. The present action is one brought by appellant A. E. Stratton against the Mountain View Water Company, a corporation, to quiet title to a tract of land in the county of San Bernardino. In addition to the usual allegations of such a complaint, appellant alleged that the defendant company entered in and upon her lands, without right, and that it is "wrongfully operating a well thereon and conducting and removing a large quantity of water daily from said land by means of pumps and other machinery."

By its answer the defendant water company denies that plaintiff is the owner of said lands to the exclusion of defendant, and by proper allegations sets up its claim of right to "develop, collect and take any and all water" on, in or under said lands. The defendant further avers that it is a mutual water company, and for more than 25 years last past had served its stockholders with irrigation water, which said water is used to irrigate citrus fruits on the lands of said stockholders, and it has expended large sums of money to develop an adequate water system and water supply for their use and benefit. Defendant further specifically alleges that by a certain deed dated November 7, 1896, it purchased from the Sycamore Water Development Company the water right on, in, and under the said lands, and defendant further pleads an estoppel by an open and notorious user of waters from these lands since November, 1896, under a claim of right, and because they have expended said large sums in the development of water thereon.

On the issues thus presented trial was had and judgment was rendered for the defendant company; the judgment of the trial court being, in part, as follows:

"That the defendant, Mountain View Water Company, is the owner of the sole, exclusive and perpetual right to develop, collect and take any and all water that is now, or hereafter may be on, in or under the real property described, * * * and that in the exercise of said right, said defendant is entitled, and owns the right to bore wells, run tunnels, lay pipe lines, dig ditches, and do anything reasonable and proper for developing, collecting and taking water from said real property, all of which rights are paramount to any right of the plaintiff, in said real property."

While the record of the testimony is quite voluminous, and some conflict exists upon some points, we see no necessity to relate all the details of the entire controversy, under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

To complete plaintiff's chain of title she introduced "Exhibit 8," which purported to be a deed of the Sycamore Water Development Company to one Allie Thompson. This deed, on its face, was dated May 13, 1896, and described the land in question. The certificate of the notary public attached thereto, however, disclosed that it was not acknowledged until December 13, 1905, over nine years after the date named on the face of said deed. It was signed by one B. K. Brant, president, and Archie Thompson, secretary, of the said Sycamore Water Development Company. The grantee therein named, Allie Thompson, was the wife of said Archie Thompson. This deed was recorded December 13, 1905.

The attorney for plaintiff, on presentation of this deed, said to the court: "In passing we can say that the entire controversy resolves itself around this deed." As we view this record, we fully agree with that statement of appellant's counsel.

[1] The defendant, Mountain View Water Company, introduced in evidence a deed dated November 7, 1896, which said deed was designated as defendant's Exhibit B, and whereby the right to develop and take any and all waters on, in, or under the lands here in suit were conveyed to the said defendant herein. This deed was certified by a notary on November 7, 1896, and was recorded on November 14, 1896. This deed was, in like manner, signed by B. K. Brant and Archie Thompson, president and secretary of the said Sycamore Company.

To the introduction of this deed plaintiff objected as irrelevant and immaterial. The point is made in the argument of appellant that as plaintiff's deed, Exhibit 8, antedates the defendant's Exhibit B, that therefore defendant's exhibit is objectionable as proving any right or title in defendant.

Many cases are cited by appellant, and there is much discussion as to the meaning and operation of section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure, subds. 23 and 39, section 1055, Civil Code, section 1961, Code of Civil Procedure, section 1614, Civil Code, section 1615, Civil Code, and section 1951, Code of Civil Procedure.

In the present case the trial court properly received the testimony of F. W. Hart, who was the notary public who took the acknowledgment of B. K. Brant, president of the Sycamore Water Development Company, and of Archie Thompson, the secretary of said company, which testimony was direct and positive to the effect that said Brant signed the deed Exhibit 8, on December 13, 1905, in his presence. Allie Thompson, the grantee named in Exhibit 8, testified that the said deed was dated May 13, 1896, and was then delivered to her, signed.

The records of the Sycamore Water Development Company failed to disclose any resolution of the directors of that company authorizing the execution of such a transfer. The records of said last-named company, however, disclosed a resolution granting authority to make the transfer to defendant herein. The minutes of the defendant company disclose that on October 9, 1896, the said Archie Thompson, husband of Allie Thompson, duly moved the adoption of a resolution directing the purchase of sundry water rights, including those relating to the land here in question.

We should here state that plaintiff's proof disclosed that on November 20, 1905, Allie Thompson and Archie Thompson, her husband, by a grant deed, conveyed to one Samuel Baer the lands in question, and which grant was with a reservation worded as follows: "Subject to the rights of various parties to take water from said land as deeded by Sycamore Water Development Company."

As we view the controversy, there is nothing in the Code sections cited that should preclude the testimony offered by defendant.

The presumptions enumerated in section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure, are disputable. Section 1055, Civil Code, clothes an instrument with the presumption that it was delivered at its date. Nowhere is there assertion that this presumption is conclusive. Section 1614, Civil Code, and section 1615, Civil Code, relate to consideration alone, and in no wise affect the situation here presented.

We dislike to recount what we think may have impelled the trial court to regard the deed, Exhibit 8, as being questionable in many respects. Giving it all other indicia of fairness, yet its execution was not according to the due and usual practice in the execution of deeds. To allow a deed to remain in obscurity for over nine years before obtaining its acknowledgment before a notary public is wholly unusual and out of the ordinary practice. Archie Thompson was the husband of Allie Thompson and was, as she testified, her personal agent and manager. On October 9, 1896, he, as director of defendant, moved the purchase by the defendant of the water rights in the said land, of and from the Sycamore Company. Again, the court may have placed implicit confidence in the apparently probable testimony of the notary, F. W. Hart.

[2] The trial court heard the witnesses and made its decision on what, at most, was a conflict in the testimony. We are not at liberty to disturb its findings, unless there are legal grounds for so doing, and we can see no reason to disturb the findings and judgment of the lower court.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

SHAPRIO v. GREENBERG. (Civ. 5235.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 4, 1928.

1. Frauds, statute of § 158(4) — Evidence held to sustain finding goods were sold to defendant, not to corporation, as respects validity of his oral promise to pay (Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2).

Evidence held to sustain finding that goods were sold to defendant and not to corporation, to which bill was rendered, as against defendant's contention that his promise to pay for goods constituted a nonenforceable guaranty of another's debt, because not in writing as required by Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2.

2. Sales § 52(3) — Permitting seller to testify he thought he was selling goods to defendant rather than to another to whom billed held not error (Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2).

In seller's action for balance due for goods sold, in which defendant set up defense that goods were in fact sold to a corporation to which they were billed, on his promise to pay therefor, which was nonenforceable because not in writing as required by Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2, court did not err in permitting seller to state whether he thought he was selling goods to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. W. Conkling, Judge.

Action by H. Shaprio against B. Greenberg. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Haves and Clore Warne, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Marcus C. Clark and Bearman, Engelhardt & Clark, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff on the balance found to be due for and on account of goods, wares, and merchandise furnished the defendant.

[1] The appeal is apparently based upon the contention that the goods were not sold as stated in the evidence of the plaintiff; the appellant contending that the goods were sold to a corporation and that the appellant was merely the agent of the corporation. The principal legal question raised by the appellant is that the promise of the appellant was merely a promise to pay the debt of another, and therefore that same must be in writing. There is sufficient evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court that the goods were actually sold to the appellant himself, and not to the United Jobbing & Importing Company, in spite of the fact that the bill was rendered (on the request of defendant) to the said company. Respondent testified that, before the order was accepted or the goods delivered, he asked defendant the question, "Who are the United Jobbers?" and defendant said, "I am the United Jobbers." Defendant also, according to plaintiff's testimony, did say, "I will guarantee this account." But plaintiff further testified, "Mr. Greenberg told me that I was shipping this goods to him; I shipped goods to him." The goods were billed to the company, but this was at the request of defendant.

The substance of appellant's contention is that the evidence only establishes against him an oral promise of guaranty, and that this promise is nonenforceable because it was not in writing. But even under the controlling statute (Civ. Code, § 2794, subd. 2) the defendant should be regarded as the original obligor, because the promise was made "under circumstances such as to render the party making the promise the principal debtor."

[2] The ruling of the court on the question to plaintiff, "And you thought you were selling goods to him direct?" was correct, for the reason stated by the court, to wit, "He can state what he believes; it couples up with the representation that he says was made to him."

There is a conflict in the evidence, but there was sufficient evidence for the trial court to make the findings that it did make. The findings made were sufficient to support the judgment, and the judgment and findings are not in conflict with the complaint.

No other alleged errors have been called to our attention than those mentioned; therefore the judgment is affirmed.

HANSEN v. CITY OF SANTA ROSA.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations ⚡293(2)—Description in resolution of intention for improvement held not variance with plans and specifications not following exact language of resolution.

General description in resolution of intention for improvement of two blocks therein described and excepting work already done to official line and grade, with reference to plans and specifications, held not variance with plans and specifications setting out estimate of work to be done thereunder, though not following exact language of the resolution.

2. Municipal corporations ⚡330(1)—Resolution of intention providing for improvement in pursuance of ordinance did not defeat open and competitive bidding.

Resolution of intention that all work under proposed improvement was to be done in pursuance of ordinance giving city the right under certain conditions to reject bids and do the work itself held to show compliance with provisions of the general law of the state and not to defeat open and competitive bidding for doing of the work.

3. Municipal corporations ⚡293(1)—Where jurisdiction is acquired by resolution of intention, discrepancy in resolution ordering plans and adopting plans did not avoid proceedings.

Discrepancy in resolution ordering plans and resolution for adopting plans for public improvement held not to avoid proceedings, in that such mistake is immaterial in case jurisdiction is properly acquired by resolution of intention.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

On petition for rehearing. Petition denied. For former opinion, see 270 P. 268.

C. W. Anderson and F. W. McConnell, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

J. P. Berry, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1] Appellant in his petition for a rehearing complains that in the decision filed in this case (270 P. 268) the court failed to consider the rule as announced in the case of Southwest Paving Co. v. Wilson, 57 Cal. App. 251, 255, 206 P. 776, 778, as follows:

"That such a particular description in the plans and specifications which is at variance with the general description of the resolution of intention creates an ambiguity which renders the proceeding void."

Due consideration was given to this contention, although the point was not elaborated in the opinion filed. The resolution of intention, while providing for the improvement of two blocks therein described, also by its terms excepted work already done to official line and grade. It also provided:

"That all of the work and improvement was to be done in accordance with the plans and specifications made therefor, which plans are hereby referred to and made a part hereof."

It is true that the plans and specifications did not follow the exact language of the resolution. Nevertheless, they do set out an estimate of the work to be done thereunder, which estimate is as follows: "Concrete curb and gutter, 550 lin. feet; grading, 385 cubic yards; macadam, 200 cubic yards."

The city engineer testified that such estimate shows on its face that there was contemplated to be but one block of street improvement. That it specifically stated the number of lineal feet of curbing and gutter, the amount of excavation, and a certain amount of cubic yards of macadam, and that any contractor would use these figures as a check of the amount of the work to be done under the contract.

It is therefore patent and subject to mathematical demonstration that the work contemplated by the plans and specifications, and as stated in the engineer's estimate thereof, was much less than two blocks, as contended by appellant. There can be no question but that the resolution of intention, as well as the plans and specifications, contemplated the exception of work already done to official line and grade. A reasonable construction placed upon the plans and specifications makes them harmonize with the resolution of intention and takes the case out of the rule laid down in Southwest Paving Co. v. Wilson, supra.

[2] Appellant states, as second ground for rehearing, that the court neglected to pass upon his contention that the city council failed to comply with the provisions of section 2 of ordinance 395, in so far as "it failed to follow the provisions of the general law of the state of California, in taking the proceedings up to and including the posting and publication of the notice inviting sealed proposals or bids as therein provided." The contention is that the respondent did, from the outset of these proceedings, contemplate that the work was to be done by the city; that they announced in the resolution of intention and notice calling for the bids, "that all the work shall be done in pursuance of Ordinance No. 395." It is claimed that, because of this expression used in the resolution of intention, open and competitive bidding for the doing of the work was defeated, and that no contractor would bid on the job because the resolution of intention stated that the city intended to do work by day labor under said ordinance. There was, however, a bid submitted for the doing of said work, but which was rejected, because the same was not accompanied by a certified check as required by the resolution of intention.

A complete answer to this contention is to be found in Ordinance No. 395 itself. Section 3 of the City Charter of Santa Rosa (Stats. 1923, p. 1293) provides:

"All public improvements, including the improving, widening or opening of streets or highways may be done under and in pursuance of the general laws of the state or procedural ordinances adopted by the council or the electors, and the whole or any portion of the cost thereof paid out of the city treasury or assessed on the property benefited."

Ordinance 395 is a procedural ordinance, and by its terms it not only gives the city the right, under certain conditions, to reject bids and do the work, but it provides for certain procedural acts which operate upon successful bidders or contractors who are making public improvements covered by said ordinance. It is just as reasonable to assume that the reference to Ordinance 395 in the resolution of intention was for the purpose of notifying the bidders of its procedural provisions, as it is to say that the city at all times contemplated to reject any and all bids and to do the work by day labor. We find no merit in this contention of appellant.

[3] Appellant's last contention in his petition for a rehearing is that this court was in error in stating that the clause excepting "from all of the above-described work such portions as now constructed to the official line and grade" was set out in the resolution ordering the plans and the resolution adopting the plans. It is true that, in this respect, the decision was in error, and that each of said resolutions did not make such an exception; but its mistake in this respect we deem immaterial. It is by the resolution of intention that jurisdiction is acquired (see authorities cited in opinion on file), and the discrepancies in the resolution ordering the plans and the resolution adopting the plans does not make void the proceedings. The resolution calling for bids, however, did have the identical exception as noted in the resolution of intention.

In determining the work to be done under the resolution of intention, extrinsic aid is not required to clear up any uncertainty in such proceeding. The work excepted which constitutes an improvement on the street in question is a monument itself on the ground, easily identified by inspection, and clearly referred to in the resolution of intention. San Francisco Paving Co. v. Dubois, 2 Cal. App. 42, 83 P. 72; Williams v. Bergin, 116 Cal. 56, 47 P. 877.

The petition for a rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE v. BARRETT. (Cr. 1695.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1. California. Oct. 5, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 3, 1928.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 1202(3)—Defendant's testimony as to three prior felony convictions and exemplified copies thereof held sufficient to establish such convictions.

Under information charging that defendant had theretofore been convicted of three felonies, defendant's testimony as to his having been convicted of such felonies, and exemplified copies, showing such convictions, filed in case, held sufficient to establish the three prior convictions, though complaint incorrectly stated date of one of them.

2. Prostitution $\S$ 4—Proof of several acts of prostitution in defendant's apartment by his wife held sufficient to establish character of apartment as "house of prostitution" (Pen. Code, $\S$ 266g).

Proof that, prior to date charged, a large number of acts of prostitution were committed in two-room apartment by defendant's wife with defendant's knowledge and at his solicitation, and to knowledge of proprietor of apartment house, held sufficient to establish character of apartment as a "house of prostitution," within Pen. Code, $\S$ 266g, though not necessarily of the entire apartment house.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, House of Prostitution.]

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1166½(6)—Trial court's refusal to allow defendant's attorney to question jurymen respecting his occupation held not prejudicial in pimping prosecution.

Trial court's refusal to permit defendant's attorney to ask a certain jurymen as to his business or occupation, on ground that such question was not a ground for challenge, held not prejudicial to defendant, in prosecution for permitting wife to remain in house of prostitution and for pimping.

Houser, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Chas. L. Allison, Judge.

Louis C. Barrett was convicted of permitting his wife to remain in a house of prostitution and of pimping, as a fourth felony offender, and he appeals. Affirmed.

H. Wenzlaff, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of appellant on two counts of an information, one charging that he permitted his wife to remain in a house of prostitution, and the second count on which he was convicted was on a charge of pimping. He was further charged in the information with having been theretofore convicted of three felonies. The jury found the defendant guilty on both counts, and also found that it was true that the defendant had been convicted of three prior felonies. Defendant also appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The first objection as to the sufficiency of the evidence with reference to the three prior felonies is answered by the opinions filed in this court in the recent cases of People v. Carrow, 270 P. 379, and People v. Bigelow, 270 P. 460. In this case the defendant testified fully as to his having been convicted of three prior felonies, and, in addition thereto, exemplified copies showing such convictions were filed. As to one, the date of conviction was incorrectly stated in the complaint in that it was alleged to be on or about or before the 3d day of January, 1918, when the correct date was March 21, 1918; but it becomes immaterial, in view of the testimony of the defendant himself, admitting the three prior convictions.

[2] As to the charge of permitting his wife to remain in a house of prostitution, it seems to be the impression of the defendant that to sustain such a charge there has to be proof that it was a common house of prostitution, where several prostitutes were engaged in such business. There is proof in this case of a large number of acts of prostitution committed on the particular premises by the wife of the defendant, prior to the date the offense was charged, thus making the two rooms so used a place of prostitution, regardless of what use was made of the rest of the place, known as the Kentucky Rooms, and there is evidence that these were all committed within appellant's knowledge, and there is evidence that they were each engaged in at his solicitation and upon his demand. Also there is evidence that the proprietor of the house known as "Kentucky Rooms," in which the apartment occupied by appellant and his wife was located, knew that the apartment was being used as a place of prostitution. This evidence, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to establish the character of the apartment, but not necessarily the entire house, as a house of prostitution, within the meaning of the statute (Pen. Code, § 266g), and therefore it was unnecessary to instruct the jury that in order to convict defendant on the first count they must find as a fact "that the said Kentucky Rooms was a house of prostitution," or "that it was one of the essential elements of the crime charged, and that the defendant had a right to have the jury determine whether the Kentucky Rooms was or was not a house of prostitution." The instructions that were given fully covered the only controversy involved, in view of the whole testimony introduced, and the court was justified in refusing to dismiss the first count of the information on motion of the defendant, which motion was predicated upon the claim that "there was no proof that the said Kentucky Rooms was a house of prostitution."

[3] As to the objection of appellant with reference to the refusal of the trial court to allow the attorney for appellant to ask a certain jurymen as to his business or occupation, the court called the attention of the attorney to the fact that it was not a ground for challenge, presumably meaning that it would not tend to prove some fact material to a challenge for cause. No further attempt was made by the attorney for appellant to ask any of the prospective jurors any other questions as to their qualifications or disqualifications. There is nothing in the record from which this court can determine that the defendant was in any way prejudiced by the refusal of the trial court to allow the single question as to the business or occupation of the juror.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

I concur: CONREY, P. J.

HOUSER, J. I dissent. However, my objection to the conclusion reached by the majority of the members of this court relates exclusively to the subject-matter last treated in the majority opinion herein. With reference thereto, the specification of error presented by appellant is that:

"The court erred in denying defendant's counsel the right to interrogate the prospective jurors on their voir dire examination with competent questions, or any questions, to ascertain the fitness and qualifications to act as jurors in said cause, and as a result defendant was denied his constitutional and lawful right to a trial by a fair and impartial jury."

From the record it appears that, after the case had been called for trial, the roll of the jurors was called. Thereupon all the jurors were sworn to answer questions touching their qualifications "to act as jurors." At that time the names of no jurors had been drawn by the clerk, nor had any of the jurors been called into the jury box, but the entire panel was both sworn and examined collectively, solely with a view to determine whether any right to a challenge for cause existed as to any of them. After the trial judge had finished with his examination of the jurors, the names of 12 of them were called by the clerk of the court. Presumptively they then took their proper places in the jury box. Thereupon the judge made the statement:

"You may examine upon any matter not covered by the court's examination."

After the trial judge had directly refused defendant the right to inquire as to the business or occupation of the several jurors, and had informed defendant's attorney that "they are qualified jurors, regularly on the term panel, all of them are qualified to act as jurors, * * *" and in answer to a question by defendant's attorney in substance had stated that theretofore all of the jurors had "acted as jurors in criminal cases," the jury was "passed for cause" by respective counsel.

Section 1078 of the Penal Code provides as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the trial court to examine the prospective jurors to select a fair and impartial jury. He shall permit reasonable examination of prospective jurors by counsel for the people and for the defendant."

In the case of People v. Edwards, 163 Cal. 752, 127 P. 58, after a review of the authorities, it is held that no statutory authority exists in this state which gives the right to a defendant to examine a juror on his voir dire, solely for the purpose of determining whether a peremptory challenge may be exercised upon him. To the same effect are People v. Riordan, 79 Cal. App. 488, 250 P. 190, and Zolkover v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 81 Cal. App. 772, 254 P. 926. It is therefore manifest that the language of section 1078 of the Penal Code, which, after an examination by the "trial court" or "prospective jurors," permits "reasonable examination of prospective jurors" by counsel for the defendant, can refer or apply to nothing other than those subjects which may furnish legal ground for a challenge for cause. By the terms of the statute and by judicial determination the only limitations upon the examination of jurors by a defendant are that the examination must be "reasonable," and that it be with reference to statutory grounds for the exercise of a challenge for cause. In the instant case, as hereinbefore stated, after the "trial court" had examined the entire panel collectively, the statement was made that "you may examine upon any matter not covered by the court's examination."

Assuming that the examination conducted by the trial judge fairly covered the statutory field of subjects constituting a basis for a challenge for cause, the defendant was precluded from ascertaining the correctness of any of the answers necessarily inferred as having been given by any juror to questions propounded to him by the trial judge. A general, assumed, answer of "yes" or "no" to a broad, comprehensive question might not have constituted a fair test of the qualifications of the "prospective juror," and yet by the order of the court defendant was effectually prevented from asking any question or questions which, for example, might definitely have determined the actual prejudice of such juror against the defendant, or the bias of such juror in favor of the prosecution. While it may be that the scope of the examination permitted to a defendant may be reasonably controlled by the trial judge, to my mind the fair construction of the statute does not admit of an order by the trial judge excluding any examination whatsoever—which is the effect of the order in the instant case. It is manifest that a rule providing that, after an examination by the trial judge of prospective jurors, no examination by counsel for defendant would be permitted, might result in hardship and the denial of a fair trial to a defendant. By a mere paraphrasing by a trial judge of the words of the statute relating to challenges for cause, the examination of prospective jurors by defendant might be absolutely prevented. Considering constitutional and statutory provisions, and viewed solely from a legal standpoint, I doubt that defendant had a fair trial.

No point is raised by appellant regarding the propriety of examining the entire jury panel collectively and before the jury box has been filled by jurors whose names have been regularly drawn by the clerk from the trial jury box. I wish, however, to take this opportunity to express my personal disapproval of such a course. No authority exists for the procedure adopted by the trial court. It is manifest that such a practice is open to many objections, and might easily lead to the selection of a jury by which neither of the parties would be accorded a fair trial. Until such time as the procedure may be amended, so as to legally provide for such a course, it would conduce to less likelihood of judicial error being committed by the trial court if the prescribed procedure were followed. In People v. Estorga, 267 P. 589, this court held, in effect, that where the court made no examination of the jurors, other than by questions addressed to the members of the panel before any jurors had been drawn for the case on trial, the examination so made by the judge was not the examination contemplated by section 1078 of the Penal Code.

However, as the Supreme Court has transferred the cause for hearing in that court, it seems inadvisable to volunteer another definite ruling on that point at this time.

DE RIGNE v. HART. (Civ. 3560.)*

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 29, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 26, 1928.

- 1. Partnership ⚡104—Partners cannot sue one another at law in respect to partnership business; remedy being by equity suit for dissolution and accounting.

Partners cannot sue one another at law in respect to any business of partnership or to recover damages from the one or the other of copartners for breach of partnership agreement; remedy being by suit in equity for dissolution of partnership and accounting and settlement of partnership affairs.

Code, §§ 2395, 2404.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hugh J. Crawford, Judge.

Action by Charles A. De Rigne against Richard D. Hart. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Schreider, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover damages in the sum of $5,000 for the alleged breach by the latter of a certain contract made by and between the parties. The contract, which is in writing, is set out in the complaint in hæc verba, and as so pleaded is as follows:

"Los Angeles, California, October-1-1924.

"Agreement between Charles A. De Rigne of the first part and Richard D. Hart of the second part. I Richard D. Hart have entered into agreement with Charles A. De Rigne to fiance and promote the De Rigne automobile motor eliminator, serial number 726576, patent pending.

"For my consideration of fiancing this proposition, I am to receive fifty per cent (50) of the business and fifty per cent (50) of all gross receipts, and all accounts shall be agreed upon by both parties.

"To promote the above De Rigne automobile motor eliminator we Charles A. De Rigne and Richard D. Hart have entered into the business of manufacturing and selling the above article under the name of the De Rigne and Hart Manufacturing Company.

"At any time that we shall consider to sell the business shall be divided equally fifty per cent (50).

"Within any time after the first of the year nineteen hundred twenty five (1925), that either party should become dissatisfied, the other party as the exclusive right to buy or sell. In case of death of either parties, the wives or heirs of the above said parties, shall go right ahead with the business if they so desire, Minnie May De Rigne, Emma Zaiser Hart.

"All money collected from the business, shall be deposited in the bank, (whatever such bank shall be) in the name of the De Rigne and Hart Mfg. Co., and all checks must bare the signature of both. Richard D. Hart.

"Chas. A. De Rigne."

The court below sustained a general demurrer to the complaint and allowed the plaintiff 10 days within which to file an amended pleading. The plaintiff failed to file an amended complaint within the indicated time, and judgment dismissing the complaint was thereupon rendered and entered. The plaintiff appeals from said judgment.

[1, 2] The legal integrity of the judgment appealed from rests upon the solution of the question whether the contract above reproduced herein is and was intended as an executed agreement of partnership between the parties to this action, or was and is, and intended to be only, an executory contract providing for the formation in the future of a partnership, the consummation thereof to depend entirely upon the actual advancement by the defendant to the plaintiff of the finances which he (defendant) therein agreed to advance "to fiance and promote (as the preamble of the agreement reads) the De Rigne automobile eliminator," etc. If the above-written instrument was intended by the parties to constitute written evidence of the formation of a partnership between them, or, in other words, if it was the intention of the parties that the effect of the instrument upon its execution by both was itself to establish a partnership inter sese, then the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained, since it is a thoroughly established rule that partners cannot sue one another at law in respect to any of the business of the partnership, or to recover damages from the one or the other of the copartners for a breach of the partnership agreement. Stone

v. Fouse, 3 Cal. 292, 294; Russell v. Ford, 2 Cal. 86; Buckley v. Carlisle, 2 Cal. 420; Nugent v. Locke, 4 Cal. 318, 320; Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174; Fisher v. Sweet, 67 Cal. 228, 230, 7 P. 657; Bremner v. Leavitt, 109 Cal. 130, 41 P. 859; Dukes v. Kellogg, 127 Cal. 563, 60 P. 44; Rassaert v. Mensch, 17 Cal. App. 637, 120 P. 1072; Streeter & Riddell, Inc., v. Bacon, 49 Cal. App. 327, 193 P. 285. As the foregoing cases say, the remedy is by a suit in equity for a dissolution of the partnership and an accounting and settlement of the partnership affairs. And, as is further said in those cases, if any of the partners have by their conduct injured the partnership business, or have breached the partnership agreement and damage to the partnership or the other copartners as such has resulted, evidence showing such breach and damage is admissible in the suit for a dissolution of the partnership and the damage considered in the accounting as among the partnership affairs to be settled therein. See, in particular, on this proposition, Dukes v. Kellogg, supra, and Rassaert v. Mensch, supra. As before stated, the important question then is: Did the parties to this action intend to form themselves into a partnership by the agreement hereinabove set forth to take effect and be in force immediately upon the making of the agreement? The learned trial judge of the court below, as is obvious from his ruling on the demurrer, construed said writing as a partnership agreement, and held, as would necessarily be the result under such construction of the writing, that the plaintiff, by the institution of this action, has not pursued the proper remedy for the righting of the alleged wrong of which he complains.

The agreement, as will readily be observed on an inspection thereof, is not skillfully phrased, it having evidently been drawn by some person without experience in drafting legal documents; yet its language is not so wanting in clarity as to make it a matter of serious difficulty to ascertain therefrom the nature of the legal relation which the parties to the instrument actually intended should thereby be created between them.

[3] It will be noted that in language, the meaning of which cannot be misunderstood, the second paragraph of the agreement declares that:

"To promote the above De Rigne automobile motor eliminator we, Charles A. De Rigne and Richard D. Hart have entered into the business of manufacturing and selling the above article under the name of the De Rigne and Hart Manufacturing Company."

Here is a plain and unequivocal declaration that the parties have together entered into the business named. Paraphrased in accord with a rational interpretation thereof, said language cannot have been intended to mean anything short of this:

"That we (meaning the parties) have by these presents jointly entered into the business of manufacturing and selling the above article under the firm name of the De Rigne & Hart Manufacturing Company."

This construction of the second paragraph of the agreement is supported by the succeeding paragraphs. The two paragraphs immediately following the second contain stipulations, common to partnership agreements, providing for the adjustment of the partnership affairs upon the happening of contingencies to which such business relationships between several partners are naturally subject and which may arise at any time during the existence of a partnership, viz.: How or in what proportion as between the partners the proceeds of the business and its essential equipments shall be divided, in case of a sale; that, if either partner should become dissatisfied "within any time after the first of the year 1925" (the agreement was made October 1, 1924), the other party is to have "the exclusive right to buy or sell" (that is—as would seem to be the only reasonably permissible construction of that stipulation—in case one of the partners became dissatisfied with the business or for any reason the partnership relation, he should either buy the other's interest or sell the latter his interest); that, in case of the death of either of the partners, his wife or his heirs shall, with the surviving partner, proceed with the further prosecution of the business as the successor of the deceased partner, if she so desires. The last paragraph provides that all moneys derived from the business shall be deposited in a bank agreed on in the name of "the De Rigne & Hart Manufacturing Company" and that "all checks shall bare (bear) the signature of both."

The stipulation that, if either party "within any time after the first of the year 1925" should become dissatisfied, "the other party as (has) the exclusive right to buy or sell," is noticeably significant in its bearing upon the question whether it was the intention of the parties to the agreement that the writing was to stand as written evidence of a partnership which had previously been, or at the time of the making of the agreement and by reason thereof was, formed between them. The agreement was, as seen, executed by the parties on the 1st day of October, 1924—three months from the time within which (at any time) either party might, if dissatisfied with the arrangements provided for by the writing, either sell to the other party or buy from him his interest. If the instrument was not intended as a partnership agreement, what was there by reason of the agreement or that was created thereby that either party would have to sell or buy? If it was not the intention of the parties to create a partnership at the time of the making of the agreement and none was created thereby, when was the partnership relation to begin? The agreement does not say that the partnership relation should not begin until the first of the year 1925. To the contrary, that particular stipulation may well be construed to presuppose the existence of a partnership at the time of the making of the agreement that the instrument itself was intended as a partnership agreement. When considered in connection with the other provisions of the agreement, such construction of said stipulation seems to be entirely sound. But the complaint itself in effect construes the agreement as we view it. It is therein alleged that, after the making of the agreement, and on or about October 10, 1924, the plaintiff, upon the written order of the defendant, employed the Mulford Manufacturing Company to manufacture certain patterns and moulds "of said device and invention," referring to the "De Rigne automobile motor eliminator"; that, on October 20, 1924, the plaintiff, "upon the written order of the defendant," employed "Kay-Brunner Steel Casting Company to manufacture certain castings of said device and invention from the patterns and moulds manufactured by the Mulford Manufacturing Company"; that on October 25, 1924, "with the consent of the defendant," the plaintiff rented "a certain space" of certain described premises in the city of Los Angeles "for the purpose of conducting the said business"; that, on October 25, 1924, the plaintiff, "with the consent of the defendant," employed a certain named concern "to manufacture certain tools in the said business and to render certain services in connection therewith"; that on November 15, 1924, the plaintiff, "with the consent of the defendant," rented certain space in certain described premises other than the space so rented as above stated, for the purposes of the business; that also on November 15, 1924, the plaintiff, "with the consent of the defendant, purchased certain lumber from Mox Incorporated, to make a partition of the said space to be used and occupied by the said business." It is perfectly clear from the foregoing averments of the complaint that the partnership between the parties was launched and actively being prosecuted for a period in excess of two months prior to the date (December 23, 1924) of the filing of the complaint in this action.

But the point is made by the plaintiff that the agreement cannot and does not constitute the parties to it partners, because it provides, so it is contended, for a division between the parties, not of the profits, but of the gross earnings of the business, citing Wheeler v. Farmer, 38 Cal. 203, 213, and Freeman v. Sullivan (Cal. App.) 260 P. 807. See, also, Story on Partnership (7th Ed.) § 34, and footnotes. As seen, the paragraph of the agreement giving rise to that point provides:

"For my consideration of fancing this proposition, I am to receive fifty per cent (50) of the business and fifty per cent (50) of all gross receipts, and all accounts shall be agreed upon by both parties."

It is obvious that the parties did not intend to say what the language of that paragraph seems to imply. If it was the intention of the parties that the defendant was to receive 50 per cent. of the business—that is, to own one-half of the business—and receive 50 per cent. or one-half of all gross earnings of the business, there would be little, if anything, left of the business for De Rigne. It is not probable that a person of ordinary intelligence (and we must assume that the plaintiff possesses that degree of intelligence) would intentionally bind himself to an agreement the very operation of which would ultimately if not immediately divest him of all interest in the business. But a fair and enlightened consideration of the writing as a whole will show and does show that the intention of the parties was that they were to share equally in the ownership of the business and in the profits derived therefrom. For instance, the provision in the writing that "at any time that we shall consider to sell, the business shall be divided equally fifty per cent (50)," itself clearly indicates that the intention was that the parties were to be equal partners in the business, and to share equally in the profits thereof. Again, we find in the very paragraph we are now considering this clause: "All accounts shall be agreed upon by both parties." If it was the intention that the defendant was to receive 50 per cent. of the gross receipts, what interest would he have in the accounts? Clearly, none. But if, as seems to be true, the defendant's agreement to the accounts was to be required or was necessary, it is, of course, manifest that he was to have an interest therein, and that the defendant was to receive 50 per cent. only of the net receipts, or, as it is expressed in the previous clause of said paragraph, "fifty per cent of the business."

But we need not further pursue the discussion. We are satisfied that it must be held that the instrument involved herein is and was intended by the parties as an executed agreement, whereby the parties thereto intended to effect and did effect an association between themselves, "for the purpose of carrying on business together, and dividing its profits between them" (Civ. Code, § 2395), and that the agreement, being wholly silent as to the division of losses, the instrument itself implies an agreement "for a corresponding division of its losses" (Civ. Code, § 2404).

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CRITTENDEN v. CREDIT FONCIER DES ETATS-UNIS. (Civ. 6236.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Sept. 29, 1928.

1. Corporations $\S$ 80(7)—Representation that corporation proposed loaning money in United States held not promise that corporation's sole business would be lending of money.

In action to rescind contract for purchase of stock in corporation for breach of promise that corporation would loan money in America, representation by promoter to plaintiff that corporation proposed lending money in United States did not amount to promise and representation that corporation would loan money as its sole business.

2. Corporations $\S$ 80(11)—Evidence held not to show failure of consideration for stock purchase by breach of agreement to loan money in America by corporation organized therefor.

In action to rescind contract for purchase of stock in corporation organized to loan money in United States, for breach of agreement to loan money, testimony by promoter that he told plaintiff corporation expected to borrow money in Europe and loan it in America at higher interest, and that money was not loaned because of war in Europe, showed that representations relied on were based on continuance of existing conditions, and that conditions were non-existent when plaintiff gave notice of rescission, and did not sustain claim of failure of consideration for subscription agreement which was unconditional.

3. Corporations $\S$ 80(5)—Statements that corporation, when organized, would invest funds largely in securities of certain territory, held expressions of opinion in suit to rescind stock purchase.

In suit to rescind contract for purchase of stock in corporation, statements that corporation, when organized, would invest its funds largely in securities offered in Pacific Coast territory, held mere expressions of opinion.

4. Corporations $\S$ 83—Whether there is abandonment of purposes of corporation is generally question of fact.

Whether there is an abandonment of purposes and objects of corporation is generally question of fact, there being no fixed standard by which it is to be determined.

5. Corporations $\S$ 382—That corporation's principal purpose was to loan money in United States did not preclude it from having other purposes.

That principal purpose of corporation was to lend money in United States does not preclude it from having other purposes, but implies that there may be other purposes.

6. Appeal and error $\S$ 882(17)—Finding that corporation did not fail to loan money in United States could not be complained of on appeal, where plaintiff placed issue before court and there was no evidence thereon.

In suit to rescind contract for purchase of stock in corporation, organized principally to loan money in United States, and alleged to have failed and refused to make any loans whatsoever, finding by court that corporation did not so fail, or refuse, cannot be complained of on appeal, where plaintiff placed issue before court and there was no evidence offered or received thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by William C. Crittenden against the Credit Foncier des Etats-Unis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph J. Webb and Wm. A. Nunlist, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BEAUMONT, Justice pro tem. In the early part of 1912 certain persons in Paris, France, and San Francisco, Cal., decided to form a corporation, the chief object of which was to borrow money in Europe and lend it in America. At that time the interest rate in France was approximately 2 per cent. lower than in the United States. Henry Brunner, who lived in Paris, but who had formerly been a resident of San Francisco, was mainly responsible for the plan. He interested Tilden C. Tognazzini, of San Francisco, in the formation of the corporation. William Crittenden (appellant herein), a practicing attorney in San Francisco, heard of the proposed enterprise, came to Tognazzini, and requested participation therein. After some discussion, it was agreed that Crittenden should become one of ten incorporators to be selected from San Francisco. Appellant agreed to purchase 400 shares of the capital stock, and later subscribed therefor, paying $9,643.20. The corporation was organized in Paris in November, 1912, with Brunner and Tognazzini as members of the board of directors. The name of this corporation was Credit Foncier des Etats-Unis. Just prior to the formation of that corporation, the organizers thereof had caused to be formed in Delaware, U. S. A., a corporation by the name of Credit Foncier of the United States, Incorporated. The latter corporation was an auxiliary of the former. Some years after the beginning of this action it was dissolved. The French corporation issued Crittenden a stock certificate, in accordance with his subscription agreement. In April, 1914, Crittenden served on the French corporation (Credit Foncier des Etats-Units) a notice of rescission. Shortly thereafter, this action seeking to rescind the contract of purchase of the stock was instituted. Defendant had judgment, and from this plaintiff has appealed.

Many specifications "wherein the evidence is alleged to be insufficient to justify the decision" were made by appellant, but in his brief he concisely states the contention on which he relies. It is as follows:

"That the consideration inducing him to purchase said stock was the promise on the part of the promoters of the defendant, the 'Paris Corporation,' and the promise of the defendant itself, the 'Paris Corporation,' as shown by its by-laws, to loan money in America and particularly in California; that the defendant, the 'Paris Corporation,' failed to loan any money in America or in California in violation of its agreement; that the consideration having failed, the plaintiff and appellant was entitled to rescind the purchase of the said stock and recover the money paid therefor."

First, let us examine the record as to the promise so claimed to be shown by the by-laws. It is not shown in the by-laws that the corporation is to loan money in California. The by-laws read:

"The principal purpose of this corporation is to carry on in America, and especially in the United States of America, either alone, or in association with other concerns or individuals, or as agent for the account of the third parties, a general business of making loans on mortgages or mortgage securities."

[1] Appellant alleges in his third amended complaint that promoters of respondent promised and represented to him that they were engaged in organizing in Paris, France, "a corporation having for its principal purpose the carrying on in America and especially in the United States of America, but more particularly in what is known as the 'Pacific Coast territory,' a general business of making loans of money on mortgages and mortgage securities," and that "when said corporation was organized the said corporation would perform each of said acts as its sole business." The court found adversely to these allegations. There is no evidence in the record that Tognazzini made any representation that this was to be the sole business of the corporation. That he represented to appellant that the corporation purposed lending money, not only generally in the United States, but particularly in the Pacific Coast territory, is apparent from the evidence. The numerous exhibits in the record establish this clearly.

[2] We now consider the point of appellant's contention "that the defendant failed to loan any money in America or California in violation of its agreement." Respondent did not lend any money in the United States, and the court so found; but was this in violation of any agreement? Tilden C. Tognazzini, sworn as a witness on behalf of plaintiff, testified on cross-examination:

"I believe Mr. Crittenden came to me and asked to join this group, at the solicitation of Mr. Boardman, I think he told me at that time. I remember telling Mr. Crittenden that I did not think he should join, being an attorney, and having already one attorney as one of the group. * * * I don't remember just exactly what took place, but my impression is that I rather discouraged Mr. Crittenden, on that theory. * * * As to what was said, we had a great many talks in those days; we used to meet daily I think and I perhaps told him exactly what I told the rest—what I expected this corporation would do under certain conditions then existing, which was the only logical thing I could have told him, of course."

As to the conditions existing about the time these conversations were had relative to forming the corporation (prior to August, 1912), the record shows definitely that the rate of interest in France and Europe generally was about 2 per cent. per annum lower than in the United States. This motivated the organization of the corporation. The organizers planned to borrow money at the lower rate then current in Europe and loan it at the higher rate in the United States. The evidence shows that wars in the Balkan states unsettled the financial condition of Europe in 1913. The witness Tognazzini was asked why the corporation did not invest any money in the United States. He answered:

"At the time this organization was formed, and which was again the motive for organizing the company, it was on account of money being much cheaper in France than it was here. I would say that within a year conditions changed materially in Europe, that is, a year from the date of the organization. If I recollect correctly, I think the Balkan war started about that time in 1914. It raised rates in France, of course, a great deal. I do not think the situation changed our financial condition in this country materially."

The subscription agreement signed by appellant was unconditional. The condition that appellant contends should attach in order to show a violation of its terms, and a consequent failure of consideration, rests in parol. This testimony shows that the representations relied upon were based on the continuance of the existing conditions. These conditions were nonexistent at the time appellant gave notice of rescission and when he began this action.

[3] Statements to the effect that the "corporation when organized would invest its funds largely in the securities offered in the Pacific Coast territory," made under the circumstances shown by the evidence in this case, were merely expressions of opinion. Jefferson v. Hewitt, 95 Cal. 535, 30 P. 772. On cross-examination appellant stated that he and Mr. Tognazzini "discussed what in effect this corporation was going to do after its organization. 'I don't remember him using the word 'promise.' He never used the word 'intend' or 'intended.' He simply, as far as I remember, stated that the corporation was going to do this, such and such." The findings of the court show that the statements were made without any fraudulent purpose. Appellant testified that Mr. Tognazzini, who was the only person who made any statements to him concerning the proposed corporation, acted in good faith.

[4-6] There is a finding of the court that directly negatives failure of consideration. In appellant's complaint it is alleged that the "said corporation has, without cause, abandoned or is about to abandon, the sole object and purposes thereof and now intends to liquidate its affairs." In another part of the complaint it is alleged that the capital stock of the corporation is 40,000 shares; "that the entire amount has been issued and is now outstanding; that of this total sum 400 shares only were issued to this plaintiff; that a majority of the stock has been issued to and is now held by persons who, at all times referred to herein, have been and now are in active control of the said 'Paris Corporation.'" Upon the questions of abandonment and liquidation, the court found adversely to plaintiff's allegations. Whether there is an "abandonment" of the purposes and objects of a corporation, is generally a question of fact. There is no fixed standard by which it is to be determined. Fletcher's Cyc. Corporations, vol. 2, § 654, and cases cited; Gibson v. Columbia & New Richmond Turnpike Co., 18 Ohio St. 396; Milwaukee Smelting & Ref. Co. v. Lindenberg, 142 Wis. 273, 124 N. W. 273. As heretofore mentioned, the court found that to lend money in the United States was not the sole purpose of respondent. It was the principal purpose, it is true, but that does not conclude it from having other purposes. On the other hand, it implies there may be other purposes. There is no evidence in the record that the corporation was not, at the time of the commencement of this action, engaged in the active business of some, or at least one, of its purposes. Indeed, appellant's allegation regarding the large number of shares outstanding and the active control of the corporation by the board of directors so indicates. The complaint alleged that respondent had failed and refused to make any loans whatsoever. The court found it had not so failed or refused. Appellant cannot now complain of this finding, having placed the issue before the court and there being no evidence offered or received thereon. Monterey County v. Cushing, 83 Cal. 507, 23 P. 700. In the present case there was no testimony that the corporation intended to liquidate its affairs. We cannot say that the circumstances, as shown by the evidence and especially by the testimony of the witness Tognazzini, were not sufficient to justify the court in its finding upon the question of abandonment.

venting the respondents from proceeding with the sale of certain property of which the plaintiff was the owner at the time of entering into certain transactions with one Paul G. Moorhead relating to the erection of a building upon said property, in the course of which a trust deed was executed by the plaintiff as security for certain promissory notes aggregating the sum of $20,000, and which trust deed had been transferred by said Moorhead to the Hammond Lumber Company as security for an indebtedness due from him to said corporation, and which the latter was seeking to have foreclosed at the time of the institution of the present action. The answer of the defendants was that, as to the Hammond Lumber Company, it was an innocent holder of the notes and of the trust deed securing the same in due course of business, and had received the same without notice or knowledge of the equities which the plaintiff has undertaken to assert herein. It is the contention of the appellant, on the other hand, that, notwithstanding the fact that the agreement between herself and Moorhead was not recorded, the Hammond Lumber Company was sufficiently aware of facts relating to the business transactions of Moorhead in connection with the erection, not only of the structure which was to be placed upon this property, but with other buildings and structures for the erection of which he was the contractor and the Hammond Lumber Company the institution furnishing materials and extending credit to said Moorhead in the course of his business as such contractor, as would either have furnished said corporation with actual or required it to take constructive notice as to the existing relations between the plaintiff and Moorhead, and as to the terms and conditions of the contract between them, in the course of which said trust deed and the notes which it secured were given. Such was the issue presented to the trial court, and regarding which a large amount of evidence was introduced upon the trial of the action; upon the conclusion of which the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law against the plaintiff's contention and in favor of the defendants upon the particular issue as to whether the Hammond Lumber Company was the innocent holder of said securities. The judgment based upon such findings and legal conclusion was in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff prosecutes this appeal from such judgment. In her opening brief, consisting of 67 pages, the appellant devotes her entire argument to the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and conclusions of law of the trial court, and makes no argument and cites not a single authority in dispute of the correctness of the conclusion of law of the trial court. The respondents' brief in reply is, in the main, devoted to answering the only contention made by the appellant in her opening brief as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court. We are satisfied from an examination of the record, to which we have thus referred, that the evidence fully supports such findings. In her closing brief, the appellant for the first time undertakes to argue the sole question of law which she concedes is involved in this case, namely, as to whether, upon the facts found by the trial court, assumed to be correct, the Hammond Lumber Company could be held to be an innocent purchaser of the securities, now sought to be foreclosed, for value and without notice of the plaintiff's outstanding equities therein. Without attempting to review in detail the authorities which the appellant cites in support of her belated contention, we are satisfied that from the finally admitted facts of the case the trial court drew the correct legal conclusion. It follows that the judgment should be, and it is hereby affirmed.

The PEOPLE of the State of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. William Edward HICKMAN, Defendant and Appellant. (Crim. 3116.) Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1928. In Chambers of the Chief Justice. Application for writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. Denied. Jerome Walsh, of Kansas City, Mo., and R. H. Cantillon, and F. A. Sievers, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., W. F. Cleary, and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., Los Angeles County, and Tracy Chatfield Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., Los Angeles County, both of Los Angeles, for the People. Walter K. Tuller, of Los Angeles, Amicus Curiae.

WASTE, C. J. William Edward Hickman, appellant, has filed with the Chief Justice an application to be allowed to appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the judgment and order of the Supreme Court of the state of California affirming his conviction of the crime of murder in the first degree, and imposing the death penalty, on the ground that the law under which he was tried and convicted (Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017, 1026, as amended in 1927 [St. 1927, p. 1148] in so far as they apply to his case) violates certain provisions of the Constitution of the United States. In the assignment of errors accompanying the petition, the appellant renews the contentions he made in presenting the same points on the appeal from the judgment of the lower court. After due consideration by this court of the contentions of the appellant and the arguments advanced in their support on the appeal, the court reached the conclusion that, in so far as the amended sections of the Code, supra, applied to the case of the appellant, they violate no provision of the United States Constitution. They provide for certain procedural steps to be taken in the trial of persons accused of crimes, and do not affect any substantive right of one entering only the plea of not guilty by reason of his insanity. People v. Hickman (Cal. Sup.) 268 P. 909. Being of the view that no federal question properly presentable to the Supreme Court of the United States is involved, the appeal to that court is not allowed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Philip Bolar, by Ethel Bolar, his guardian ad litem, against the Maxwell Hardware Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Breed, Burpee & Robinson, of Oakland, for appellant.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland (Marvin B. Sherwin, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Action for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, a minor, as the result of explosion of a toy cannon.

Plaintiff, a 15 year old normal boy, in the last term of junior high school, purchased 35 cents worth of black gun powder at defendant's hardware store in Oakland, Cal., stating after purchase that he intended to use it in a toy cannon, although the evidence is in conflict as to whether he explained to the salesman that it was to be a cannon of his own construction. He then secured a piece of heavy pipe, about 15 inches long and 2 inches in diameter, in which he had a hole drilled for the fuse, and on one end of which he fastened a screw cap. The garage man, who drilled the hole for him, warned him that the device was exceedingly dangerous. Fearing his mother, he secreted the powder and cannon until evening, when, accompanied by his younger brother and two other boys, he took it to a large vacant lot near their home and loaded it with the powder, rammed in with a paper wad, and also with nails, bolts, etc., to serve as projectiles. A soda straw filled with powder was inserted in the breech hole and served as a fuse. The boys stood out of danger and plaintiff applied a match to the "fuse." His first effort was unsuccessful, but applying a second match produced an immediate explosion. The projectiles tore a hole through the "target," a large signboard, but the contrivance exploded and, as a result of either the recoil or the bursting of it, plaintiff was thrown to the ground and his right kneecap was broken, deeply lacerated, and severely and painfully injured. This action charges defendant corporation with responsibility for said injury by reason of its alleged negligence in permitting the purchase of said explosive by an inexperienced minor. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $7,500. Motion for a directed verdict was denied, and motion for a new trial was denied by operation of law. Defendant now prosecutes this appeal from the judgment entered in favor of plaintiff upon said verdict.

Section 1 of Ordinance 1939 (N. S.) of the city of Oakland provides in part:

"No person * * * shall at any time fire or discharge * * * any * * * cannon * * * or any combustible or explosive device * * * of any kind whatsoever, or by whatever name known, within the city limits of the city of Oakland. * * *"

This ordinance was first offered in evidence by defendant at the close of its case, for the purpose of showing contributory negligence. The court expressed his belief that it was not admissible, but, as no objection was made by plaintiff, it was admitted. Defendant next made a motion for a directed verdict, which was denied, and the court reopened the cause of its own motion and then struck the ordinance from the record.

Appellant contends that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence per se in discharging said cannon in violation of said ordinance; that the court erred in refusing to admit the ordinance in evidence, in refusing to instruct the jury that a violation thereof in itself constituted negligence, and in likewise refusing to give two other instructions relative thereto. Appellant further contends that, if the effect of admission of said ordinance would not have been to conclusively establish negligence per se on the part of plaintiff, nevertheless it should have been admitted in evidence; further, that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law in acting as he did, considering his age, education, intelligence, knowledge, experience, and warnings.

[1, 2] A careful examination of this cause leads us to the conclusion that plaintiff as a matter of law was clearly guilty of negligence contributing proximately to the injuries of which he complains. This conclusion forces itself upon us from the facts of the case enumerated above, to which should be added the following: The plaintiff constructed the dangerous device himself, the whole plan originating in his own mind. The idea of a soda straw as a substitute for a fuse, the capping of the pipe, the boring of the breech hole, the mounting of the cannon, loading it, and the ignition of the fuse were all independent ideas of his own, carried out secretly, as he well knew that both parents, if cognizant of his plans, would have forbidden their execution. He knew, at least to some extent, of the explosive power of gunpowder, having extracted it from firecrackers and touched it with a lighted match, and here he warned his companions to stand back when he touched the match to the "fuse" of his cannon. Indeed, he bore the marks of a previous explosion, which occurred while he was burning leaves in which was hidden a dynamite cap. The cap exploded, causing numerous injuries to his face and body. Not only was he possessed of all the knowledge, intelligence, and experience of an ordinary 15 year old boy with respect to these matters, but he might well be classed as above the average in such respect. We can discern no ground whatever upon which minds could differ for an instant as to plaintiff's own patent negligence in causing the explosion which produced his injuries. If this is not a case of contributory negligence as a matter of law, then that rule cannot be held applicable in any case to a minor. Such, however, is not the rule of law. While a minor is not to be held to the same degree of accountability as an adult, still he may, under certain circumstances, be guilty of contributory negligence, and he is held to the same degree of responsibility as a normal, ordinary boy of his own age, unless the presence of special circumstances, such as mental inferiority, except him from application of the rule.

Here we have no controverted facts. We are simply called upon to say whether as a matter of fact reasonable minds could draw any other conclusion than that of negligence on the part of said minor. More frequently, of course, different conclusions may be drawn, and a jury issue thus arises; but in this case common reason and ordinary experience show that a normal boy of 15 years would know positively that he was engaged in an exceedingly dangerous experiment. At the age of this boy the ordinary youth is well acquainted with the use of firearms and to a certain extent with explosives. It is said that thousands of boys of the age of 15 years and younger were in the armies during the Civil War. The testimony of plaintiff himself confirms, and does not weaken, the conclusion that he was a normal youth, at least with respect to his knowledge of explosives; his statement in this respect being substantially as follows:

"When I took the powder home I hid it from my mother in the basement. I also hid my cannon in the basement because I did not want my mother to see or she would have taken it. She would have taken the powder and thrown it away and busted up the cannon, I guess. I knew that powder was something that neither one of my parents wanted me to play with. I knew that my parents did not want me to play with cannons. When boys have a gun parents always say they are going to take the gun away because the boys will get hurt and hardly any of them ever get hurt, but I thought I could shoot a cannon off and nothing would happen. But my mother and father was bound to take it away. I did not know the cannon was dangerous. Bigger ones are dangerous but not these small ones. That particular one was made just to make noise. I knew that ordinary powder had to be handled carefully but I thought that the quantity that I put in the cannon was safe, that powder was not dangerous except in large quantities. * * * With the exception of the time that that cap exploded among these leaves when I was raking up the yard there, with the exception of the one time when I picked some powder out of one fire cracker, I have never had any experience with explosives of any kind previous to the time that I used this black gunpowder in this toy cannon."

[3-6] We conceive the rule applicable to this case to be announced in Studer v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 400, 404, 405, 53 P. 942, 943 (66 Am. St. Rep. 39), wherein a child between 12 and 13 years of age was held as a matter of law to be guilty of contributory negligence, in attempting to climb over the coupling between two freight coaches; a sudden moving of the train at the time having caused his death. Judge Harrison, speaking for the court, said:

"The fact that the deceased was only about twelve years of age did not require the court to submit to the jury whether his attempt to cross the street between the cars constituted negligence. Negligence is the want of such care as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the circumstances of the case. When the facts are clear and undisputed, and when no other inference than that of negligence can be drawn from them, the court is not required to submit the question to the jury, but may itself make the inference. Nagle v. California Southern R. R. Co., 88 Cal. 86 [25 P. 1106]. The court may also determine whether an act is such as would be performed by a person of ordinary prudence, or whether in the common judgment of mankind it would be deemed dangerous or attended with peril. The same act which would be negligence in an adult may not be such if done by a child, but a child is required to exercise the same degree of care that would be expected from children of his age, or which children of his age ordinarily exercise (State v. Baltimore, etc., R. R. Co., 24 Md.

84, 87 Am. Dec. 600; Collins v. South Boston R. R. Co., 142 Mass 301 [7 N. E. 856] 56 Am. Rep. 675) and the court is as fully authorized as a jury to determine what this degree of care is. Children, as well as adults, should use the prudence and discretion which persons of their years ordinarily have, and they cannot be permitted with impunity to indulge in conduct which they know, or ought to know, to be careless. "The law imposes upon minors the duty of giving such attention to their surroundings and care to avoid danger as may fairly and reasonably be expected from persons of their age and capacity." (Merryman v. Chicago, etc., R. R. Co., 85 Iowa, 635 [52 N. W. 545].) In the present case the capacity and intelligence of the child are not controverted, and he must be presumed to have had all the qualities ordinarily belonging to a person of his age."

A kindred principle is recognized in such cases as Nicolosi v. Clark, 169 Cal. 746, 147 P. 971, L. R. A. 1915F, 638, and Bradley v. Thompson, 65 Cal. App. 226, 223 P. 572, both of which are what is known as attractive nuisance cases, and show a trespass by a child upon defendant's property to obtain explosives, with resulting injuries, defendant being exonerated from liability as a matter of law.

The rule above announced is sound. It has not been modified, and is applicable to the case before us. It is clearly implied, if not expressly stated, to be an exception to the general rule announced in such cases as Cahill v. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 577, 96 P. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Nicolosi v. Clark, 169 Cal. 746, 147 P. 971, L. R. A. 1915F, 638; Mayne v. San Diego Electric Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 177, 175 P. 690; Morris v. Standard Oil Co., 188 Cal. 468, 471, 205 P. 1073; Schroeder v. Baumgarteker (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 740.

It is plainly recognized in Wallace v. Great Western Power Co. (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 281, where the court below was sustained in granting a nonsuit on account of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, a boy of 14 years. The following is a list of cases from other jurisdictions similar in fact and principle, where conclusions are announced in harmony with the holding here made: Dudley & Orr v. Hawkins (Tex. Civ. App.) 183 S. W. 776; Thornton v. Ionia Fair Assn., 229 Mich. 1, 200 N. W. 958; Shields v. Costello (Mo. App.) 229 S. W. 411; Holmes v. Delaware & Hudson Co., 128 App. Div. 24, 112 N. Y. S. 421.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to give consideration to the contention that the excluded ordinance was applicable to plaintiff and violation thereof by him constituted negligence per se as well as to the contention that defendant, under the circumstances, may not invoke the terms of said ordinance as a defense. It is for the same reason unnecessary to consider whether the sale of the powder, assuming it to have been a negligent act under the facts of this case, was the efficient, proximate cause of the injuries suffered by plaintiff minor.

In this cause the provisions of section 629 of the Code of Civil Procedure are applicable, authorizing the appellate court, if it appears from the whole evidence that a verdict should have been directed at the trial, to order that judgment be so entered. The judgment is therefore reversed with directions to the court below to enter judgment for the defendant.

SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. CARLSEN et al. (L. A. 8044.)★

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1928.

1. Interpleader ⇨10—Alleged right of escrow holder to bring interpleader action held not defeated by indebtedness due it from vendor asserting claim to property involved (Code Civ. Proc. § 386).

Fact that bank, as escrow holder, also held certain bonds and evidences of indebtedness of vendor, held not to defeat its alleged right, under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, to bring interpleader action to relieve itself of liability on account of conflicting claims between vendor and subvendee.

2. Interpleader ⇨10—Escrow holder, assuming definite and independent liability to party to escrow, cannot have responsibility terminated by interpleader action (Code Civ. Proc. § 386).

Where escrow holder has assumed a definite and independent liability to one of the parties in escrow, his right to bring interpleader action, under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, is thereby defeated, since judgment of court could not absolve him from performing his independent contract.

3. Interpleader ⇨6—Absence of time limit in escrow instructions held not, under circumstances, to defeat right of escrow holder to interpleader.

Absence of time limit in escrow instructions held not to defeat right of escrow holder to institute action in interpleader, under the terms of Code Civ. Proc. § 386, where contracting parties named in escrow agreement were in hopeless discord as to their respective rights thereunder, and there was no certainty and little possibility that conditions might change for the better and that obstacles standing in the way of closing escrow would be removed within any reasonable length of time.

4. Interpleader ⇨6—Provision of escrow agreement that no rescission or modification should take place without consent of parties did not preclude interpleader (Code Civ. Proc. § 386).

Provision of escrow agreement that no rescission of its terms should take place without the consent of the parties thereto, including bank as escrow holder, held not to deprive bank of its right to avail itself of interpleader pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 386.

CURTIS, J. An opinion in this proceeding was rendered by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, Second Division. Thereafter we granted a motion for a hearing thereof in this court. The following portion of said opinion, rendered by the District Court of Appeal, we hereby adopt as the opinion of this court:

This action is one in interpleader. The appeal is from an order granting a motion for nonsuit made by the defendants and respondents F. C. Carlsen and Petroleum Midway Company; also from an order denying the prayer of the plaintiff.

The circumstances out of which this litigation arose are that on April 22, 1922, the California Chemical Company, herein referred to as the company, and F. C. Carlsen opened an escrow with the plaintiff, hereinafter referred to as the bank. At the time the parties to the escrow signed and delivered to the bank certain written instructions as to the handling of the escrow. There was then placed with it certain deposits, to wit: (1) Written agreement between the Dominguez Land Corporation, hereinafter referred to as the corporation, and the company, by which the corporation contracted to sell certain land to the company; (2) written agreement between the company and F. C. Carlsen, in which it was agreed that the company would convey all of its interest in the instrument referred to as deposit 1, to Carlsen; and (3) written assignment by the company as stipulated in the written agreement last mentioned to be made by Carlsen.

Deposit No. 2 provided that the consideration to be paid by Carlsen for the assignment by the company of its interest in deposit No. 1 should be $16,000. The instructions signed by Carlsen required, among other things, that the bank, escrow holder, have delivered to it "a letter or report by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, subject to my approval, and showing that no assignment of said agreement last above mentioned appears of record, and that said Dominguez Land Corporation has not placed of record any declaration of forfeiture of or default in said agreement prior to April 22, 1922." Further, it was provided that upon such delivery the bank should pay to the company or order $2,000, etc. There was also contained in the instructions a provision which reads as follows:

"No rescission of this escrow or modification of its terms or any notice or demand shall be of any effect without joint consent in writing subscribed by the undersigned and assented to by the bank."

Without enumerating each step taken or act done, it may be said that Carlsen appears to have performed all of the conditions agreed to be performed by him. It is so stated in a letter dated March 21, 1923, written by the bank to the First National Bank of Torrence. Nor is there any claim that the company was in default, except that the bank, acting for it, was unable to secure the report from the Title Insurance & Trust Company, required by the escrow instruction. Considerable negotiations were had, and finally, according to the testimony of the witness Martin, an attorney for the bank, "Carlsen or his attorney representing him stated that they would waive these requirements." The bank then asked the other parties to the escrow to waive them also. However, Martin testified:

"The other parties to the escrow, who were communicated with either by me or by Mr. Keyes at my suggestion, objected to the waiver."

Upon some occasion after the escrow was begun, and before suit was entered, Martin further testified, a representative of the corporation "stated that so far as they were concerned we were at liberty to go ahead with the escrow according to the terms and conditions of it."

On May 15, 1922, the corporation brought suit against the company to quiet title of the former to the property involved in these transactions. It was because this suit had been filed that the bank was unable to secure from the Title Insurance & Trust Company the report required by the instructions. On June 19, 1922, the company demanded by letter that the bank close the escrow by delivering to the company the money and notes to which it was entitled under the escrow, or, if that was not possible, that the papers deposited by it with the bank be returned. On January 18, 1923, the corporation notified the company, Carlsen, and the bank of the termination of the contract referred to herein as deposit No. 1. On March 21, 1923, the bank received notice, directed to "F. C. Carlsen and to all whom it may concern," declaring with reference to the agreement dated April 21, 1922: "Whereas, the terms and conditions of said agreement have not been complied with," a forfeiture was claimed by the company; and the letter also directed that all documents executed in connection with that agreement be returned to it.

This suit resulted from the same disagreements of the parties in the transaction which also were the basis of the suit entitled Carlsen v. Security Trust & Savings Bank (a Corporation), numbered 5889, and reported in 265 P. 301. The escrow instructions here involved were construed in our decision upon the appeal of that case. We there held that the provision of the instructions calling for guaranty of title before the close of the escrow necessitated that the guaranty show the title in question to be unincumbered; that, because of the provision that no modification of the terms of the escrow could be made without "joint consent in writing subscribed by the undersigned and assented to by the bank," oral waiver by Carlsen of the requirements concerning guaranty of title was ineffectual, and hence that the bank acted within its rights in refusing his demand for delivery of the muniments of title agreed to be delivered to him under certain conditions.

The additional question is now presented as to whether or not upon these premises of facts and of law the bank was entitled to relieve its responsibility through an action in interpleader.

It is admitted by the respondent that, if the bank were not an escrow holder, it would be entitled to the relief asked by it. It is insisted, however, that the escrow holder is not a mere stakeholder, but has an interest in the transaction, and a legal duty to perform in connection therewith; further, that the bank can with perfect safety to itself determine which claimants are entitled to documents in controversy, and that under such circumstances it cannot require that the claimants interplead.

We know of no decision in this jurisdiction passing upon the exact question here presented. However, although the statement is obiter dictum, the Supreme Court of New Mexico, in Davisson v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 15 N. M. 680, 113 P. 598, indicated that, in the opinion of that court, an escrow holder may secure relief from conflicting claims against the escrow through interpleader. Referring to the bank, escrow holder in that action, it is said:

"And when it failed to secure appellant's consent, it should have held the escrow and let the parties either come to some agreement among themselves or appeal to the courts, when the appellee could have interpleaded the money into court and secured its acquittance."

That a person holding personal property in escrow and having no interest therein may require conflicting claimants to interplead is directly held in Walker v. Bamberger, 17 Utah, 239, 54 P. 108.

Section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides, in part, as follows:

"* * * And whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, or the performance of an obligation, or any portion thereof, such person may bring an action against the conflicting claimants to compel them to interplead and litigate their several claims among themselves."

[1] One objection to the right of the complainant to require the defendants to interplead in this action is the claim that the bank is so interested as to exclude it from the right to maintain this action. It is important to note that during all times involved the bank was also the holder of certain bonds and evidences of indebtedness of the corporation. It is claimed by respondent that under these circumstances the interests of the bank were such that because of this fact alone, any right to maintain interpleader which it might otherwise have had was defeated.

Upon this statement of facts, the interest which the bank had was not in the fund and muniments of title in dispute but merely an interest in a legal question, in that, if it were determined favorably to the corporation, the latter would be a better security for the payment of its debt to the bank. Such an interest does not defeat the right to interplead. Pomeroy, Equity Juris. § 51, p. 83. We know of no conflict of authority in the general acceptance of this rule.

[2] Another ground for denying an escrow holder the benefits of the remedy provided by this law would be, if in any case it appeared to be true, that the complainant in interpleader had assumed a definite and independent liability to one of the parties to the escrow. In McGinn v. Interstate National Bank, 178 Mo. App. 347, 166 S. W. 345, the reason for the rule as to independent liability defeating a right of interpleader is explained to be that, where such liability exists, a decision as to which of the conflicting claimants was right would not absolve the party asking interpleader from performing his independent contract. However, if the relations of the parties are such that the court's decision would determine the responsibility of the escrow holder, he is for the purposes, and within the scope, of the Code section authorizing interpleader a mere stakeholder.

[3] The only material difference between the escrow instructions in the present action and those involved in the cases of Davisson v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, supra, and Walker v.

Bamberger, supra, is that there is no time limit fixed by the escrow herein in which the same should be closed, while in the two cases just mentioned the escrow instructions provided for such a time limit. In some instances, the absence of such a time limit might have the effect of defeating the right of an escrow holder to institute an action in interpleader and have the rights of the parties to the escrow determined by the court. But in the present controversy we do not think that this right should be withheld from the plaintiff for that reason. The contracting parties named in the escrow agreement are in hopeless discord as to their respective rights thereunder. The defendant Carlsen has served notice on the plaintiff demanding an immediate closing of the escrow and a delivery to him of the documents to which he would be entitled were the escrow closed according to its terms. The company, the other party to the escrow, on the other hand, has served notice on the bank to deliver said documents to it, claiming that Carlsen has forfeited all his rights under his agreement with the company. While the corporation, although not a party to the escrow, but a party to the agreement between it and the company, which agreement is one of the documents held by plaintiff in escrow, has served written notice upon the plaintiff, claiming that said agreement had terminated. It had already instituted suit to quiet its title to the land described in said written agreement. This was the condition of the controversy when the plaintiff instituted this action of interpleader. There was no certainty and but little possibility that conditions might change for the better, and the obstacles, standing in the way of closing said escrow according to its terms, removed within any reasonable length of time. In the meantime the plaintiff might be harassed with litigation instituted by the several persons interested in the property held by it in escrow. Had it acted in the matter and delivered the documents held by it to either of the parties demanding the same, it would have acted at its peril, and would have been responsible had it delivered said documents, or the money held by it, to any of the parties not entitled thereto. Under these circumstances we think the plaintiff was clearly entitled to act under the terms of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It will be noticed that the Code section expressly provides that "whenever conflicting claims are or may be made upon a person for or relating to personal property, * * * such person may bring an action," etc. We know of no rule of law, and none has been called to our attention, which requires that such a person, upon whom such conflicting claims have been made, shall await some indefinite time in the future, when possibly there may be some change in the rights of those asserting their conflicting claims, before instituting the action provided for by said section of the Code, whereby he may seek a discharge from liability to all conflicting claimants. On the other hand, as we have already seen, the section of the Code under consideration gives him this right, whenever such conflicting claims have been made upon him. In fact, the Code section goes even further and gives this right to such person whenever conflicting claims "may be made" upon him.

[4] The escrow instructions in the present action contained, as we have before noted, a provision as follows:

In Carlsen v. Security National Bank, supra, it was held that this provision of the escrow was for the benefit of the bank as well as the parties thereto, and could not be waived without the assent of the bank. It follows, from this interpretation of the escrow instructions, that the bank assumed certain obligations by virtue of the provisions of said escrow instruction. These obligations were principally to pay the money and deliver the documents deposited with it to the respective parties entitled thereto whenever all the conditions of such payment and delivery had been complied with in the manner set forth in the escrow. The fact that the bank had bound itself to perform these obligations did not necessarily prevent it from availing itself of the section of the Code providing for a suit in interpleader. In general, every mere stakeholder has assumed some obligation to those interested or owning the property held by him. His obligation is to deliver the property held by him to the party entitled thereto. But, when a disagreement arises as to the ownership of said property, the holder thereof has not obligated himself to settle said disagreement and deliver the property to either of said parties in the face of conflicting claims thereto. He may do so, but, in case he does act, he does so at his peril, and, if he delivers the property to one not legally entitled thereto, the legal owner thereof may hold him responsible in damages for such wrongful delivery. No one questions the right of a mere stakeholder to avail himself of the relief afforded by section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and to institute an action in interpleader and compel the parties claiming the property held by him to litigate in such action their respective claims thereto, notwithstanding the obligation of the stakeholder to deliver the property to the rightful owner. The bank in this action stands in no different position than that of an ordinary stakeholder. It has not assumed any obligation to settle the disputes which have arisen between the parties to the escrow, and, if it should attempt to do so, and should deliver the property held by it to either of the parties not entitled thereto, the rightful owner of said property can hold the bank liable for the value of the property so wrongfully delivered. In our opinion, therefore, the provision of the escrow agreement that no rescission or modification of its terms should take place without the consent of the parties thereto, including the bank, does not deprive the bank of its right to avail itself of the remedial provisions of section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The orders appealed from are reversed.

CARLSEN v. SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (L. A. 9560.)★

Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 29, 1928.

1. Escrows ⇨6—Instruction that escrow holder have guaranty of title, showing "good and sufficient grant deed," required that marketable title be shown before completing escrow.

Provision in escrow instructions that escrow could not be completed until there was furnished "a guarantee of title showing agreement last above mentioned and assignment of same to me and a good and sufficient grant deed * * * conveying said property to me," held not to require merely a certificate showing an agreement for the sale of property and its assignment, but to require that bank, as escrow holder, have a guaranty showing ownership of property with marketable and unincumbered title on part of vendor, in suit by subvendee to recover damages from bank for failure to deliver muniments of title held in escrow.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Good and Sufficient Deed.]

2. Escrows ⇨10—Pendency of vendor's suit to quiet title held to warrant escrow holder's refusal to transfer muniments of title to subvendee, where escrow instructions required guaranty of title showing good and sufficient grant deed.

Subvendee, suing escrow holder for damages for failure to deliver muniments of title deposited in escrow, held not entitled to recover, where instructions signed by plaintiff required guaranty of title showing contract and assignment and a "good and sufficient grant deed," and where suit by vendor to quiet title to the property was pending, since instructions in effect required that marketable title be shown before completing escrow.

3. Escrows ⇨5—Escrow Instructions must be read together in determining escrow holder's liability to subvendee, where both purchase contracts were deposited in escrow.

Where original contract for sale of property and purchaser's contract with subvendee were deposited in escrow, escrow instructions must all be read together as forming an entire contract in determining liability of escrow holder for failure to deliver to subvendee muniments of title, during pendency of vendor's action to quiet title.

4. Escrows ⇨6—Attempted oral waiver by subvendee of escrow instructions, requiring marketable title and joint consent in writing to any modification of instructions, was ineffective.

Where escrow instructions, agreed on by purchaser of property, subvendee, and escrow holder, provided that no rescission or modification of terms should be effective without joint consent of parties in writing assented to by bank as escrow holder, subvendee, who made no attempt by way of execution of written waiver to waive provision in instructions to escrow holder requiring that marketable title be shown before completing escrow, was not entitled, on basis of mere oral statement, to demand closing of the escrow before marketable title was shown, though stipulation was inserted for his benefit.

5. Contracts ⇨143—Court may not redraft contract of competent parties.

It is not within the province of the court to redraft a contract which the parties have executed, where no question is raised to their contracting capacity.

6. Escrows ⇨6—Requirement that modification of escrow instructions be in writing and consented to by parties and escrow holder held reasonable.

Requirement that modification in escrow instructions be in writing, and consented to by parties and escrow holder, held reasonable requirement, which neither party could eliminate from purchase contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by F. C. Carlsen against the Security Trust & Savings Bank. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kelby & Lawson and Lester R. Godward, all of Los Angeles, Edwin V. McKenzie, of San Francisco (Samuel M. Garroway, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A petition for a hearing herein of this appeal was granted after a decision thereof by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, Second Division. It was granted mainly for the reason that a similar petition was granted on the same day in the case of Security Trust & Savings Bank v. Carlsen et al. (L. A. No. 8044), a case which arose out of the same controversy as is involved in the present action. After a further consideration of the opinion rendered in this action by the District Court of Appeal and written by Mr. Justice Craig and concurred in by the other members of said court, we are satisfied that said opinion correctly disposes of the question considered therein, and we adopt the same as the opinion of this court, which is as follows:

This is an action for damages against the respondent bank, as an escrow depository, for failure to deliver certain muniments of title admittedly deposited with it in the escrow. For purposes of brevity, the Security Trust & Savings Bank is referred to in this opinion as the bank, the Dominguez Land Corporation is termed the corporation, and the California Chemical Company is named the company.

The facts essential to a presentation of the appeal are that the corporation, as owner of certain apparently oil-bearing land, entered into an agreement to sell it to the company. In this connection an escrow was arranged with the First National Bank of Torrence. The company thereafter contracted to transfer its interest in said agreement of purchase to the plaintiff, Carlsen. In that behalf an escrow was opened with the bank, respondent herein. As is usual in such cases, escrow instruction were signed by the company and Carlsen. The dispute centers primarily on the construction to be placed upon certain parts of these instructions. After the second escrow had been opened, letters, notices, and demands, written and oral, were made by the parties herein mentioned. The instructions called for a certain guaranty of title. Soon after the escrow was begun, the corporation filed suit to quiet title against the company, and recorded a lis pendens of the same. Carlsen appeared in said last-named action, assuming to be a "John Doe" who had been made a party defendant therein. He asked affirmative relief by way of a judgment quieting his title to the premises in question. Under these circumstances, the bank did not complete the escrow, but held the documents and money which it had received, and finally, after demand therefor had been made by Carlsen, it refused to deliver to him the muniments of title which the escrow instructions, as well as the agreement with the company, contemplated that he should receive upon the close of the escrow. This stand of the bank was based upon the theory that the escrow instructions requiring that a guaranty of title be furnished to the vendee could not be complied with while the suit brought by the corporation was pending.

Many other facts are recited in the record and in the briefs, but, in view of our decision upon the two pivotal points presented, it would only tend to confuse the issues to recount such details, which we deem unessential.

[1-3] Without a waiver of certain provisions of the escrow instructions, the bank could not complete the escrow, because under such provisions it was necessary that before doing so it have "a guarantee of title showing agreement last above mentioned and assignment of same to me and a good and sufficient grant deed, executed by said California Chemical Co., conveying said property to me." The "agreement last above mentioned" is the contract between the corporation and the company, and the instruction from which we have quoted is signed by Carlsen. Appellant contends that by this provision nothing is required, except a certificate showing the agreement and its assignment. However, we think this interpretation is too narrow, and that both the language used and other stipulations in the agreement, which consist of the escrow instructions and the contract between the company and Carlsen, clearly indicate that it was the intention of the parties that the bank, as escrow holder, have in its possession a guaranty, in the sense that that term is ordinarily used, and which implies ownership of the property in question, with the title marketable and unincumbered. In the provision above quoted, that part which reads "showing agreement last above mentioned and assignment of same to me" merely indicates that the title is to be brought down to Carlsen, and not to terminate, as it often does, with a certification that the vendor has title at the time he transfers to the vendee.

That the parties understood that the vendee was to receive a definite and full title to the land, and not merely an assignment of whatever interest the company might have in it, is evidenced by the other documents involved in the transaction. In the agreement between the company and Carlsen, it is recited that the company has entered into a contract "covering the sale and purchase of certain real property," and that the company "agrees to sell" to Carlsen all of the rights of the company in and to its agreement with the corporation, and to execute the necessary assignment and deed to carry the transfer into effect, so that Carlsen should receive the deed contracted by the corporation to be delivered to the company through the escrow with the First National Bank of Torrence. These references direct us back for further explanation of the understanding of the parties to the agreement between the corporation and the company. That contract provided that the corporation should "deliver a certificate of title * * * showing title to said property to be vested in Dominguez Land Corporation free and clear of all incumbrances." When we consider that the contract from which we have last quoted was one of the documents required to be, and which was, deposited in the escrow, as was also the contract between the company and Carlsen, it is apparent that these instructions must all be read together as forming an entire contract. The corporation was required to furnish a certificate of title showing its ownership, free and clear of all incumbrances, the company contracted to transfer that same character of title to Carlsen, and his requirement in the escrow instructions with the defendant escrow holder requiring guaranty of title, etc., must be construed as calling for a certificate that the seller had title free and clear of all incumbrances, but, in addition to this, that a transfer of such title had been made to Carlsen.

[4-6] We now proceed to a consideration of the question which both appellant and respondent state to be of the most vital importance in determining this appeal, to wit, as to whether or not Carlsen waived the requirement as to guaranty of title. As we view the matter, this is not a difficult problem, nor one requiring any extended discussion. It is admitted that the only attempted waiver was an oral statement by Carlsen or his attorney. The escrow instructions agreed upon by the company, Carlsen, and the bank, and to which all are parties, provides:

Authorities cited by appellant announcing the general principle that a party to a contract may waive any provision contained within it and intended for his benefit, and also those holding such a waiver may be made orally, do not aid us in interpreting the agreement here in question. In the absence of the stipulation which we have just quoted, doubtless the vendee might have waived a direction to an escrow holder concerning the kind of guaranty required. It may be that under certain circumstances, and particularly where the modification of the contract has been acted upon by the parties, a waiver may be verbal. But here the parties have deliberately affixed their signatures to an agreement which is so clear that it has not been suggested that it can have any other meaning than that plainly expressed by it. This covenant is that there shall be no modification of the terms of the escrow instructions without joint consent in writing, subscribed by the company, by Carlsen, and also assented to by the bank. It is of no moment, and therefore we need not analyze the motive which may have actuated the parties in making this agreement. The language of this proviso clearly indicates that the escrow holder should not under any circumstances assume the burden of attempting to settle a dispute between the parties, except upon strict compliance with the letter of the instructions. However, we need not consider whether or not the requirement for a guaranty of title is one solely for the benefit of Carlsen, nor what present or future, actual or possible, interest the company or the bank might have had in such requirement. It is not within the province of the court to redraft a contract which the parties, as to whose contracting capacity no question is raised, have executed. It may be observed in passing that, in the face of such a provision in the escrow instructions, if the appellant had sincerely desired to waive the requirement as to guaranty of title, it would seem that he would at least have placed a written waiver signed by himself with the escrow holder. Had he even taken this step, he might be in a position to present the question for decision by this court as to the necessity that consent be joined in by the company and assented to by the bank; but, not having himself executed a waiver in the form required by his agreement with the other parties, he is not, and never has been, in position to demand the closing of the escrow, and this is true without regard to the necessity for the other parties joining with him in a waiver. The requirement that any modification in the escrow instructions be in writing is a perfectly reasonable one, quite obviously for the benefit of the escrow holder, and one which neither the vendor nor the vendee could eliminate from the contract.

In view of our decision upon the points discussed, it is not necessary to consider others presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

PRESTON, J. I dissent. The escrow party based its refusal to carry out the escrow solely upon the ground that the title company would not furnish the certificate the contract required to be furnished by the seller. It cannot be doubted that this provision was solely for the benefit of the purchaser Carlsen. Admittedly Carlsen repeatedly offered to waive it—not only this, but he repeatedly offered to sign and execute any kind of a release or acquittance the escrow party might see fit to require. Admittedly the purchaser performed every covenant on his part to be kept and performed under the contract, including payment to said escrow holder of every dollar of the escrow price for said property. The escrow party did not at any time complain that such waiver and offer of release was parol. This estopped it to assert that said waiver was ineffectual because it was oral.

The escrow agreement contained the following clause:

"No rescission of this escrow or modification of its terms or any notice or demand shall be of any effect without joint consent in writing, subscribed by the undersigned, and assented to by the bank."

A literal interpretation of this paragraph is made the basis of the conclusion announced in the majority opinion. It may well be doubted whether a waiver by one party to a contract of a covenant made expressly and solely for his benefit is indeed a modification of the terms of an escrow. To say that a paragraph such as this is binding literally upon the escrow holder is to say that the escrow agreement has no efficacy whatsoever. Under such a construction one of the parties to the contract could be the escrow holder. Indeed, under this construction one party to a contract could by his own willful act defeat the performance on his part of his own solemn covenant.

The necessary deduction from the majority opinion is a principle similar to the case where a debtor gave his creditor a promissory note payable when convenient, with the proviso that, if not so paid, the note was to be null and void.

I can see no substance whatever in the material used in making up the conclusion of the court in this case. The question is important, and an erroneous pronouncement will be far-reaching in its ill effects.

The judgment of the court below should be reversed.

sums, held not entitled to avoid liability for fees of attorney employed by the secretary in perfecting sale of the debtor bank, which resulted in avoiding insolvency and in payment of considerable part of creditor bank's claim, on ground that services were for benefit of directors ratifying transaction, some of whom owned majority stock of debtor bank.

3. Banks and banking ⇨119—Bank owes duty to depositors to recover fund loaned, though loan was illegal.

Fact that moneys of bank may have been loaned contrary to law, or that liability therefor might be shifted on directors individually, does not affect duty of bank to its depositors to recover the funds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by M. E. Burns against the Valley Bank of Fresno and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Carl E. Lindsay and Lindsay & Gearhart, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Youngworth, McClean & Hartman and Harry J. McClean, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This action was brought in the court below by the respondent as assignee of Leo V. Youngworth, attorney at law, to recover the sum of $1,500 for legal services alleged to have been rendered the defendants at their special instance and request between January 1, 1924, and February 8 of the same year. At the trial the action was dismissed as to the defendant W. D. Mitchell, and the case proceeded as against Valley Bank, appellant. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against defendant Valley Bank for the full amount prayed. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and the present appeal is from the judgment.

The only question presented is as to whether the appellant Valley Bank employed Mr. Youngworth to render the services performed by him. Appellant makes no contention as to the rendering of the services, or that their value was not as found, but insists that the services were not rendered to the appellant. A brief synopsis of the facts becomes necessary to illustrate the contentions made.

In January, 1924, the Valley Bank was a corporation duly engaged in the business of general banking pursuant to the laws of this state. W. D. Mitchell was the president of the bank, duly elected as such, and in actual discharge of the general duties pertaining to his office. The by-laws of the corporation provided:

"The president shall take charge of the moneys, funds and other property of the corpora-

BURNS v. VALLEY BANK OF FRESNO et al. (Civ. 6343.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 8, 1928.

1. Banks and banking ⇨105(1/2)—Employment of attorney by secretary appointed by bank president to work out condition of debtor bank held authorized, permitting recovery against creditor bank of attorney's fees.

Where president of bank had general authority to direct and manage its affairs, president's employment of secretary to work out difficulties of debtor bank and recover claim and secretary's employment of attorney to perfect sale of debtor bank held authorized, rendering creditor bank liable for attorney's fees, where the executive committee of the board of directors approved the appointment of the secretary and the directors ratified the entire transaction, and as a result thereof the bank recovered a large part of its indebtedness.

2. Banks and banking ⇨105(1/2)—Bank employing secretary to safeguard its claim against debtor bank was liable for fees of secretary's attorney, though some of its directors controlled debtor bank.

Bank, whose president with approval of executive committee employed secretary to investigate account of solvency and business management of another bank which owed it large tion and be the acting managing agent of the corporation, subject at all times to the by-laws and orders of the board of directors."

Likewise the by-laws of the corporation provided:

"The board of directors shall appoint from their number an executive committee constituted of five members, including the president, for the transaction of such business of the corporation as may require their attention between the meetings of the board of directors of this corporation; and all business transacted by such committee shall be submitted to and be approved by the board of directors at their next regular meeting if required; and this committee shall constitute a standing committee of the corporation, a majority of which may sit in the absence of the regular or special meeting of the committee and have the power and authority herein conferred by the board of directors."

In the latter part of September, 1923, it developed that a certain banking institution in the city of Bakersfield, which will hereinafter be referred to as the Bakersfield Bank, had become indebted to the Valley Bank in a large sum of money. This sum is fixed at something between $60,000 and $90,000. This loan was of doubtful collectibility, and it is agreed herein that the chances of recovery thereof were quite speculative and doubtful to an extreme. The president of the bank, Mitchell, with the full knowledge and approval of the executive committee, employed one T. S. Saunders, whose position was termed "confidential secretary to the president of Valley Bank," and whose duties embraced an investigation of the account and of the solvency and business management of the Bakersfield Bank. The primary purpose apparent in the employment of Saunders was to work out the destiny of the Bakersfield Bank with the motive of recovering for the Valley Bank the sums loaned, it being obvious that a failure or insolvency of the Bakersfield institution would involve a heavy loss upon the Valley Bank. Accordingly Saunders set about the work. It is unnecessary to detail the various steps in his investigation or the reports and suggestions following. The fact was that the fear concerning the recovery of the loan was not without foundation. For a time it was planned that possibly the Valley Bank might take over the Bakersfield Bank. However, in the course of rehabilitation it developed that certain interests in Los Angeles were seeking a bank opening in Bakersfield. Thereupon Saunders, in the employ of the Valley Bank and under directions from Mitchell and the executive committee, undertook the working out of the details incident to a sale of the Bakersfield Bank. Saunders was instructed and authorized to employ counsel in this regard, the counsel not being designated, but to be some Los Angeles attorney. Accordingly Saunders employed Mr. Youngworth, and the latter performed all legal services necessary to carry out the sale. As a result of the sale the Bakersfield Bank was put upon a sound footing, and a part of the agreement was that the indebtedness due the Valley Bank should be paid and discharged. Here it may be observed that the written evidences of the transaction do not contain this agreement; nevertheless, the direct testimony offered does support this statement. It appears also from the record before us that some of the directors of Valley Bank owned a majority of the stock of the Bakersfield Bank, and that the sale of the latter institution necessarily was of direct benefit to these directors. It does not appear that Mitchell, president, owned any Bakersfield stock; the contrary is the fact. It is not in evidence just how many of the directors were thus interested. There is evidence sufficient to support the conclusion that the board of directors knew of the entire transaction, the employment of Saunders and the directions given him. There is direct evidence that while the negotiations with the prospective purchasers of the Bakersfield Bank were yet unfinished, the board of directors decided to cancel the employment and disavow the obligation of Saunders' salary; that Saunders, upon being notified of this act, told the directors to go ahead and finish the work themselves, whereupon the board informally reconvened and then instructed Saunders to proceed and he would be paid. Saunders, pursuant to his instructions, as mentioned, employed Mr. Youngworth to assist in the legal details, and the latter performed services stipulated to be reasonably worth the sum claimed.

[1] The contention of appellant here is that the president had no authority, express or implied, to engage an attorney; that the services rendered were for the benefit of the directors as individuals; and that, if it should be held that appellant is in error in these contentions, then finally it is urged that the whole transaction was ultra vires as concerns the corporation, and as to it no liability could arise therefrom. In support of the first argument appellant relies upon two California cases, viz. Pacific Bank v. Stone, 121 Cal. 202, 53 P. 634, and Campbell v. Hanford, 67 Cal. App. 155, 227 P. 234.

A careful analysis of these cases will disclose that they do not support appellant in its conclusions here. In each of them the background of fact differed entirely from that presented here. The facts of the instant case bring it well within all of the exceptions mentioned in the decided cases. There is ample evidence in the record to show that the president of the Valley Bank had general authority to direct and manage the affairs of the bank; that the executive committee was a standing committee of the board of directors to transact such business of the corporation as might require their attention between meetings of the directors; that the directors themselves, both personally and as a body, ratified and approved the action taken, and likewise the fact that the transaction recovered and restored to the bank a large sum of money, the recovery of which may reasonably be said to have been doubtful in the absence of this action. This showing brings the case well within such authorities as those cited, and the judgment of the court below is supported by the following cases: Bartlett Estate Co. v. Fraser, 11 Cal. App. 373, 105 P. 130; Countryman v. Cal. Trona Co., 35 Cal. App. 728, 170 P. 1069; Brown v. Crown Gold Mining Co., 150 Cal. 376, 387, 89 P. 86; Jan Wai v. Smith-Riddell Co., 55 Cal. App. 59, 202 P. 952; Ellet v. Los Altos Club (Cal. App.) 264 P. 270; Capitol Woolen Co. v. Berger (Cal. App.) 262 P. 351. A further citation of authority is needless.

[2, 3] It is next contended that, because a majority of the Bakersfield Bank stock was owned by directors of the Valley Bank, the employment of Saunders and Youngworth was by the directors personally and for their benefit. The record does not disclose that a majority, or even a comparatively large number of directors were interested. It does show that the president had not the slightest personal interest. The argument of appellant in this connection would in any event show a complete knowledge by the directors, and both an authorization and ratification. Further, if all of the directors were interested stockholders in Bakersfield Bank, and had permitted the funds of Valley Bank to be loaned without security or collateral of any sort, it would make more compelling their duty to the Valley Bank to have those funds recovered. The fact that the moneys of the Valley Bank had been loaned contrary to law, or that a liability might be fastened upon the directors individually, would not lessen the interest that the Valley Bank itself had in the recovery of the funds. First and foremost was the Valley Bank's duty to its depositors; and because some of the directors may have technically assumed a double position this duty was not shifted.

Lastly appellant contends that, inasmuch as the entire transaction was one whereby the Valley Bank purchased shares of another banking corporation contrary to the provisions of the Bank Act, then it was an ultra vires and void contract. This contention is based upon an hypothesis wherein the major premise is unfounded. The argument is supposititious and proceeds thus: "If the transaction was one whereby the Valley Bank was purchasing the stock of Bakersfield Bank," etc. Nothing in the record before us justifies the supposition.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 173(10)—Contention that claim against estate is stale should be presented at trial rather than on appeal.

Contention that claim against estate of decedent is stale should be presented to trial court rather than to appellate court.

2. Executors and administrators $\S$ 437(2)—That claim against estate for services, rejected by administrator, was on its face barred, held not to preclude claimant's enforcement thereof on showing agreed date of payment was within statutory period (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 339, subd. 1; $\S$ 1499).

Fact that claim for services as presented to administrator showed on its face that it was barred by statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 339, subd. 1), and fact that administrator consequently disallowed the claim as required by section 1499, held not to prevent claimant in suit on the claim from showing time of payment for the services was subsequent to the date on which they were rendered, taking the claim out of the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Caroline Cavanaugh against Charles F. Cavanaugh, as administrator of the estate of William L. Cavanaugh, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John Anthony McGee, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. This is an action in a claim against the estate of William L. Cavanaugh after rejection by the administrator.

The claim presented to the administrator was as follows:

"For services rendered William L. Cavanaugh, deceased, during his lifetime, for which he agreed to pay the reasonable and market value thereof, consisting of continuous day and night nursing and taking care of said decedent and other incidental work, labor, and services made necessary by the illness of said decedent for a period of sixty-eight (68) weeks from June 24, 1922, to October 15, 1923, at twenty dollars ($20.00) per week, $1,360.00."

It is admitted that the claim was presented within the time required by statute, and that, after rejection, action was commenced within the period prescribed.

William L. Cavanaugh died on or about October 3, 1925, and appellant was appointed administrator on October 5, 1925, and thereafter as such administrator caused notice to be given to creditors in the usual way. The claim, as hereinbefore noted, was rejected; hence the present action.

In plaintiff's complaint herein she sets forth exactly the same demand as contained in the rejected claim. However to the complaint is added this statement:

"That during the lifetime of said William L. Cavanaugh no part of said sum was paid, and on and after the 16th day of October the entire amount and value of said services was the sum of $1,360.00, and that upon said last-mentioned date the entire amount above named, to wit, the sum of $1,360.00 became and was due, owing, and unpaid from William L. Cavanaugh to plaintiff."

Defendant administrator in his answer denied the rendition of service, and denied the fact of nonpayment, and likewise denied the value of said services claimed to have been rendered. As a separate defense, defendant set up the statute of limitations, section 339, subd. 1, Code of Civil Procedure, this defense going to the claim as a whole and specifically to that portion thereof accruing prior to October 1, 1923.

At the trial plaintiff was permitted to amend her complaint, in conformity with proof offered, to allege that decedent, William L. Cavanaugh, promised to pay for the services as soon as he could sell certain real estate owned by him and that said real estate was sold on January 2, 1924. The trial court found in favor of plaintiff on all of the issues tendered, and judgment followed for the full amount claimed. Defendant administrator presents this appeal.

[1] Appellant at the outset relies on the familiar principle of law that courts do not look with favor upon stale claims, particularly when urged against the estate of a decedent debtor. Conceding the strength of the rule, yet this is a contention that is more proper to present to the trial court. And the scope of our inquiry here differs but little from other cases. We find in the record sufficient evidence to sustain the trial court's findings, and we do not attempt to determine anew the conflict of testimony as urged, nor do we attempt to draw new conclusions from the apparent shiftings of position on the part of respondent.

[2] Appellant next contends that the cause of action in the complaint was and is based upon a claim different and distinct from the claim presented to the administrator and rejected. It is conceded that the original claim as presented, and the complaint filed and judgment entered, each and all concern but one demand, namely, services rendered to the decedent over a period of 68 weeks from June 24, 1922, to October 15, 1923, at a price of $20 per week. But appellant contends that the original claim as presented merely set forth the nature of the services and the time of rendition, and was on its face an outlawed claim, and that the administrator had no power to allow it. It may be conceded that the claim as presented was on its face barred by the statute of limitations. Corato v. Estate of Corato, 201 Cal. 155, 255 P. 825; Estate of Steuer, 77 Cal. App. 584, 247 P. 211. Section 1499, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that no claim must be allowed by the administrator which is barred by the statute of limitations. Therefore the action of the administrator here in rejecting the claim was not improper or unwarranted. However, a mere rejection by the administrator does not conclude the claimant's rights. Upon action brought, the claimant, urging the same claim, may offer any legal evidence in support thereof. It is appellant's contention that, when a claim is presented against an estate of a decedent, the demand should show affirmatively the time when payment was due, and that where, as here, any special time of payment has been agreed upon whereby a different period of limitation would apply, then the demand should show on its face the supplemental agreement. Concretely appellant argues that, when plaintiff filed her claim with the administrator, she set forth services rendered covering a period between June, 1922, and October, 1923, without any statement as to promise to pay, and that the law would presume the employment as one from month to month, with each month's service payable when performed (Corato v. Estate of Corato, supra); that, when plaintiff alleged a cause of action based upon the same services and alleging a promise to pay, which promise or agreement did not appear on the presented claim, she thereby sought to enforce a demand that had never been presented for allowance to the administrator.

It is unnecessary to follow the contention throughout all of its phases. In some ways it seems quite persuasive, and serves to convince us that it would be a much better practice to set out in a claim to an administrator all of the details concerning time of payment and conditions thereof to a legal nicety. Yet the fact remains that in a vast majority of cases a claimant creditor has not the ability to determine all of the legal formulæ nor the advantage of counsel. In Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 174 P. 305, the court says:

"The same rules announced by the court in overruling appellant's various attacks upon the complaint as amended [referring to the liberality of the law in permitting amendments to pleadings where the cause of action remains unchanged] apply with greater force to the refusal to hold that there was a fatal difference between the creditor's claim as filed and the one upon which suit was brought, because the courts go further in upholding such demands against estates than in sustaining pleadings. * * * The purpose of presenting such a demand" to the administrator is to advise him "of its nature, and there is no requirement that it shall state the facts with all the detail necessary in a complaint nor is its sufficiency to be tested by the rules of pleading."

See Pollitz v. Wickersham, 150 Cal. 238, 88 P. 911; Elizalde v. Murphy, 163 Cal. 681, 126 P. 978; Enscoe v. Fletcher, 1 Cal. App. 659, 82 P. 1075; Doolittle v. McConnell, 178 Cal. 697, 174 P. 305; Thompson v. Koeller, 183 Cal. 476, 191 P. 927.

In Thompson v. Koeller, 183 Cal. 476, 191 P. 927, the plaintiff had presented a claim to the administrator of an estate upon a certain promissory note. The claim did not specify that the note had been given as security, and did not set forth the notes for which it was security. Upon a trial after rejection of the claim, the administrator showed that the note upon which the creditor's claim rested was given as security for the payment of notes of third persons. The trial court then permitted plaintiff to show that these third party notes had never been paid, and that default had been made therein in an amount greater than the note of decedent, and thereupon the trial court gave judgment for plaintiff. The contention on appeal was that there was, under the facts, an insufficient claim presented to support the demand as shown. The court, in an exhaustive review of authorities, summarizes the law to be as hereinbefore indicated. The general rules laid down may be stated: The claim should sufficiently indicate the nature and amount of the demand to enable the executor and judge to act advisedly upon it. A sufficient compliance with the law is made when the claim presented shows the nature of the claim, the circumstances out of which it grew and its approximate amount, which manifestly is all that can be stated. In the instant case, in the claim presented and in the pleadings plaintiff urged but one demand, namely, payment for services rendered. From the outset plaintiff claimed that she had rendered personal services, nursing, and care from June, 1922, to October, 1923. At no stage of the proceedings is this claim changed or altered. Her claim has for its sole foundation these services rendered. The rejection of the claim and the setting up of the bar of the statute does not change matters. In practice much hardship would result from upholding defendant's contention here. Suppose a case where a creditor presented a claim arising from services or upon any obligation, which claim had accrued

10 years prior to the death of the debtor; that this claim was presented along towards the close of the period during which claims could be presented and was rejected. Thereafter, within the statutory period, suit was commenced and plaintiff was able to show that for 9 years of the time following the accrual of the claim decedent had been continuously without the state. Both reason and justice compel the conclusion that such a showing could be made in support of the demand without changing the nature thereof. The requirements of the law are statutory, and no doubt designed to work out some proper system and order in the administration of the estates of deceased persons; but no rule of expediency, statutory or otherwise, should impinge upon the judicial power of the state as vested by the Constitution. Whatever apparent irregularity there may have been in the details of the claim here the estate was allowed and had its day in court and a full, fair, and complete hearing on the merits of the claim. Plaintiff recovered for exactly the same services set out in her claim, and it was proper for the trial court to determine, even after the conclusion of the administrator, whether or not the bar of the statute prevented enforcement of the claim.

Appellant has, as hereinbefore indicated, questioned the sufficiency of the evidence as a whole. In none of the briefs does the evidence or any transcript thereof appear. No appendix or appendices accompany the briefs. The contention of appellant on this score is purely argumentative. He contends that, because no agreement of payment was in the presented claim and that a change appears in the pleadings whereby different grounds of recovery are urged, thereby a cloud of suspicion is thrown over the entire transaction. We have examined the transcript carefully and find no support for appellant's contention. As to his general argument concerning the so-called suspicious circumstances, we see nothing warranting our interference with the trial court's judgment.

On the point that a promise to pay may be contingent and the statute of limitations running only from the happening of the event mentioned, see Van Buskirk v. Kuhns, 164 Cal. 472, 129 P. 587, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 710, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 932, and note.

Judgment and order denying new trial are affirmed.

2. Criminal law ⇨1159(2)—Appellate court cannot disturb jury's verdict where there is sufficient evidence for jury to find that defendant committed acts as charged in information.

There being sufficient evidence for jury to find that defendant committed acts as charged in information, appellate court cannot interfere with jury's verdict.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⇨236(19)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of unlawful possession and unlawful operation of still (St. 1927, p. 497).

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction, under St. 1927, p. 497 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1927, Act 3795), of unlawful possession and unlawful operation of still.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Chas. L. Allison, Judge.

F. E. Clemett was convicted of the unlawful possession and the unlawful operation of a still, and he appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., George H. Johnson, Dist. Atty., of San Bernardino, and James L. King, of San Bernardino, Deputy Dist. Atty., for the People.

YORK, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction and from an order denying motion for a new trial.

The defendant was convicted on two counts of an information, the first count charging the unlawful possession of a still designed for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes, and the second count charging defendant with the unlawful operation of a still, or a stilling device designed for the manufacture of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes.

[1] The record of the evidence is somewhat complicated by reason of the fact that there were originally several defendants, the defendant, F. E. Clemett, being the only party convicted. There was sufficient evidence for the jury to find the defendant, Clemett, guilty for a violation of both counts of the complaint. As we read the act (Stats. 1927, p. 497; Act 3795, Deering's Gen. Laws), it is clear that although a person might be charged under said act with one offense only, as suggested by the appellant's opening brief, the evidence in this case shows circumstances from which the jury could find that the defendant was in the unlawful possession of a still as charged in the first count, and there is also sufficient circumstantial evidence to support the finding of the jury that the defendant was guilty of the unlawful operation of the still as charged in the second count; therefore two separate offenses under said act were, in the instant case, both alleged and proven.

A similar question—that is that one offense only could be charged under said act, no matter how many different provisions thereof were alleged and proven to have been violated—was attempted to be raised by the petitioner in the matter of the application of Louis Chaus for a writ of habeas corpus, determined in the Second Appellate District, Division 2, June 2, 1928, reported in 268 P. 422. The cases therein cited seem to amply sustain the order of the court in that matter in discharging the writ and remanding the petitioner.

[2, 3] As to the sufficiency of the evidence, it is true that it is circumstantial, but as there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that the defendant committed the acts as charged in the information, this court cannot therefore interfere with such verdict. There is evidence in the record showing that the premises on which the still was located and operated was leased by defendant, Clemett, under the name of G. L. Johnson; that he signed such fictitious name thereto; and that he claimed to be a brother of the man who accompanied him when he first introduced himself as G. L. Johnson to the owner of the premises. When on the stand, defendant, Clemett, denied that he had ever given his own name as G. L. Johnson, and swore positively that he had not signed the lease, but that the lease was signed by the man who accompanied him. There is evidence in the record that the defendant, Clemett, stated that he wanted to raise chickens on the property, and that he had approximately 750 chickens to place on the property at once. But there is also in the record evidence that there were but few chickens ever on the premises during his tenancy.

In his evidence defendant admitted having been upon the premises several times during the time when the evidence shows that the still must have been installed and in operation. The still was warm when the place was raided, and a large amount of alcohol and mash and equipment for the marketing and preparing of illicit liquor was found upon the place. The premises were evidently used only to operate a still, and there was evidence that machines were constantly going and coming to and from the place during the tenancy of appellant.

Defendant denied that a picture of his wife was that of a woman whom he had introduced as Miss Frederickson, when he had introduced her as the purchaser of the premises. This picture was positively identified by several witnesses as being a picture of the woman he had introduced to them as Miss Frederickson. Throughout the testimony of defendant, Clemett, he made contradictory statements, and his testimony in reference to a check for $1,000 which was made out to G. L. Johnson, which he admitted having indorsed with the name of G. L. Johnson and deposited in a bank to the credit of G. L. Johnson, and his statement that thereafter he drew a check on that account and signed the name of G. L. Johnson, was sufficient, when considered with the facts in evidence, for the jury to scan with more than mere suspicion his entire connection with the matter.

The still, under the evidence, must have been installed during his tenancy. The record shows that during the term of the lease, Clemett, under the name of G. L. Johnson, paid rent from time to time during the time the still must have been in operation; that he stated to the owner of the land that he wanted to keep the land during this time, and that he wanted to purchase the land, as he was satisfied with it; but later he stated that the purchaser was a woman whom he stated was Miss Frederickson, but who was identified by several witnesses as being the woman whose picture was admitted by the defendant, Clemett, to have been a photograph of his wife. And this woman, who was identified as being his wife, was seen frequently on the premises during the time when the still, according to the evidence, must have been operated. His entire testimony is given in an indirect, insincere manner, and the circumstances related by him are very unusual. His testimony that he received $500 from the mysterious man who, he said, signed a lease of the property for only $25 per month, as G. L. Johnson, for no services rendered, except securing said lease, is also a circumstance that the jury could take into consideration as evidence that he was directly connected with the ownership and operation of the still. His constant reference to this man Johnson as his brother is also a peculiar circumstance. He stated that he introduced him merely as Brother Johnson, but this is positively denied by several witnesses. His testimony in reference to the escrow and matters preceding the escrow, the way in which the money was handled that went into the escrow, are circumstances which, when taken with the whole evidence in the matter, were strong enough for the jury to find that he was still handling the property and that he had possession of the still and was also operating the same.

We find no substantial error in the record as to any ruling of the trial court, and the instructions given to the jury fully cover the law of the case. No error has been called to our attention by appellant. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; HOUSER, J.

DYER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6174.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 8, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 5, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Pleading ⇨237(1) — When evidence shows party entitled to relief except for defect in pleading, amendment should be allowed to make pleadings conform to proof.

Generally, when evidence shows that one of parties to action is entitled to relief except for defect in pleadings, amendment should be allowed or directed by court in order to make pleadings conform to facts proven.

2. Pleading ⇨236(5)—Court's power to allow amendment to pleading to conform to proof is to be exercised in its sound discretion.

Power of court to allow amendment to pleadings to conform to proof is to be exercised in its sound discretion.

3. Pleading ⇨237(1)—Facts occurring subsequent to filing complaint, if before court, may be made basis for amended or supplemental pleadings to conform to proof.

Facts occurring subsequent to filing of original complaint may be made basis of amendment or supplement to pleadings as well as facts occurring before, if facts were before court, so as to make pleadings conform to proof.

4. Religious societies ⇨11—Constitution of Congregational church reciting "organic" relation with association of Congregational churches showed purpose was to enter into such relationship.

Under the constitution of Congregational church reciting that "its organic relation is with association of Congregational churches," the word "organic" was intended to signify that essence of organization or purpose for which it was brought into existence was relationship with other Congregational churches.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Organic.]

5. Religious societies ⇨11—Constitution of Congregational church reciting organic relationship with other Congregational churches and independence of individual church held not conflicting nor preventing such relationship.

Constitution of Congregational church reciting its organic relation with other Congregational churches, and provision that particular church shall not be subject to control of any other ecclesiastical body, must be construed in harmony, and did not show that essence of organization was not to enter into relationship with other Congregational churches, since self-government of individual church was feature of Congregationalism.

6. Religious societies ⚡14—Superior court had jurisdiction to construe constitution of Congregational church and determine whether association of churches had withdrawn fellowship from pastor sought to be ousted.

In controversy seeking to restrain pastor from occupying pulpit and to terminate contract of employment by Congregational church, superior court had jurisdiction to construe provisions of constitution of Congregational church, reciting its organic relationship with Congregational associations, and to determine that association of Congregational churches had withdrawn its fellowship from pastor, and effect of such action on pastor seeking to prevent court from taking further action.

7. Evidence ⚡51, 508—Court in construing constitution of Congregational church and action of association could consider expert testimony and consult standard authorities (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 8).

Superior court in construing constitution of Congregational church and in determining whether association of Congregational churches had withdrawn fellowship from pastor sought to be ousted, had power to consider expert testimony and consult standard works of authority on subject, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, subd. 8.

8. Religious societies ⚡14—Superior court had jurisdiction to determine whether person deprived of fellowship of association of Congregational churches could act as pastor of one unit of association.

Superior court having jurisdiction to determine what ecclesiastical tribunal decided has jurisdiction to determine whether person deprived of fellowship with Los Angeles association of churches and ministers can claim to act as pastor of one of units constituting Los Angeles association.

9. Religious societies ⚡24—Superior court could determine separation from church by pastor organizing new denominational church, and declare property of church under control of loyal members.

Where complaint to oust pastor from Congregational church alleged that pastor organized a new superdenominational church not Congregational church, and was conducting services for new church in edifice of Congregational church, superior court had jurisdiction to determine as fact the separation of churches, and, after determining separation, to declare that pastor had forsaken pastorate and that property of church was under control of members who remained loyal thereto.

THOMPSON, J. Every one who has had occasion to study the nature and character of the controversy which gives rise to the present proceeding must regret that it ever reached the civil courts. Dissensions among members of a religious body are first to be deplored, but it is more distressing to realize that the sensibilities have been so far excited that means have not been found within the ecclesiastical domain to bring about an amicable adjustment of the disputes. Such, however, is the nature of the judicial calling that although we may be grieved by the consciousness that a body of Christians have been so agitated as to reach to the secular courts for relief from their distress, yet the approach to the problems presented must be with the hope that the principles of justice when applied to the situation cannot fail to be of some benefit to those involved in pointing the way out of the present difficulties.

There are pending in the respondent court two actions, the one entitled W. F. Flidner et al. v. Mark A. Pierce et al., wherein it is sought by the plaintiffs to have it adjudged that they are the trustees of the Wilshire Boulevard Congregational Church, and that the defendants who claim to have been elected trustees at a special meeting of the church are not in fact trustees, and to enjoin the defendants from acting as trustees or controlling or attempting to control the affairs of the church. The other action, entitled the Wilshire Boulevard Congregational Church of Los Angeles, a Corporation, v. Frank Dyer, seeks to have it adjudged that the contract of employment of the defendant as pastor of the church has been canceled, or in lieu of such a decree that it be canceled, and to restrain the defendant from occupying the pulpit or acting as pastor of the plaintiff church. We are primarily concerned with the second action, which may from time to time, for the purpose of convenience in this opinion, be referred to as the Dyer action to distinguish it from what may be called, for like purposes, the trustees' action. The Dyer action seeks the relief already mentioned upon the allegations in the complaint that the plaintiff, acting through its board of trustees, did on January 23, 1928, cancel and terminate the contract by which defendant was employed as its pastor for a term of ten years commencing July 28, 1925, at a salary of not less than $7,500 per annum. Annexed to the complaint is a copy of the constitution of the church, wherein it is said in article IV, under the title of government, as follows:

"Its government is vested in the body of believers who compose it.

"It is subject to the control of no other ecclesiastical body, but it recognizes and sustains the obligation of mutual counsel and co-operation which are common among Congregational churches.

"Its organic relation is with the Los Angeles Association of Congregational Churches and the Congregational Conference of Southern California and the National Council of Congregational Churches, and it recognizes its fellowship with all churches which acknowledge Jesus the Christ to be their divine Redeemer and Lord."

It is provided also in article VI of the constitution that the officers of the church shall be "a pastor, deacons, deaconesses, trustees, clerk, financial secretary, treasurer, benevolent treasurer, and Sunday school superintendent," who shall be elected by ballot. Section 2 of this same article says:

"The pastor shall be chosen at a regular meeting called for the purpose by written notice from the pulpit at least one Sunday before such meeting is held, and such choice must receive the votes of at least two-thirds of all the members present at said meeting.

"As soon after settlement as possible, he shall become a member of this church and shall be installed by ecclesiastical council when the church and pastor so agree.

"He shall have control of the pulpit, shall ordinarily preside at the meetings of the church, and perform the duties attaching to his office."

The power of the trustees is defined in section 7 of the same article in these words:

"The trustees shall have the care of the place of worship but shall have no power to buy, sell, mortgage, lease or transfer any property without specific vote of the church, authorizing such action.

"They shall provide, under the direction of the church, for the raising of money for its support, shall have general charge of its finances other than moneys contributed at the Lord's Supper, or for any charitable or benevolent objects, shall authorize and direct the treasurer as to the payment of moneys under their control, and shall provide for the proper auditing of his accounts."

The complaint in the Dyer action also alleges as a reason for its termination of the contract of employment, or as a reason for its termination by the court, various incidents of asserted misconduct on the part of the defendant, consisting of undue familiarity with women and of a domineering and autocratic attitude assumed by him in church affairs and toward various of the members of the church.

This proceeding is instituted for the purpose of prohibiting the respondent court from taking any action in either of the causes there pending; but, as we have stated, we are especially interested in the Dyer action for the reason that the order for the alternative writ was limited to that action, except that it did prevent the court from entering a judgment affecting the pastorate or pastoral relations of the church. The return to the writ denies that the petitioner is a Congregational minister, and alleges that by action of the Los Angeles Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers on June 7, 1928, the fellowship of that association was withdrawn from him. There is included in the return an amendment and supplement to the complaint in the Dyer suit in which this action is alleged and the decision withdrawing fellowship from the petitioner is final. It also alleges that during June, 1928, the defendant organized a new superdenominational church, not a Congregational church, and is conducting services for the new church in the edifice of the plaintiff. The return also shows in response to an allegation in the petition that the judge of the respondent court had announced his intention to render judgment against the defendants in both of the actions that he did so announce and that he had prepared findings, a copy of which are set forth in the return, and in which the allegations of the supplement to the complaint of plaintiff are found to be true as well as the allegations to which we have made reference in the complaint itself.

[1-3] The first question presented for settlement concerns the right of the court to permit the amendment and supplement to the complaint for the purpose, which is stated therein, of conforming to the proof. In our consideration of this phase of the case it should be noted that we are not concerned with whether the court erred in permitting the amendment and supplement to be filed, but whether it had the power to grant the request. It is the general rule for which there is an abundance of authority that when the evidence shows that one of the parties to the action is entitled to relief except for a defect in the pleadings an amendment should be allowed or directed by the court in order to make the pleadings conform to the facts proven. Indicative of the extent of the power of the court in this regard is the case of McClure v. Alberti, 190 Cal. 348, 212 P. 204, wherein it is said:

"After the evidence was closed, but before decision, the trial court permitted the respondent to amend her third amended complaint and her amended answer to the second amended cross-complaint of the appellants by setting up the mutual abandonment of the written agreement by the parties—the allegation theretofore having been merely that the parties 'entered into an oral agreement in alteration of said written agreement.' Appellants sought to demur and to answer to respondent's pleadings as amended, claiming that a new cause of action and a new defense were set up. The demurrers and the answer were stricken from the files. Appellants were not prejudiced by this action. As we read the record, the amendment, in effect, was merely one to conform to the proofs. Assuming that an additional issue was tendered by the amendment, we cannot see how the testimony in the case could have been different from that already introduced. All the facts were before the court, and its findings conclusively establish the liability of the appellants, irrespective of whether the issue was one of an alteration of the written contract or its entire abandonment, and the substitution of the oral agreement."

Undoubtedly also the power of the court is to be exercised in its sound discretion. 21 Cal. Jur. 143. It is obvious from this brief statement of the law anent the subject of amendments to conform to the proof that in this character of a proceeding where we are not possessed of a record of the testimony and where we are inquiring, not into errors of law, but rather into a threatened excess of jurisdiction, that we must unequivocally assert the power of the court to direct or allow the amendment here permitted. We can see no reason why facts occurring subsequent to the filing of the original complaint should not be made the basis of an amendment or supplement as well as those occurring before, if they were (and it must be so presumed) actually before the court. It is patent that had the plaintiff sought leave to file a supplemental complaint before the introduction of the testimony and for the purpose of having it introduced, the court with propriety could have made an order permitting it to be filed. In like manner the evidence having been admitted, the court could properly allow or direct the pleadings to be so changed as to conform to the proof made. This then, brings us to the question of whether the respondent court has jurisdiction to file the findings and judgment in conformity therewith, which, as we have noticed, corresponds to the amendment and supplement to the complaint.

We shall assume, although it is not necessary to decide, that the board of directors of the church, under the Constitution as drafted and adopted, had no authority to dispense with the services of a pastor elected by the congregation, and we shall likewise assume that the civil courts have no power to determine what conduct is sufficiently unbecoming a pastor to warrant his removal from the clerical office. We indulge these presumptions without attempting to discuss or formulate a decision thereon, because the opinion we now entertain of the proceedings renders it unnecessary to determine the questions, and yet we would leave no room for a reader to infer subsequently that we entertain an opinion that in the administration of ecclesiastical discipline the civil courts have a right to interfere.

The constitution of the Wilshire Boulevard Congregational Church, as already stated, recites that:

"Its organic relation is with the Los Angeles Association of Congregational Churches and the Congregational Conference of Southern California, and the National Council of Congregational churches. * * *"

[4] In attempting to define its alliance with the Los Angeles Association of Congregational Churches, etc., we have recourse to the generally accepted meaning of the word "organic" in the domain of jurisprudence, it being here employed in the constitution of the church adopted by its members for their own guidance and government. In this sense when we speak of organic law we generally refer to the fundamental law or Constitution of the state or nation. 3 Bouv. Law Dict. p. 2426. One of the definitions we find in Webster's New International Dictionary is as follows: "Pertaining to, or inherent in, a certain organization; depending upon the constitution or structure; not secondary or accidental." And the same lexicographers say of organic law: "Designating, or pertaining to, the law or laws by virtue of which a government or organization exists as such; designating the laws incorporated or involved in the organization of a state, political organism, other organized association; fundamental." We conclude from these definitions that when the members of this church wrote the quoted portion of their constitution they intended to say that it was the very essence of the organization's being—that purpose for which it was brought into existence—that it enter into relationship with the other Congregational churches and associations; that the church was one of the units constituting the whole structure of Congregationalism in the nation and as such subjected itself to the customs, usages and laws of the denomination as a whole. In such a sense we can with propriety say of a state of the union that it is in organic relation with the other states of the United States, all of which, as so interrelated, constitute a nation.

[5] However, the above definition of "organic relations" is not sufficiently complete for our purposes for the reason that the same article says: "Its government is vested in the body of believers who compose it." "It is subject to the control of no other ecclesiastical body, but it recognizes and sustains the obligation of mutual counsel and co-operation which are common among Congregational churches." Undoubtedly the statements we have just quoted must be construed with and made to harmonize with the provision containing the expression, "organic relations," if the same be possible. In this connection it is well to bear in mind that the idea of a self-governing body of disciples linked to one another by a voluntary covenant which transforms them into the visible church has been one of the chief characteristics of Congregationalism since the organization of its first churches in the latter part of the sixteenth century (see article on Congregationalism in vol. 4 of The Americana, by Williston Walker, professor of church history at Yale University, which we have consulted for the purpose of stimulating our judicial knowledge in accordance with the rule for which authority is hereafter cited). We find, therefore, an apparent rather than a real conflict between the two provisions, because if self-government of the individual church be a feature of Congregationalism, then it must logically follow that its customs, usages and laws will not conflict therewith, and we are returned to our original determination of the meaning of "organic relations," which also finds support in the article already mentioned in its history of the denomination in this country wherefrom it is made to appear that there has always been a close bond of fellowship binding together the various units in a relation of mutual helpfulness, advice and counsel in matters of importance, such as the settlement or dismissal of a pastor.

[6, 7] With this understanding of the church government it becomes apparent that the respondent court not only has jurisdiction to construe the provisions of the constitution which we have been considering, but also has jurisdiction to determine that the Los Angeles Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers has withdrawn its fellowship from the petitioner, and the effect of such action, as to whether it is final and conclusive, as well as its effect upon the petitioner. To this end it is within the power of the court to consider expert testimony and consult standard works of authority upon the subject. In Arthur v. Norfield Parish Congregational Church Soc., 73 Conn. 718, 731, 49 A. 241, 246, it is said:

"What that usage is was a question of fact as to which the court of common pleas heard expert testimony and consulted standard works of authority upon the customs and ecclesiastical law which govern this religious denomination. The object and justification of any such resort to printed books is the aid which they may be expected to afford to the court in the exercise of the faculty of judicial notice. Congregationalism was for nearly two centuries the established religion of Connecticut, and its laws and usages form part of the history of the commonwealth."

See, also, Frohliger v. Richardson, 63 Cal. App. 209, 218 P. 497; subdivision 8, § 1875, Code Civ. Proc.

While there seems to be some difference of opinion in the adjudicated cases in other jurisdictions upon the conclusiveness of a decision or determination of an ecclesiastical authority or tribunal (see note to St. Vincent v. Murphy, 35 L. R. A. [N. S.] 919), such difference cannot alter the outcome of this proceeding for the reason that if the determination of the Los Angeles association be final the respondent court has jurisdiction to ascertain its decision and so declare, whereas if the decision of the tribunal be not conclusive upon the court it also has jurisdiction to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings. In either case the respondent court is vested with jurisdiction to determine what the ecclesiastical tribunal has done, and inasmuch as we are not now to inquire into mere errors of law we are not called upon to determine whether the court is exercising its jurisdiction correctly or incorrectly. It is proper, however, to call attention to the fact that our Supreme Court has definitely aligned itself with those authorities which hold that the civil authorities cannot disregard the decisions of the church tribunals. In Committee of Missions v. Pacific Synod, 157 Cal. 105, at page 128, 106 P. 395, 403, it is said:

"Lest we be understood to hold that the civil courts can disregard and overrule the decisions of the church authorities, acting regularly, in ecclesiastical matters, we expressly disavow that doctrine. We approve the principle laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. [13 Wall.] 726 [20 L. Ed. 666], and by the Supreme Court of this state in Horsman v. Allen, 129 Cal. 136, 61 P. 796, relating to this subject. 'Whenever the questions of discipline, or of faith, or ecclesiastical rule, custom, or law have been decided by the highest of the church judicatories to which the matter has been carried, the legal tribunals must accept such decisions as final, and as binding on them, in their application to the case before them' (Watson v. Jones, 80 U. S. [13 Wall.] 727 [20 L. Ed. 666]). This was said with reference to the Presbyterian Church, and it is declared to be the doctrine applicable to all churches having a similar system of ecclesiastical government."

[8] There then follows in this opinion a long list of authorities to which reference may be had supporting the rule. It also seems meet to say, in order to avoid subsequent possible confusion, that Watson v. Jones, supra, also quotes with approval from authorities to the effect that the supervisory power of the civil tribunals may not be invoked when the only property involved is the loss of clerical office and the salary incident thereto. Having determined that the respondent court has the authority to determine what the ecclesiastical tribunal decided, it also follows that it has the jurisdiction to determine whether one who has been deprived of the fellowship of the Los Angeles Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers can or cannot act or claim to act as pastor of one of the units constituting the Los Angeles Association. In fact, petitioner himself calls attention to the Law of Congregational Usage by William E. Barton, at page 235, wherein we find this statement:

"An ordination requires the concurrent action of the churches of the vicinage. Such concurrence is appropriate but not indispensable in the settlement of a minister already ordained."

[9] There is another prepared finding of the court which also seems to render it necessary for us to deny the writ. The supplement to the complaint and the finding prepared responsive thereto is that the petitioner did during June, 1928, organize a new superdenominational church, not a Congregational church, and is conducting services for the new church in the edifice of the Wilshire Boulevard Congregational Church. As long ago at least as 1820, in the case of Baker v. Fales, 16 Mass. 488, it was determined that where a majority of the members of a Congregational church separate from the majority of the parish, the members who remain, although a minority, constitute the church in such parish, and retain the rights and property belonging thereto. This opinion is supported by sound logic, as is obvious when we consider that the property of the church has been set aside and dedicated to the particular benevolent purpose of the church in question, and that when any number of members see fit to forsake its covenant, they cannot take protesting and faithful members with them. Nor is the rule without former recognition in our own jurisdiction. In the two cases of Horsman v. Allen, supra, and Christian Church of Vacaville v. Crystal, 78 Cal. App. 1, 247 P. 605, the general doctrine receives approval. It cannot be doubted that the respondent court has the jurisdiction to determine as a fact the separation, nor is it doubted that the court has jurisdiction when it determines the separation to exist to declare that the petitioner has by this action forsaken his pastorate and that the property of the church is under the control of its members who have remained loyal.

The peremptory writ is denied.

CONNER et al. v. LOWERY. (Civ. 6309.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 11, 1928.

1. Easements §53—Stipulation in deed of right of way that each party pay half expenses of building and maintaining road held not condition subsequent, but mere agreement unenforceable for uncertainty.

Stipulation in deed of right of way that parties should each pay half the expenses of fencing, building, and maintaining road, held not a condition subsequent, but merely an agreement, unenforceable because indefinite and uncertain in not providing how expenses are to be incurred, who is to determine what is necessary for purposes, or when and in what manner expense is to be paid.

2. Deeds §155—Provision in deed will not be held condition subsequent, if language will bear any other reasonable construction.

Conditions subsequent are not favored in law because they tend to destroy estates, and no provision in deed relied on to create such a condition will be so interpreted, if the language thereof will bear any other reasonable construction.

3. Easements §12(1)—Deed of portion of right of way excepted by parties' prior deed held unenforceable as without consideration.

Deed of portion of right of way excepted by parties' prior quitclaim deed, releasing grantee's claim to portion over another's land, held unenforceable as wholly without consideration, since grantee gained nothing thereby.

4. Easements §12(1)—Deed of portion of right of way excepted from grantee's prior deed of portion abandoned to relocate portion over another's lands created no new right.

Where portion of right of way released by quitclaim deed was abandoned merely as part of plan for relocation of small portion of road over lands owned by neither party by mutual consent of parties, grantor's rights were not affected by change, though new road was not in actual use at time of deed, and subsequent deed to him of portion of right of way excepted by quitclaim deed created no new right constituting consideration for later deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Adele Conner and another against J. E. Lowery. From a judgment quieting plaintiffs' title to certain land, subject to a right of way claimed by defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for appellants.

Percy King, Jr., of Napa, and Frank W. Sawyer, and William R. Lowery, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued to quiet title to three parcels of land situated in Napa county. The defendant appeared and claimed an open right of way over parcels 1 and 3 of plaintiffs' land. Judgment went for plaintiffs, quieting their title subject to the right of way claimed by defendant. The plaintiffs have appealed on a typewritten transcript.

Plaintiffs concede that defendant, through his predecessors in interest, obtained, partly by grant, and partly by prescription, an open right of way over the land in question, and that this was used as a road and means of ingress to defendant's land from the county road from the year 1868. In the year 1918 James Mallock, the immediate predecessor in interest of the plaintiffs, conveyed to defendant "an open right of way—in common with the grantor over the road now being constructed by the parties from James Mallock's barn to the county road." This deed was made subject to the condition that the parties should each pay one-half the expenses of fencing, building, and maintaining the road, an obligation which should run with the land and be a condition to the enjoyment of the right granted. It is conceded that the road covered by this deed is the same as that used by the parties and their predecessors since 1868. The events leading to the execution of this deed are: Mallock was contemplating the purchase from Mrs. Adams of parcel 3 described in plaintiffs' complaint, but Mrs. Adams desired to have a portion of the road running through her orchard relocated along the line of a small creek. At the instance of Mallock, the defendant joined with him in the execution of the deed of May 31, 1918, releasing such portion of the road as was included in the lands to be retained by Mrs. Adams, and which, it is conceded, covered the portion running through the Adams orchard and did not cover any portion running through any lands belonging to the parties in this suit. On June 5, 1918, Mrs. Adams conveyed parcel 3 to Mallock, and the road thus became located wholly on Mallock's property except for the small portion running through the Adams orchard. It is the contention of the defendant that he obtained nothing from Mallock through the deed of June 6, 1918; that the new portion of the road was located by mutual consent of all parties; and that the deeds of May 31 and June 6, 1918, were both part of the same transaction to enable Mallock to effect his purchase from Mrs. Adams.

The controversy between the parties arose after the plaintiffs had purchased from Mallock and after they had performed some labor upon the road which they assumed was in excess of that performed by the defendant. A demand was made upon defendant that he perform additional labor upon the road and that he pay plaintiffs one-half the amount they had expended. When the defendant endeavored to perform work upon the road, the plaintiffs prevented him from doing so and failed to notify him at any time what amount they had expended or what amount they claimed from him.

The trial court found that no additional right was conveyed to defendant by the deed of June 6, 1918; that the language of this deed did not constitute a condition subsequent, but an agreement, for which there was no consideration. It was also found that the defendant had expended a large sum of money in building and maintaining the road since June 6, 1918; that prior to the commencement of the action he was prevented by plaintiffs from performing additional work thereon; that plaintiffs had also expended large sums upon the road, but had failed to notify defendant of any sum so expended or to demand payment of any portion thereof.

[1, 2] These findings are all amply supported by substantial evidence and the only question which requires consideration is whether the stipulation in the deed of June 6, 1918, is a condition subsequent or an agreement. We are convinced that it is merely an agreement, and an unenforceable one at that, because it is too indefinite and uncertain and because it is wholly without consideration. It is indefinite and uncertain because it does not provide how the expenses of fencing off, building, and maintaining the road are to be incurred, who is to determine what is necessary for those purposes, or when or in what manner the expense thereof is to be paid. Conditions subsequent "are not favored in law because they tend to destroy estates, and no provision in a deed relied on to create a condition subsequent will be so interpreted if the language of the provision will bear any other reasonable construction." Hawley v. Kafitz, 148 Cal. 393, 394, 83 P. 248, 249 (3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 113 Am. St. Rep. 282). As respondent obtained nothing by reason of the deed, it would be an unreasonable construction of this provision to hold that it was intended as a condition subsequent working a forfeiture of a pre-existing right with no consideration to him.

[3] That respondent gained nothing is clear. He then held, by deed, an undisputed right to a right of way over all the lands owned by appellants. By the quitclaim deed of May 31, 1918, he joined with appellants' predecessor in releasing his claim to that portion of the right of way running over the land of Mrs. Adams, but they expressly excepted from such release the portion of such right of way included in the tract "which said Mallock is now about to purchase from said Lydia F. Adams." By this exception the respondent retained all the rights over appellants' lands which he had theretofore held, and his interest therein was expressly confirmed by Mallock by the deed of May 31, 1918, leaving nothing for him to convey to respondent on June 6.

PURVIANCE v. COMPTON et al. (Civ. 6268.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 10, 1928.

- 1. Injunction ⇨75—Hearing by board of chiropractic examiners for revocation of practitioner's license held not exercise of "judicial power" against which injunction will lie (Chiropractic Act; Const. art. 6, § 1).

Hearing and determination by state board of chiropractic examiners under Chiropractic Act (St. 1923, p. lxxxviii; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4811) whether chiropractic practitioner was guilty of acts warranting revocation of his license held not to constitute exercise of "judicial power" within Const. art. 6, § 1, against which an injunction will lie.

- 2. Officers ⇨82—Title or right to act as members of board of chiropractic examiners cannot be tried in injunction action against board by practitioner (Chiropractic Act; Code Civ. Proc. § 526; Civ. Code, § 3423).

Where state board of chiropractic examiners appointed under Chiropractic Act (St. 1923, p. lxxxviii; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 4811) were at least de facto officers, in that they had entered duties of office, were holding its indicia, and were actually serving the public as members of board, held that under Code Civ. Proc. § 526, and Civ. Code, § 3423, their title or right to hold such office cannot be tried in an injunction action brought by practitioner whose license is sought to be revoked.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. M. Jamison, Judge.

Action for injunction by P. Purviance against James Compton and others, as members of the State Board of Chiropractic Examiners. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sawyer & Sawyer and F. W. Sawyer, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank V. Kingston, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment entered in favor of defendants upon the sustaining of the demurrer without leave being given to amend.

The plaintiff, a chiropractic practitioner, seeks an injunction against the defendants, members of the state board of chiropractic examiners. The action sought to be enjoined is the threatened act of placing on trial as to a fact, and the passing judgment upon such proof, in the investigation and revoking of plaintiff's license to practice chiropractic in this state.

The Chiropractic Act (Stats. 1923, lxxxviii; Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 4811) at section 10, provides that a license shall be revoked in proper cases. It further provides that a complaint shall be filed and other proceedings followed. Section 4 (c) empowers the board to revoke licenses, and section 4 (d) authorizes the summoning of witnesses and the taking of testimony.

The facts generally alleged in the complaint are: On February 10, 1923, the Governor of the state of California appointed the so-called "First Board of Chiropractic Examiners"; that on September 17, 1923, in an action prosecuted by the people of the state of California against such appointees, this "First Board" was ousted and removed from office upon the grounds that each member appointed thereon was unqualified and ineligible to act in that each had been a persistent violator of the state laws and that not one of them held a lawful license to practice, and that their appointment on such board was unauthorized and void; that after September 17, 1923, and before the commencement of this action said Governor of the state of California appointed or purported to appoint said defendants herein, James Compton, a member of the "First Board" to whom no license to practice chiropractic has ever been issued after an examination, and the other defendants, whose licenses were issued by the first illegal board, members of the state board of chiropractic examiners, being in fact the second board appointed under said initiative act, but in law the first board—as the so-called first board was no board; that said defendants were not then and are not now, nor is any one of them qualified to act as members of said board; that none of said defendants has practiced or did practice chiropractic in California for a period of three years next preceding the date upon which the act took effect or ever have been licensed to practice under any of the medical practice acts, but each of said defendants has assumed possession and control of said board of chiropractic examiners and as such members, claiming the right to act thereon and to perform the duties, threaten to and have actually commenced proceedings for the purpose of revoking the plaintiff's license to practice chiropractic and have fixed the time and place for the hearing before them of the question in respect to the revocation of said license, and caused citations and subpoenas to be issued directing various parties to be present and give testimony and that unless restrained, defendants will proceed with said hearing and render decision thereon, all to the irreparable loss and injury of plaintiff, for which there is no plain, speedy or adequate remedy at law. Upon these allegations plaintiff seeks an injunction enjoining and restraining defendants from doing anything in respect to the license of plaintiff to practice chiropractic.

Defendants demurred to the complaint upon several grounds, among which being that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. From the judgment for defendants entered upon the sustaining of the demurrer without leave to amend, plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Appellant urges that the acts threatened to be performed by the board of chiropractic examiners are judicial and therefore in violation of the state Constitution—that the act is not a constitutional amendment but a law of the state as if passed by the Legislature, though passed by the people, and cites us to Department of Public Works v. Superior Court, 197 Cal. 215, 239 P. 1076, wherein it is said:

“Under section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution ‘the Legislature would be without authority to give judicial power to any general state board or tribunal. Except for local purposes the section disposes of the whole judicial power of the state and vests all of it in the courts expressly named therein, leaving none at the disposition of the Legislature.’”

The case cited concerns an application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from proceeding with the hearing and determination of a petition for a writ of review and not injunctive relief. However, in Brecheen v. Riley, 187 Cal. 121, 125, 200 P. 1042, it is held that the determination of facts going to show whether or not a real estate agent was guilty of acts calling for a revocation of his license by the commissioner, under the “Real Estate Act” (Stats. 1919, p. 1252) is not the exercise of “the judicial powers of the state,” as that phrase is used in the Constitution conferring judicial power upon the courts. The court there quotes approvingly the following from Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 169, 77 P. 879, 884 (1 Ann. Cas. 13):

“It is not at all uncommon for inferior boards or officers to be invested with power which calls for the determination of facts, and the exercise of discretion, in the discharge of the duties of their office. This power, it is true, is in a sense judicial; but it cannot be said that it is an exercise of ‘judicial power’ as that term is used in the Constitution in conferring judicial power upon courts. The question is, however, not an open one in this state, and seems to have been settled adversely to petitioner’s contention in County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 P. 202, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217.”

It follows, therefore, that injunction will not lie on the theory that respondents in the present case are exercising judicial power.

[2] The allegation “that said defendants were not then and are not now, nor is any of them, qualified to act as members of said board” puts in issue the title or right to hold public office, which may not be tried in an injunction action. The jurisdiction to determine the title to public office or the qualifications of public officers belongs exclusively to the courts of law. As appears from the complaint, respondents had been appointed to the board by the Governor; had entered upon the duties of the office; were holding its indicia, and were actually serving the public as members of the board, when plaintiff sought relief by injunction. They were at least de facto officers, and, even if not qualified, the functioning of the office and the officers is not to be controlled by injunction. Barendt v. McCarthy, 160 Cal. 680, 118 P. 228; Town of Susanville v. Long, 144 Cal. 362, 77 P. 987; People v. Board of Supervisors, 75 Cal. 179, 16 P. 776; Randolph v. County of Stanislaus, 44 Cal. App. 322, 186 P. 625; Code Civ. Proc. § 526; Civ. Code, § 3423.

In our opinion the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO
v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.★ (Civ. 6609.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 11, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 8, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 10, 1928.

1. Mandamus ⇨3(1)—What is “plain, speedy and adequate remedy,” as respects right to mandamus, is question of fact, to be determined from circumstances of case (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086).

What is a “plain, speedy and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law,” within Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086, requiring writ of mandamus to be issued where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in ordinary course of law, is a question of fact to be determined from circumstances of case, and, when ordinary remedies would not be plain, speedy, and adequate, the court has jurisdiction to entertain proceeding, and petitioner is entitled to the writ as a matter of right.

2. Mandamus ⇨4(4)—City held entitled to maintain mandamus proceeding to require trial court to modify interlocutory judgment to conform to verdict in condemnation proceeding, remedy by appeal being inadequate (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086).

Where interlocutory decree in condemnation proceedings by city, entered September 14, required that damages must be paid by city on or before October 13, remedy of city by appeal, because of trial court’s increase in damages awarded by verdict of jury, would not be adequate, and city was therefore entitled to maintain mandamus proceeding, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1085, 1086, to compel trial court to modify judgment to conform to verdict.

3. Judgment ⇨199(1)—Trial court held without power to enter its own judgment notwithstanding jury’s verdict assessing damages in condemnation proceedings (Const. art. 1, § 14; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 629, 664, 1248).

Under Const. art. 1, § 14, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 664, 1248, where jury trial was demanded in city's condemnation proceedings and was not waived by either party, trial court had no power to enter its own judgment notwithstanding jury's verdict, under Code Civ. Proc. § 629.

4. Eminent domain  241—Recital in interlocutory decree that it was entered on city's motion held not to show city consented to all its terms; "consent" (Code Civ. Proc. § 664).

That interlocutory decree assessing damages in city's condemnation proceeding recited that it was entered on city's motion held not to establish city's consent to all terms of decree, including trial court's increase of damages awarded by verdict, where city protested against such increase, and decree was entered solely to comply with requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 664, requiring judgment to be entered within 24 hours, unless court orders case reserved; "consent" being nothing more than a contract, one of prime essentials of which is intent.

Original proceeding in mandamus by the City and County of San Francisco against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and T. I. Fitzpatrick, a judge thereof, to compel modification of an interlocutory decree in eminent domain proceeding. Writ granted.

John J. O'Toole, City Atty., and Henry Heidelberg, Deputy City Atty., both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Knight, Boland & Christin and Mervyn R. Dowd, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This an original proceeding in mandamus to require the respondent superior court to modify an interlocutory judgment in eminent domain proceedings to conform to the verdict of the jury rendered after a trial of the issues.

The petitioner, city and county of San Francisco, instituted condemnation proceedings to condemn various parcels of real property owned by the various defendants. A trial by jury was demanded, and was not waived by any party to the suit. Such a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict assessing the damages to one of the defendants in the sum of $8,000 and to another in the sum of $500. When the verdict was returned to the court and entered, counsel for these defendants moved that it be modified, by increasing the amount of damages awarded to them by the jury. This motion was resisted by the city, but the trial judge ordered the awards increased, and thereupon entered an interlocutory decree in favor of the city, permitting it to take the property upon payment to these defendants of damages, which he assessed to be $9,000 in the one instance and $1,000 in the other. Upon the entry of this interlocutory decree, the city moved the trial court to modify the judgment to conform to the verdict, and this motion was denied.

The proceeding in this court is prosecuted on the theory that the trial judge was without jurisdiction to modify the verdict in the manner followed, and that, the interlocutory decree being void on its face for that reason, mandamus is the proper remedy to procure the entry of a proper judgment. The petition is resisted on the ground that petitioner has an adequate remedy by appeal. Counsel for respondent also states, but with apparent lack of confidence, that the trial court acted within its jurisdiction in modifying the verdict.

[1] Mandamus is an extraordinary remedy issuing to compel an inferior tribunal, body, or person, to perform an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office. It must be issued in all cases where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Sections 1085, 1086, Code Civ. Proc. What is a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law is always a question of fact, to be determined upon the circumstances of each case, and, when it appears that the ordinary remedies would not be plain, speedy, and adequate, the court has jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding, and the petitioner is then entitled to the writ as a matter of right. Gay v. Torrance, 145 Cal. 144, 148, 78 P. 540; Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 726, 154 P. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670.

[2] Here it appears that the interlocutory judgment was entered September 14 of this year and that the damages must be paid by the city on or before October 13. From this fact alone it is apparent that the remedy by appeal would not be adequate and no other remedy in the ordinary course of law has been suggested.

[3] The merits of the case are simple. The state Constitution provides that damages in condemnation proceedings must be ascertained by a jury, unless a jury be waived, "as in other civil cases in a court of record." Article I, § 14. Section 1248, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the court, jury, or referee must hear the evidence, "and thereupon must ascertain and assess" the damages to the property involved. Section 664, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that, when trial by jury has been had, judgment "in conformity to the verdict" must be entered within 24 hours, unless the court order the case reserved for special purposes.

The power of the trial court to enter its own judgment, notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, applies only to those cases where a motion for a directed verdict should have been granted (section 629, Code Civ. Proc.), a situation which does not arise here. The power to modify as an alternative to granting a motion for a new trial has been conceded, on the theory that the party moving for a new trial is deemed to have consented to the modification by agreeing to remit from the judgment the amount suggested by the trial court. But in cases where a trial by jury has been had as a matter of right the trial judge must enter judgment upon the verdict as rendered unless some such proceedings have been instituted. Respondent has not cited any authority, and we have been unable to find any, which holds that the trial judge may otherwise substitute his judgment for that of the jury and enter a judgment which is not based upon the verdict, in cases where a trial by jury has been had as a matter of right.

It is true the respondent has cited some cases which bear upon the general subject, but they are all readily distinguishable from the case at bar. Cheerer & Co. v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 524, 94 P. 849, was a case involving proceedings upon the report of referees in a condemnation proceeding in which a trial by jury was expressly waived. The appellate court held that the trial court had jurisdiction to modify the report of the referees under the express provisions of the act under which the proceedings were brought. Adamson v. County of Los Angeles, 52 Cal. App. 125, 198 P. 52, was an action in injunction seeking to restrain the court from expending money upon property which it had acquired for a public purpose under eminent domain proceedings. The appellate court, having held that the judgment in the eminent domain proceedings had become final, and could not be collaterally attacked in that proceeding, went on to say that the trial court possessed the power "on a motion for a new trial" to amend or modify the verdict of the jury. County of Los Angeles v. Rindge Co., 53 Cal. App. 166, 200 P. 27, merely held that in similar proceedings the trial court, upon a motion for new trial, had the power to deny the motion upon the stipulation of the county counsel that the verdict of the jury might be modified to correct a manifest error. The point involved in this case was that a miscalculation had been made in the mileage to be covered by fencing the property of one of the defendants whose land was condemned. The jury fixed the cost per mile at $650, and aggregated the total sum at what would represent 29 miles of fencing, rather than 31½, the agreed mileage to be covered. City of Los Angeles v. Hughes (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 737, has no application to any point involved in the case. The damages were there fixed by referees appointed on the stipulation of the parties and the question was the propriety of the court's action in modifying the referees' report. This report having the effect of a special verdict (section 645, Code Civ. Proc.), the judgment which followed it could be set aside or modified, if based upon incorrect or erroneous conclusions of law not supported by the referees' findings. Section 663, Code Civ. Proc. The question involved in the Hughes Case was whether the damages assessed were computed upon an erroneous conception of the legal rights of the parties.

[4] Respondent argues that, inasmuch as the interlocutory decree recites that it was entered on motion of the plaintiff in that case, we must assume that the plaintiff consented to all terms of the decree, including the increased award. But the plaintiff protested against this feature and urged the lack of jurisdiction in the superior court to modify the verdict. The decree was entered solely to comply with the terms of section 664, Code of Civil Procedure, and does not indicate consent on the part of the plaintiff to this change. Consent is nothing more than a contract, and, of course, one of the prime essentials of a contract is intent. Here every presumption of intent is lacking.

We are satisfied that the trial court was without jurisdiction to modify the verdict on the motion of the defendants, and, as this want of jurisdiction appears upon the face of the interlocutory decree, it is a proper case for the modification of that decree to conform to the verdict as rendered.

Let a writ issue as prayed.

WILLIAM A. DAVIS CO. v. BERTRAND SEED CO. (Civ. 6314.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 10, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 27, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Contracts ⇨163—Binding effect of statement printed on letterhead depends on whether one receiving it should understand, as reasonable man, that it contains terms of contract.

Binding effect of statement, printed on letterhead or other paper, delivered to acceptor of offer, depends on whether person receiving it should understand, as reasonable man, that it contains terms of contract, which he must read at his peril and regard as part of proposed agreement.

2. Sales ⇨267—Seller's printed disclaimer of intent to warrant seeds in all letters to buyer held binding on latter.

Disclaimer of intent to warrant description, quality, or productiveness of seeds, sold by one wholesale seed corporation to another, in printed statement preceding typewritten body of letter containing offer to sell, and in every letter received by buyer throughout correspondence, held binding on buyer, which was aware of contents, purpose, intent, and effect of statement and relied on claim of fraud and breach of honor and fair play in seller's representation that it exercised great care to have all seeds pure and reliable, rather than on disclaimer as such.

3. Sales $\S$ 260—Statement in letter that seeds offered for sale were all choice seedsmen's stock and double milled held not express warranty of variety and purity in face of printed nonwarranty clause.

Statement in typewritten portion of letter containing offer to sell seeds that "the stocks offered are all choice seedsmen's stocks and double milled" held insufficient to show intent to give express warranty as to variety and purity in face of printed nonwarranty clause; being capable of construction in reasonable sense simply in connection with statement as to care in selection and expressive of mere opinion in good faith as to general merits of seller's stock.

4. Sales $\S$ 260—Affirmation of fact, intended as warranty, is essential to sale on warranty.

For sale to be on a warranty, there must be an affirmation of a fact by the seller with reference to the thing sold and intention on his part that such affirmation shall be a warranty to the buyer.

5. Sales $\S$ 258, 260, 261 (2)—Statements in seller's letters after receipt and acceptance of and payment for seeds held not warranties, where each letter contained printed disclaimer thereof and no such intent was expressed nor any consideration received.

Written statements in seller's correspondence with buyer after receipt and acceptance of seeds sold and payment of price held not to constitute warranty thereof, where each letter contained printed disclaimer of warranty and no intent was expressed to give warranty nor any consideration received or accepted which would sustain any new or additional warranty of goods already sold and delivered.

6. Sales $\S$ 258—Representation or agreement to warrant without new consideration after sale without warranty is ineffective.

If seller's liability on a warranty is based on agreement to contract, consideration is essential, and, if no representation of warranty was made at time of sale, subsequent representation or agreement to warrant is of no legal effect, unless new consideration is given.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the William A. Davis Company against the Bertrand Seed Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Fred L. Dreher and J. Ed McClellan, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Morrison, Hohfeld, Foerster, Shuman & Clark, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BUCK, Presiding Justice pro tem. Action by buyer to recover back from seller the purchase price of certain garden seeds because of alleged breach of certain warranties, claimed to have been given by seller at time of the sale.

The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and the court found that at the time of the sale the defendant represented to and assured the plaintiff that the seeds sold were of certain specified varieties, to wit, "Alaska Variety" and "Hosford Market Garden Variety," and that, relying upon said representations, the plaintiff received the seeds and paid the purchase price. The court also found on conflicting evidence that as a matter of fact the seeds were not of the "Alaska" and "Hosford" varieties; and that as soon as such fact was discovered plaintiff offered to return the seeds, and demanded the return of the purchase price and certain charges paid on account of the transaction. Judgment was accordingly given for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

One of the grounds of the appeal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain finding that the defendant intended or manifested any intent to give the warranty charged or found, but that, on the contrary, the writing relied upon by the plaintiff to prove the warranty expressly shows that the defendant disclaimed any intent or purpose to give the warranty relied upon by the plaintiff.

The plaintiff and defendant corporations were wholesale seed dealers, the plaintiff being located in Montana and the defendant in California. The contract of sale relied upon and proven by the plaintiff was created by the plaintiff's acceptance of the following written offer:

"San Francisco, Cal., July 3, 1919.

"The William A. Davis Co., Bozeman, Montana. While we exercise great care to have all our seeds pure and reliable, we give no warranty, expressed or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness or any other matter of any seeds we sent out, and we will be in no way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned.

"Gentlemen: We are in receipt of your favor of June 27th and in reply are pleased to quote you the following varieties of garden peas: (Here follow quotations, among others—Hosford Market Garden $.12 per lb. and Alaska Peas at $.14)

"The stocks offered are all choice seedsmen's stocks and double milled. Prices are f. o. b. San Francisco, terms sight draft attached to bill of lading with privilege of inspection. Bags extra at cost. This offer is for immediate acceptance and is subject to stock being unsold upon receipt of your order.

"Trusting that we may have the pleasure of booking your order for some of these varieties, we remain, yours very truly, Bertrand Johansen Seed Co., per A. A. Bertrand."

The portion above between the words "Montana" and "Gentlemen" was in print, while the remaining portions of the body of the letter were in typewriting.

[1] It is plaintiff's and respondent's contention that notwithstanding the foregoing matter in print, which by its terms disclaims any intent on the part of the seller to give any warranty, "expressed or implied as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matters, of any seeds," nevertheless, by reason of other language in the letter, such express intent was absolutely nullified and abandoned.

And, first, as to the printed disclaimer: At the outset it should be noted that there is no attempt made to plead or find fraud, or to put the defendant upon any defense as to fraud. Furthermore, the general rule as to the binding effect of "a statement printed upon a letterhead or tag upon goods, or in some other paper delivered to the acceptor," is well stated by Williston in his work on Contracts, volume 1, p. 165, par. 90d, as follows:

"The sole question seems to be whether the facts present a case where the person receiving the paper should, as a reasonable man, understand that it contained terms of the contract which he must read at his peril, and regard as part of the proposed agreement. The precise facts of each case are important in reaching a conclusion"—citing many cases.

See, also, 1 Williston on Sales (2d Ed.) par. 239a, and cases cited at page 477.

[2] In the case at bar the facts unequivocally show the plaintiff corporation was well aware both of the contents and the purpose and intent of the printed matter, as well as of its effect as a disclaimer. Throughout the correspondence between the parties, the disclaimer appeared in every letter received by the plaintiff from the defendant; and as disclosing the extent to which the defendant recognized its binding effect as a disclaimer, the final exchange of courtesies between the parties is quite significant. In the letter of September 28, 1920, from defendant to plaintiff, the following appears:

"We are in receipt of your claim against us of the 17th of this month, asking us to take back goods sold you in good faith, and on a high market, which makes your claim altogether out of reason. If, as you say, the peas did not look right to you when they arrived a year ago, that was the time to turn the shipment down, and not now, when the market value of the stock is about one-half of the price at which you bought. We regret that we cannot accept the peas."

To which plaintiff replied as follows:

"Your letter of September 28th was very surprising to us, in so much that after having sold us seed stocks untrue to name and after we had protected you in this transaction, you are entirely unwilling to treat us fairly. Evidently you are one of the numerous firms operating under the protection which they feel the seedman's disclaimer affords them. It is possible that a sound business may be built up under this policy, but we are of the opinion that to continue long in the seed business it is necessary to recognize at least some degree of honor and fair play.

"So far as your disclaimer is concerned, however, we wish to state that you did not exercise great care to have this seed pure or reliable and we feel it only just that methods such as you have been using should be given prominence and we will take immediate steps to advertise this transaction."

If it be a good rule that a writing is best understood by the construction which the parties themselves place upon it, it is quite evident from the foregoing that the plaintiff, who, by the way, appears in its own business to have used a printed disclaimer on its letterheads, understood that its proper remedy in this proceeding was not to attack or qualify the disclaimer as such, but to rely rather upon a claim that the defendant was guilty of fraud and breach of "honor and fair play" in the representation that "we exercise great care to have all our seeds pure and reliable." But as already noted, plaintiff's complaint makes no attempt to allege such charges or to give the defendant any opportunity on a fair trial to meet such charges.

The case of Miller v. Germain Seed & Plant Co., 193 Cal. 62, 222 P. 817, 32 A. L. R. 1215, is an instructive case as to the binding effect of a disclaimer by implication contained in a contract for the sale of garden seeds. In that case the plaintiff was engaged in raising celery for the market, and the defendant was engaged in the sale of seeds and plants. The plaintiff ordered from the defendant "celery seed of the golden yellow celery, California stock." The defendant forwarded two bags of celery seeds with the marking "Germain seeds Germinate." As a matter of fact, the seeds were of a different variety from the character of the seeds ordered. And as a result thereof the plaintiff recovered damages in the sum of $4,000. The case was tried before a jury, and the defendant seed dealer claimed that in each bag of seed there was inclosed loose leaf slips containing the same non-warranty notice as was contained in the letterheads, in the case at bar, and, furthermore, that for a period of 15 years prior to the commencement of the action the plaintiff at various times purchased seed from the defendants, and in each instance there was inclosed in the package containing said seed a slip upon which was printed the same notice of nonwarranty; also the same notice was printed in defendant's catalogue and on its order blanks, and on other stationery used by defendant. But all this was denied by the plaintiff's witnesses, and all disputed facts were passed upon adversely to defendant's contention by the jury. The Supreme Court, however, reversed the case upon the ground that the trial court erred in refusing "to instruct the jury, as requested by the defendant, that if there was a general custom of nonwarranty the plaintiff would be bound thereby.

even if he did not in fact know of such custom and usage." In that case, both in the prevailing and dissenting opinion, the rule was conceded, as it is in the case at bar, that "where a purchaser asks a seed dealer for a certain variety of seed and in pursuance of that request the seed is furnished, that in the absence of any additional facts the law will from the transaction imply a contract of warranty. This warranty partakes of the nature of both an express and implied warranty."

In the case cited, as already indicated, so far as the writings between the parties are concerned, it was found there was no writing, printed or otherwise, between the parties disclaiming the "express and implied warranty" that the seeds were of the variety known as "Golden Yellow Celery California stock." But the court held that the above instructions should have been given so that the jury, if they so found, could as against a farmer purchasing seed for use nullify the foregoing "express and implied warranty" by a mere custom unknown to the buyer himself. And by a parity of reasoning which led the court to arrive at the foregoing conclusion, it would seem to follow that as between two sophisticated wholesale seed corporations an express disclaimer of warranty inserted in their mutual correspondence should have even greater potency as a disclaimer of warranty than the seed sellers' custom which bound the farmer in the Miller-Germain Case.

In the prevailing opinion in the Germain Seed Case, supra, the court cited and followed the case of Ross v. Northrup, 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124, on the potent effect of a general custom, and also cited the case of Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co., 147 Wis. 166, 132 N. W. 902, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1077, which was also a case from the same jurisdiction, upholding the potent effect of a provision of nonwarranty "very similar to the provision which it is alleged in the instant case," which was printed not on a mere slip inclosed in a bag, but printed in the body of a letter read and understood by the buyer himself.

[3] Furthermore, as regards respondent's claim that in the face of the nonwarranty clause the following language is sufficient to show an intent on the part of the seller to give an express warranty as to variety and purity, "The stock offered was all choice seedmen's stock and double milled," as shown at page 103 of 193 Cal. (222 P. 833), of the dissenting opinion in the case of Miller v. Germain Seed, etc., Co., supra, statements of much stronger import were contained in the seller's printed catalogue, and were evidently not considered by the court of sufficient import to nullify the effect of a mere custom. And in the case at bar the language relied upon should be and can be construed in a reasonable sense which will preserve and not do violence to the plain meaning of the express language of the nonwarranty clause; and be construed simply in connection with the statement touching care in selection and expressive merely of an opinion in good faith as to the general merits of the defendant's stock in trade.

[4] The case of Miller v. Germain Seed, etc., Co. was followed in the recent case from this district of Couts v. Sperry Flour Co. (Cal. App.) 259 P. 108. This case is conclusive authority as to the proposition that "in order that a sale shall be upon a warranty, there must be two factors present, first, an affirmation of a fact by the seller with reference to the thing sold, and, second, an intention on the part of the seller that his affirmation shall be a warranty to the buyer," and in the case last cited it was held that:

"By the express declaration of the agent, and upon which the finding is based, defendant relieved itself of any implied warranty that the seed sold was of the variety desired"—citing Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co., 147 Wis. 166, 132 N. W. 902, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 79, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1077; also, 2 Williston on Contracts, p. 1870; 35 Cyc. 373.

[5, 6] But it is respondent's contention that after the receipt and acceptance of the goods and the payment of the price the defendant made certain written statements in its correspondence with the plaintiff which constituted a warranty. But in the first place each and every one of those statements relied upon was contained in a letter, which contained also the printed disclaimer of warranty and there was evidently no intent expressed to give a warranty, and, furthermore, there was no consideration received or accepted which would sustain any new or additional warranty for goods already sold and delivered. In fact, as stated in 1 Williston on Sales (2d Ed.) paragraph 211:

"If the seller's liability on a warranty is based upon an agreement to contract, consideration is essential * * * still more clearly if no representation of warranty was made at the time of the sale, a subsequent representation or agreement to warrant will be of no legal effect unless new consideration is given to it"—citing many cases.

It will therefore not be necessary to consider the other points made by appellant herein for the reason that from the foregoing it sufficiently appears from the writing relied upon by the plaintiff to prove an intent to warrant that the defendant expressly disavowed and disclaimed any such intent.

The judgment will therefore be reversed.

BAKOS v. SHELL CO. OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3572.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 4, 1928.

1. Trial $\Rightarrow$ 165—Motion for nonsuit admits truth of plaintiff's evidence and every legitimate inference therefrom.

A motion for nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and evidence should be interpreted most strongly against defendants, without regard to contradictory evidence, on such motion.

2. Automobiles $\Rightarrow$ 245 (40)—Negligence in driving truck at excessive speed too near edge of pavement, with faulty coupling equipment permitting trailer to sway from side to side, held for jury.

In action for death of boy run over by truck trailer, testimony of eyewitness held sufficient to take to jury question of negligence in driving truck at excessive speed too close to edge of pavement, with faulty coupling machinery or equipment permitting trailer to sway from side to side.

3. Automobiles $\Rightarrow$ 245 (1)—Whether eyewitness of accident, in which boy was run over by truck trailer, could see what happened from her position, held for jury.

Whether eyewitness of accident, in which boy was run over and killed by truck trailer, could see what she testified to from position in her yard on opposite side of truck from boy, was a question of fact for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by Gust Bakos against the Shell Company of California and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

J. Edward Keating, F. E. Carleton, and Theodore E. Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PRESTON, Justice pro. tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff, Gust Bakos, from a judgment of nonsuit in an action brought by him against the defendants for damages for the death of his minor son.

The complaint alleges that R. T. Kelly operated a heavy automobile oil truck belonging to defendant Shell Company of California, to which was attached a trailer in such a careless and negligent manner as to cause said trailer to collide with said minor child, Jimmie Bakos, who at said time was standing near the pavement of the road, awaiting an opportunity to cross the road in order to reach his home, which was on the opposite side of the road.

The answer of defendants denies any negligence on their part and pleads contributory negligence on the part of the deceased child. The answer also pleads negligence on the part of plaintiff in permitting said child to be upon the streets or roads unattended.

The evidence shows that plaintiff's son, Jimmie Bakos, was a child of the age of 6½ years. Between 2 and 3 o'clock on the afternoon of June 2, 1925, Jimmie Bakos, in company with a smaller boy, ran across the school yard towards the traveled and paved highway, leading from the city of Los Angeles to the town of Compton. The boys came to a complete stop about 3 feet from the edge of the pavement to permit a large Mack truck, with an 18-foot trailer attached to the rear end thereof, to pass in front of them. This truck and trailer belonged to defendant Shell Company of California. The truck was driven by the defendant Kelly on the right-hand side of the paved portion of the highway and about 2 feet from the edge of the pavement, towards the town of Compton, and at a speed of between 12 and 14 miles an hour. The children did not move, but continued to stand in the same place, off of the paved portion of the road, while the truck and trailer were passing in front of them. The deceased, Jimmie Bakos, was struck by the trailer, and the rear wheels of it passed over his body, killing him almost instantly.

Kelly, the driver of the truck, testified that he knew the school was located at that place and that he saw the children come across the school yard and approach the highway in front of him, but that they were 12 feet away when his truck passed them.

The case was being heard by a jury, and at the conclusion of plaintiff's evidence the defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence showed no negligence upon the part of defendants. This motion was granted and a judgment of nonsuit entered.

We are of the opinion that the trial court committed error in granting this motion.

[1, 2] The court's power and limitations, with reference to the granting of a nonsuit, are clear and well defined. The motion admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference which can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon such motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendants. Stieglitz v. Settle, 175 Cal. 131, 165 P. 436; Goldstone v. Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 P. 776; Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 P. 252; Anderson v. Wickliffe, 178 Cal. 120, 172 P. 381; Berger v. Lane, 190 Cal. 452, 213 P. 45; Bloom v. Allen, 61 Cal. App. 28, 214 P. 481; Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 189 Cal. 335, 208 P. 125. Here there is evidence of an eyewitness to the fatal accident, which shows that the truck and trailer approached the scene of the accident "at a fast rate of speed" and that "the trailer was zigzagging and raising dust," and that "the rear end of the trailer became entangled with the boy's clothing" as he stood 2 or 3 feet off of the paved portion of the highway, in such a manner as to cause the rear wheels of the trailer to pass over his body. This evidence was given by the witness Rosa Abarissio, a Mexican woman, and given through an interpreter. She testified in part as follows:

"Q. How far was Jimmie (deceased) from the paved portion of the street when you first saw him? A. About 3 feet back.

"Q. How soon after you saw Jimmie did you see him struck? A. The child arrived first and stopped and waited for the truck to pass.

"Q. Did you see Jimmie standing still or moving when you saw him first? A. He was standing still for the truck to pass.

"Q. Did Jimmie move from the time you saw him standing beside the road until he was hit? A. He didn't move; no, sir.

"The Court: Ask her again; go ahead and finish your question. Did he move or didn't he move? A. He did not move until the trailer struck him.

"Q. Did the trailer move in any direction except straight ahead behind the truck before it hit Jimmie? A. The truck was going straight ahead, and the trailer was zigzagging (indicating), and Jimmie was standing still.

"Q. And the next thing you saw was Jimmie on the pavement under the hind wheel of the trailer, isn't that true? A. I saw him when he became entangled by his clothes and turned him around (indicating); he fell.

"Q. Did the truck or trailer make any dust at that time that you observed? A. Yes, sir."

From this evidence, alone, the jury could have reasonably inferred negligence on the part of defendants in the operation of their truck and trailer. The jury could have drawn the inference from this evidence that defendants were negligent in the following particulars: (1) That the truck and trailer were being driven at an excessive rate of speed; (2) that the truck and trailer were being driven too close to the edge of the pavement; (3) that the trailer was permitted to sway from side to side; and (4) that the coupling machinery or equipment was faulty. These were all questions of fact to be passed upon by the jury.

[3] Respondents contend that it was physically impossible for this witness, Rosa Abarissio, to have seen what she testified to, because she was standing on the east side of the road in her yard, and that the truck and trailer passed between her and the boy, and that the flat platform of the truck and trailer would be entirely above the head of the boy, and would obstruct her view. This, also, was a question of fact for the jury to determine. This woman, however, further testified that the ground where she was standing in her yard was 3 or 4 feet higher than the level of the road and that she could see the boy on the other side of the truck and trailer. She also testified positively that she saw the boys standing by the pavement as the truck approached them and the next thing she saw was Jimmie under the rear wheel of the trailer.

Respondents further contend that the only legitimate inference that can be drawn from the testimony in this case is that this child impetuously and thoughtlessly ran from a position of safety immediately to his death. It is true that Kelly, the driver of the truck, testified that the boys stopped about 12 feet from the truck and were stopped at the time he passed them, and that he did not know the boy had been injured until some time thereafter; but on a motion for a nonsuit contradictory evidence must be disregarded.

In Berger v. Lane, supra, the court laid down this rule as to how evidence should be viewed in the face of a motion for a nonsuit as follows:

"Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence adduced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the plaintiffs. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if one of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the plaintiffs. If contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. (Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583 [82 P. 252].) The plaintiff must also be given the benefit of every piece of evidence which tends to sustain his averments, and such evidence must be weighed in the light most favorable to plaintiff's claim. * * * Evidence, whether erroneously admitted or not, if relevant to the issues joined, must be given the credit and benefit of its full probative strength, and any question arising from the fact of variation between the evidence of the witnesses cannot be raised or considered. The evidence must be taken most strongly against the defendant, and if the plaintiff has introduced proof sufficient to make out a prima facie case under the allegations of his complaint the motion, if made upon the close of the case, should be denied."

If it be conceded that the testimony given by Mrs. Abarissio is in itself contradictory, still, viewing the entire case in the light of the foregoing well-established rules, we see no escape from the conclusion that the motion for a nonsuit should have been denied.

The judgment is reversed.

(271 P.)

AMERICAN SEEDLESS RAISIN CO. v.
JOSHUA HENDY IRON WORKS.
(Civ. 6404.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 10, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 26, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Sales $\hookrightarrow$ 267, 268(2)—Warranty of freedom of tractor sold from latent defects was implied, though express warranty merely contained agreement to replace defective parts (Civ. Code, § 1769).

Implied warranty that tractor sold was free from latent defects, under Civ. Code, § 1769, was part of contract of sale thereof, though express warranty merely contained agreement to replace parts requiring replacement by reason of defective workmanship.

2. Sales $\hookrightarrow$ 262½—Warranties Implied by law are deemed incorporated in contract of sale.

It is the established rule that warranties implied by law on sale of goods may be deemed incorporated in the contract.

3. Sales $\hookrightarrow$ 445(4)—Evidence of gear shift trouble arising from improper alignment of tractor made issue for jury of existence of latent defect warranting buyer's recovery for breach of warranty (Civ. Code, § 1769).

Evidence of buyer's gear shift trouble after purchase of tractor, and of continuance of trouble after gears were replaced, which expect attributed to improper alignment, held to make issue for jury as to whether there was a latent defect arising from process of manufacture, authorizing buyer's recovery of damages for breach of warranty, under Civ. Code, § 1769.

4. Trial $\hookrightarrow$ 109—Plaintiff's claim of implied warranty was not waived by counsel's statement at beginning of trial, where evidence on that issue was admitted without objection.

Where facts relating to implied warranty were fully alleged in complaint in action for breach of warranty and evidence on that issue was admitted without objection, plaintiff's right to invoke recovery on that issue was not waived by counsel's statement at beginning of trial that they were relying only on written warranty and implied warranty under another Code section.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Action by the American Seedless Raisin Company against the Joshua Hendy Iron Works. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hartley F. Peart, Charles V. Barfield, and Sylvester J. McAtee, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Byrne & Lamson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BUCK, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover damages for breach of warranty arising out of the sale of a farm tractor. Defendant recovered judgment by nonsuit, and the plaintiff appealed.

[1] The tractor in question was manufactured by the defendant on the order of its inventor, Mr. Martin, but at the time of this sale to plaintiff was owned by defendant, and defendant corporation, in consummating the sale, availed itself of the services of the inventor in making such a successful demonstration of the merits of the tractor that the plaintiff purchased it and paid to the defendant the purchase price in the sum of $4,738.60. Though there were the not unusual representations touching the quality of workmanship and construction, the following constituted the only writing given by the defendant covering express warranties:

"The undersigned warrants to the above purchaser full and legal title to the above described tractor, and hereby guarantees same against any litigation with reference to patents, or royalties or adverse claims of any kind or nature, and further agrees to replace free of charge, f. o. b. Sunnyvale, Cal., within one year from date hereof, any part or parts which may require replacement by reason of defective workmanship or material other than for electrical parts.

"Joshua Hendy Iron Works,

"By A. J. Behneman, Manager."

For comparison it may be noted that this in some of its features is not dissimilar to the written guaranty construed in the case of Moss v. Smith, 181 Cal. 519, 185 P. 385, which contains the following language:

"To be free from defects in material or workmanship for one year from the 13th day of October, 1914, and will replace such defective part or parts in the car absolutely free of charge when delivered at our place of business." (Italics ours.)

But as regards material and workmanship it is evident in the case at bar that the written warranty contains no direct statements that can be construed as an express warranty. In fact, the warranty in the case at bar absolutely omits any statement of any existing fact, or assurance of any existing fact, on the subject of material or workmanship. Consequently the court cannot, under the guise of construction, incorporate in the contract something which the parties to the contract expressly omitted to incorporate. But the law, as laid down in our Codes, does and will in certain circumstances incorporate, where the parties have failed expressly so to do in an agreement for sale, certain implied warranties, one of which is the following:

"One who sells or agrees to sell an article of his own manufacture thereby warrants it to be free from any latent defect, not disclosed to the buyer, arising from the process of manufacture." Section 1769, Civ. Code.

implied by law may be deemed incorporated in the contract. Remsburg v. Hackney Mfg. Co., 174 Cal. 799, 805, 164 P. 792; Bancroft v. San Francisco Tool Co., 5 Cal. Unrep. 587, 47 P. 684; Hoult v. Baldwin, 67 Cal. 610, 613, 8 P. 440; Snyder v. Holt Mfg. Co., 134 Cal. 324, 328, 66 P. 311; Mechem on Sales, vol. 2, p. 1094, § 1258; 2 Williston on Contracts, 1872, par. 993.

In this connection, however, it is respondent's contention, in support of the judgment of nonsuit, that "section 1769 of the Civil Code has no application for the reason that there was no evidence that there was any latent defect arising from the process of manufacture," and also that it is too late to invoke this section on appeal "as counsel for appellant announced at the beginning of the trial that they were relying only on the so-called written warranty, and on the implied warranty found in section 1770 of the Civil Code."

[3] And first as to whether "there is any such substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences available to plaintiff" would support a finding that there was a latent defect in the tractor arising from the process of manufacture. The testimony on behalf of the plaintiff shows, from the time the tractor was paid for, on or about March 10, 1921, up to the time it was finally abandoned in April, 1922, that numerous defects and weaknesses were observed in the different parts of the machinery, noticeably in the gearing, shafting, bearings, differentials, and transmission, some of which, however, were replaced. As stated by one of the witnesses:

"We had more or less gear shift trouble, right along, but not so bad, it gradually got worse. The gear shift trouble started about the 8th or 10th of March. * * * I notified Mr. Martin respecting that * * * with respect to the gears he attempted to fix them—to install them to act properly; he tried to repair them but they did not act properly after that. He changed some of the levers, he changed the levers somewhat, the parts. * * * After we had opened up the machine, when the levers would not change gears we found that the shaft on which the bevel gears were, were worn. They were worn enough that you couldn't change gears. * * * The teeth of the gears were worn, I should say they were worn one-eighth of an inch. * * * These gears were eventually replaced by new ones. * * * I discovered the bevel gear was worn when we opened the case. * * * We found the teeth in the gears were worn."

In April respondent wrote to appellant as follows:

"It will be a day or two before I can straighten out that situation, as I want to go into the matter and ascertain the reason for the trouble. If I find it is necessary to make the shafts harder I will have to have same treated before I can send them to you."

And on April 21st:

"We are hardening and heat treating two shafts to go in the transmission and these should be finished by tomorrow night, at which time we will send a man to Livingston to install them. We regret the delay in this matter but the writer feels as if it is better to have ascertained just what the difficulty was and rectify it permanently, than to stab at it in the way of temporary matter."

On May 16, 1921, respondent wrote as follows:

"We have completed the layout for transmission for your machine and expect to have the gears and shafts finished by the latter part of the week. We are putting in an alloyed steel shaft with six splines instead of four, as around the Cotta, and are making the bearing on the splines twice the length as well as making the splines harder. I am sending you herewith B/P D 472 which shows the transmission which we are going to send you and you will note from same that there are only four gears operating at one time in place of having all the gears operate, as heretofore. This will reduce the friction heat in the case and there should be no more running hot in the transmission case. We have given this matter a great deal of study and it has cost us all considerable time and money, and we are sure that this will eliminate all your difficulties. I sincerely want to thank you for your patience and I am sure you will eventually be rewarded when the new transmission is put in the tractor. * * *"

In regard to the replacements, plaintiff's witnesses testified as follows:

"Q. Now, with those new gears in there, will you state what happened?"

"A. The same trouble again developed; the same trouble again. It wouldn't operate and we couldn't change the clutches, couldn't change the gear shift."

"Q. There is some mention in the correspondence about heating. Did you have any trouble in that connection?"

"A. As the transmission wore, it was inclined to heat more; it was heating as it was wearing."

And in regard to another defect, respondent on April 5th wrote as follows:

"Referring to the links for the universal; we are sending you a new set which are more accurately punched than the ones now in use, and I would suggest that your mechanic puts them in at his earliest convenience."

And later in November, after continual breakdowns of the tractor, respondent wrote as follows:

"Since taking the Stutes-Mar tractor apart I have come to the conclusion that it will be a waste of money, material and time to replace those parts unless there is some means of preventing the sand from entering the drums. The bearing on the right hand side in bull gear had not moved for several days prior to the breakdown, and still the shaft revolved. This bearing was packed so full of sand and oil that it required a chisel to remove it. The bevel gears also, in the transmission, replaced by Mr. Shoemaker and Mr. Martin, are worn one-eighth of an inch. It seems to me the felts inside the drum are useless, therefore, if you assemble any more tractors after this fashion you know what you will be up against. As soon as these parts arrive, please notify me and I will come to Sunnyvale."

After this letter in the fall of 1921, the following occurred on the ranch:

"Mr. Rexworthy and Mr. Lyle came there late in the fall, stating that Mr. Martin wasn't any longer in their employ, and looked over the machine and came to the conclusion that they would have to put an entire transmission in."

And the same witness further testified:

"The new transmission was not installed until February, 1922, and it was after that time that the tractor operated 11½ days. * * * After the full new transmission was put in we were able to operate the machine 11 days. After that we had gear trouble again and engine trouble developed.

"Q. Well, now, would it operate at the end of that 11 days under its own power at all?

"A. After we had put a new star or transmission connection in; that was the greatest trouble then; we couldn't hold the universal together.

"Q. Well, now, it broke down in the field at that time?

"A. Yes.

"Q. And what did you do with it then?

"A. We towed it in.

"Q. And you made a further effort to fix it after towing it in?

"A. No.

"Q. It was finally given up then, was it?

"A. As far as I remember. That was the third connection we had in the universal and each one lasted about a day and a half. We ceased to operate the tractor in April of 1922, if I am correct.

"Q. Now what was its condition when you ceased to operate it, Mr. Mackay?

"A. We couldn't change the gears, shift the gears, couldn't change from one gear to another.

"Q. How did they act?

"A. They didn't move; they were stuck, froze or something, didn't move at all, one of them didn't move.

"Q. Couldn't move at all?

"A. No. On that date, April, 1922, when we ceased to operate the tractor we towed the tractor in from the vineyard and put it in storage, in one of the buildings. It was not capable of operating at all on its own power.

"Q. Why not?

"A. Couldn't change the gears, it was always in gear, wouldn't release. I do not recall who was driving the tractor at the time we discontinued its use. We had trouble with the pistons involved in the tractor, in 1922. The rings were broken and one of the push rods was broken."

The testimony further shows that as a result of the foregoing and other deficiencies, the tractor was laid up as unfit for work for a period of 143 days during a working period of 188 days. The evidence does not show that the foregoing defects were cured by replacements. In fact, the evidence is reasonably to the effect that the replacements did not cure the defects. Furthermore, from the testimony of competent experts it could be reasonably inferred, in the absence of any testimony to the contrary, that the foregoing defects were "latent defects arising from the process of manufacture," and were inherent and existing at the time of sale. The expert witness, H. O. Montgomery, after having had his attention called to the foregoing, and other defects, stated that:

"The trouble outlined * * * would indicate to me that the tractor was not properly aligned; that the transmission power from the motor to the tracks was not in such alignment that the parts, gears particularly, meshed exactly as they should, and thereby caused trouble both with the gears and with the shafts.

"Q. Now, would you call that defect in material or workmanship?

"A. The fact that some of the parts were taken out and new parts given a different sort of heat treatment would indicate that the original parts were too soft, and that would be a question of material; as to the alignment, that would be a question, in my mind, of workmanship."

Also the same witness gave testimony, from which, in the absence of contradiction, it could reasonably be inferred as the result of the foregoing that the value of the tractor at the time of the sale with these defects inherently existing was around $400 or $500.

Also the expert witness Charles W. Gebhardt testified as regards the source of the trouble outlined as follows:

"Well, the general trouble seems to come about from defective workmanship, and possibly defective material; they overlap; because the materials evidently did not hold up for the purpose they were intended * * * as far as the bearings giving trouble is concerned, it seems to me they did not have the proper protection if sand and grit got into them * * * as far as the gears or the shaft being worn—and the gears not sliding—that can be due to the improper treatment of the materials; * * * and with respect to inaccurately punched links for the universal * * * and misalignment of the parts of the universal itself throw the shafts out of their respective angular line, so that you have a vibration set up, and this vibration is a destructive feature in any machine."

[4] As regards the contention of respondent that appellant waived his right to rely upon the foregoing implied warranty, it appears that the facts pertaining to such warranty are fully alleged in the complaint, and it further fails to appear that during the taking of evidence, which would sustain the issue so raised, that the defendant moved either to strike out such evidence or limit it to other issues. And, furthermore, since he placed his whole reliance upon a motion for a nonsuit, he was not precluded from himself introducing evidence to meet the evidence adduced by plaintiff which, as already indicated, tended to support, and did support, the foregoing issue.

The judgment is reversed.

PEOPLE v. PETTINGER. (Cr. 1725.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 10, 1928.

1. Criminal law ☞1023(8), 1134(10)—Order denying arrest of judgment is not appealable, but may be reviewed on appeal from judgment.

No appeal lies from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, but the order may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment.

2. Burglary ☞20—Information charging felonious entry into service station of named persons at particular street and boulevard in named city and county held sufficiently definite as to place of crime.

Information charging that defendant feloniously entered "Murr Bros. Service Station * * * at A street and Oxnard boulevard in the city of Oxnard, in said county of Ventura," with intent to commit the crime of theft, held not defective for failure to definitely locate place where burglary was committed.

3. Burglary ☞4—"Service station," used for sale of gasoline and auto supplies, held "building," entry into which may constitute burglary (Pen. Code, § 459).

Service station, used for sale of gasoline and auto supplies and for general merchandising, which contained door and window, and which was locked, held "building," within purview of Pen. Code, § 459, defining burglary as entry of "any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store * * * or other building"; "service station" commonly meaning a building from which gasoline and auto supplies are sold.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Building.]

4. Burglary ☞9(2)—Defendant's breaking of window in service station and introduction of arm into building held sufficient "entry" in burglary prosecution (Pen. Code, § 459).

Defendant's entry into service station by breaking window and abstracting sales register, through introduction of his arm into the building, constituted sufficient "entry" in prosecution for burglary, under Pen. Code, § 459; introduction of defendant's entire body into building being unnecessary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Entry (in Criminal Law).]

5. Jury ☞10, 31(11)—Constitutional guaranty of jury trial merely requires that jury shall try facts according to common law and does not cover procedural requirements.

Constitutional right of trial by jury merely guarantees jury trial as exercised according to the common law, and does not direct the procedure or guarantee separate trials; essence of trial by jury being that jury shall decide the controverted facts.

6. Criminal law ☞1137(8)—Jury ☞31(11)—Consolidation of issues of guilt and insanity, consented to by defendant by voluntary introduction of evidence of insanity at main trial, held not to require reversal, as prejudicial or as denying jury trial (Pen. Code, § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149).

Consolidated trial of issues of guilt and insanity, in disregard of Pen. Code, § 1026, as added by St. 1927, p. 1149, held not to require reversal, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, as prejudicial or as denying right of defendant to jury trial, where defendant voluntarily advanced evidence on issue of insanity in the main trial, and thus expressly consented to consolidation of the issues.

7. Criminal law ☞1137(2)—Appellate court will not reverse for error in proceedings to which defendant consented, or which he expressly invited.

Appellate court will not reverse a case by reason of an alleged error in the proceedings which defendant invited, or which were occasioned by his express consent, unless bound to do so by some controlling rule of law.

8. Witnesses ☞37(4)—Examination of witnesses generally as to reputation of defendant, accused of burglary, without qualifying them as character witnesses, was improper.

In prosecution for burglary, examination of witnesses who had not qualified as character witnesses as to defendant's reputation was improper; question as propounded not including traits of character involved in the crime charged.

9. Criminal law ☞829(1)—Refusal of instructions, adequately covered by instructions given, is not error.

Refusal of instructions requested is not error, where the instructions are adequately covered by those given.

10. Criminal law ☞726—District attorney's statements, by way of objection to unwarranted statements in argument of defendant's counsel, held not improper.

Statements made by district attorney, by way of objection to statements previously made by counsel for defendant, which were outside record, held not improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Edward Henderson, Judge.

Fred Pettinger was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Howell, of Ventura, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., and James C. Hollingsworth, Dist. Atty., and Don R. Holt, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Ventura, for the People.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. [1] No appeal lies from an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment, but the order may be reviewed on the appeal from the judgment. People v. Bundy, 168 Cal. 777, 145 P. 537; People v. Rogers, 163 Cal. 476, 126 P. 143. The information reads as follows:

"The said Fred Pettinger, on the 8th day of May, A. D. nineteen hundred twenty-eight, within the said county of Ventura, state of California, and before the filing of this information, did then and there, willfully, unlawfully, feloniously and burglariously enter the Murr Bros. Service Station, of N. Murr and Ellis Murr, at A street and Oxnard blvd. in the city of Oxnard, in said county of Ventura, with the felonious intent then and there to commit the crime of theft."

To this information defendant pleaded "not guilty," and "not guilty by reason of insanity." Only one trial was had and one verdict rendered, to wit: "Guilty as charged." Respondent proved that appellant, on the night of May 8, or in the early morning of May 9, 1928, drove up to the said service station in a Ford car, and, after waiting a short time, with a pair of pliers broke out a window light. He then lifted out and placed in his car a sales-registering device, and drove off. All of which the defendant subsequently admitted to the officers who arrested him, and to the court when he was sentenced.

[2] Appellant first contends that the information does not state a crime because it is indefinite as to the place where it was committed, and contends that "the location given is only a street intersection." An examination of the information, set out above, shows that the city, county, and state were given, and the location was not indefinite.

[3] It is next contended that the words "service station" do not come within the purview of section 459 of the Penal Code, which in defining burglary refers to "any house, room, apartment, tenement, shop, warehouse, store, mill, barn, stable, outhouse, or other building," etc. The evidence showed that the place which defendant entered was a store with a door containing a glass top and a window; that it was used for the sale of gasoline and auto supplies and for general merchandising. It had been closed on the night of the burglary by one of the owners, and was locked with a Yale lock. "Service station," in modern parlance, commonly means a building from which gasoline and auto supplies are sold. This use of the words "service station" indicates a building, just as do the words railway station and police station.

[4] It is next contended that the only proof of entry was that appellant broke a window and lifted out through the opening the sales register. Such an entry, however, is sufficient. It is not necessary to the commission of burglary that the defendant get his whole body into the building. The introduction of his arm is sufficient. People v. Allison, 200 Cal. 404, 253 P. 318.

It is next contended that the statute of 1927, at page 1149 (section 1026, Pen. Code), provides that, where the pleas are as in this case, there shall be two trials and two verdicts; whereas, the jury returned but one, and in that respect appellant was convicted without due process of law. Section 1026 of the Penal Code, in so far as it affects this case, reads as follows:

"When a defendant pleads not guilty by reason of insanity, and also joins with it another plea or pleas, he shall first be tried as if he had entered such other plea or pleas only, and in such trial he shall be conclusively presumed to have been sane at the time the offense is alleged to have been committed. If the jury shall find the defendant guilty, or if the defendant pleads only not guilty by reason of insanity, then the question whether the defendant was sane or insane at the time the offense was committed shall be promptly tried, either before the same jury or before a new jury, in the discretion of the court. In such trial the jury shall return a verdict either that the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed or that he was insane at the time the offense was committed. If the verdict or finding be that the defendant was sane at the time the offense was committed, the court shall sentence the defendant as provided by law. * * *"

An examination of the reporter's transcript shows that the people called four witnesses to prove the crime alleged in the information and rested. The defendant then called four witnesses in his behalf. By each of these witnesses the defendant attempted to prove his defense of insanity, and proceeded to offer what evidence he had on the question. Without any suggestion or direction from the court, the defendant proceeded under the method of trial prevailing prior to the adoption of section 1026; himself adopting the procedure, and voluntarily accepting the burden of advancing the evidence on the issue of insanity, thus expressly consenting to and inviting the order and the method of trial adopted. He made no request for separate trials, but, on the contrary, by his own conduct and by the acquiescence of the district attorney, proceeded to consolidate the trials of the issues under the plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity. The court on its part instructed the jury on the question of insanity, and likewise instructed the jury on the forms of verdict which it should return, including a form of verdict in case it found the defendant not guilty by reason of insanity.

Now, after conviction, the defendant claims the trial court erred in proceeding as it did. It will be noticed that the statute authorizes the trial court in its discretion to submit the issue of insanity to the same jury which tries the general issue. And in this case there was a mere consolidation of the trial of the two issues.

[5, 6] While the Constitution of the state of California provides that the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all persons and shall remain inviolate, the only right which it guarantees is that the citizens of the state shall have an opportunity to be tried by a jury in cases in which it is exercised in the administration of justice according to the common law. People v. King, 28 Cal. 265. It does not guarantee two separate trials by jury, and "it does not purport to direct what procedure is to be followed in the exercise of the right." People v. Hickman (Cal. Sup.) 268 P. 909. The essence of trial by jury is that controverted facts shall be decided by a jury. In the instant case the defendant had every controverted fact raised by his pleas submitted to and decided by the jury. He was permitted to interpose and to submit to the consideration of the jury every issue and every defense that would have been open to him if he had had two trials and every essential right of defendant involved in a trial by jury was safeguarded.

[7] An appellate court will not reverse a case by reason of an alleged error in the proceedings occasioned by express consent of the defendant and his counsel, unless bound to do so by some controlling rule of law. People v. Patrich, 118 Cal. 332, 50 P. 425. And it is well settled that a defendant cannot complain of errors invited by him. People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 576, 72 P. 177.

Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution was not designed to repeal or abrogate the guaranties accorded persons accused of crime by other parts of the same Constitution or to overthrow all statutory rules of procedure in criminal cases. For example, a denial to a defendant accused of a felony of a trial by jury would necessitate a reversal, even though there had been the clearest proof of guilt. People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 P. 1042. But in the instant case there was no constitutional guaranty denied and no essential right of the defendant disregarded. It appears to the satisfaction of this court that the result was just and that it would have been reached if the statutory rule of procedure had been followed.

[8] Complaint is made that the defendant was not permitted to prove his "good character and reputation." In this connection the following question was put to one of the witnesses: "Q. What kind of a reputation has he out there?" The witness had not been qualified as a character witness, and the question as propounded did not include the traits of character involved in the crime charged. Therefore, an objection was properly sustained. "Practically the same question was put to five witnesses," says the appellant, with the same objection and the same ruling.

[9] Appellant complains of the refusal of the trial court to give to the jury three instructions offered by him. These instructions, where correct and proper, were adequately covered by the instructions which were given.

[10] Lastly, appellant accuses the district attorney of improper conduct in his statements during the trial. The statements made by the district attorney were in objection to statements being made by counsel for defendant. The defendant's attorney was stating facts which were not in the evidence, and the district attorney had a right to object. But the trial court through an abundance of caution, instructed the jury to disregard the statements made by the district attorney.

Judgment and order denying motion for a new trial are affirmed.

LITTLE v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (Civ. 3567.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 10, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 9, 1928. Hearing denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Carriers ⇨283(2)—Street railway is not liable for injury resulting from act of conductor which does not fall within scope of his duties.

Any act of street car conductor, although done while he is actively engaged in discharging his duty as such, but which does not fall within scope of such duties, cannot bind street railway if injury to passenger or other person or his property be directly caused thereby, since street railway can only be held liable under doctrine of respondeat superior.

2. Carriers ⇨280(1)—Carriers of passengers for hire or reward are required to use all reasonable means to secure safety of passengers (Civ. Code, § 2100).

Under Civ. Code, § 2100, it is duty of carriers of passengers for hire or reward and their agents and employees to use all reasonable means to secure safety of their passengers, though they are not required to use every possible preventive which highest scientific skill might suggest.

3. Carriers ⇨283(2)—Conductor advising passengers to leave street car stopped in path of approaching train was acting within scope of duty.

Street car conductor, who on street car stopping on railroad track in path of approaching train, shouted for passengers to leave car, was acting within scope of his duties as such conductor.

4. Carriers $\S$ 305(5)—Injury to street car passenger thrown on sudden starting of car, which stopped on railroad tracks in path of approaching train, held result of concurrent negligence of conductor and motorman.

Where street car was stopped on railroad tracks in path of approaching train because of alleged stalling of motortruck directly in front of it, and on truck being moved motorman without signal from conductor started car after conductor had advised passengers to leave, resulting in plaintiff being injured on being thrown from car, held that it was concurrent negligence of conductor and motorman which constituted proximate cause of plaintiff's injury.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 1078(1)—Assignments of errors not argued in briefs will be presumed to have been abandoned.

Where appellant's counsel specified large number of alleged errors in trial court's rulings permitting and excluding answers, but argued only two of such assignments in their briefs, appellate court will presume that they have abandoned all others of specifications in that particular.

6. Witnesses $\S$ 276—Asking motorman whether he had ever before stopped car in path of approaching train held proper to rebut motorman's statement that he was not nervous (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055).

In action against street railway for injury to passenger, injured on sudden starting of street car after it had stopped on railroad track in path of approaching train, questions asked motorman, examined as witness by plaintiff under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055, as to whether he had ever before stopped on railroad track when there was train approaching, were proper to rebut motorman's statement that he was not at all nervous.

7. Witnesses $\S$ 414(1)—Passenger's testimony that she heard conductor call, "Everybody off," held competent as corroborative of plaintiff's testimony, which was contradicted.

In action against street railway by passenger injured on street car suddenly starting after it had stopped on railroad track in path of approaching train, testimony of another passenger that conductor called "Everybody off," was competent and relevant as corroborative of plaintiff's testimony that such exclamation was made by some one, where other passengers declared that they heard no such exclamation uttered at all.

8. Trial $\S$ 296(3)—Instruction that carriers for hire are responsible for even slightest negligence causing injuries to passengers held not erroneous when read with other instructions.

Instruction, in action by passenger against street railway for injuries, that carriers of persons for hire are responsible for any even the slightest negligence causing injury to their passengers, held not erroneous as failing to state that such negligence must be proximate cause of injury, in view of numerous charges that plaintiff could not prevail unless it was shown that injuries she received were proximately caused by negligence of defendant.

9. Trial $\S$ 295(1)—Instructions should be considered as whole, and if they correctly state applicable law, error in instruction taken alone does not require reversal.

Instructions given by court should be considered together or as a whole, and if as so considered they correctly state law applicable to case, reversal should not be had because one instruction taken alone would embrace an erroneous announcement of true rule as to one particular element of case.

10. Trial $\S$ 260(8)—Refused instruction that plaintiff could not recover if injury was proximate result of mutual fault of herself and defendant held fairly covered by given instruction.

Refused instruction requested by defendant that if plaintiff was injured as proximate result of mutual fault of herself and servant of defendant, verdict must be for defendant, held clearly covered by given instruction, from which jury could readily understand that if injuries to plaintiff were proximately caused by concurrent or mutual negligence of both plaintiff and defendant, then plaintiff could not recover.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Ramona Little against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bertrand J. Wellman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is by the plaintiff to recover damages in the sum of \$20,000 from the defendant for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the latter. The jury, to whom the issues of fact were submitted for decision, awarded the plaintiff damages in the sum of \$15,000. Judgment was entered accordingly. A motion for a new trial was presented and pressed by the plaintiff on all the statutory grounds (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 657), and the same was denied. This appeal is by the plaintiff from the judgment and supported by a bill of exceptions.

The plaintiff received the injuries of which she herein complains in the city of Los Angeles between the hours of 5 and 6 p. m. ("just in the twilight," the conductor testified) of the 12th day of November, 1924. She and other persons were, at the time mentioned, passengers on a street car of the defendant, which was traveling in an easterly direction on Macy street, in said city. It appears that a steam train of the Southern Pacific Company runs along and upon Alameda street, which street runs in a northerly and southerly direction. The defendant's tracks on Macy street run in an easterly and westerly direction. The latter's tracks on Macy street and the Southern Pacific's tracks on Alameda street cross at right angles at Macy and Alameda streets. The tracks of the steam railroad make a curve as they run into Alameda street. This curve is several hundred feet from and north of the intersection of Macy and Alameda streets. On the day and at the hour thereof stated, the defendant's car, on which the plaintiff was riding, approached from the west the point at which Macy and Alameda streets intersect. The motorman of said car proceeded to cross Alameda street. When the street car got onto the steam railway tracks the motorman of the streetcar suddenly stopped his car while it was still on the steam railway tracks. This (he stated) was because a large autotruck was stalled in front of the street car. However, coincidentally with the stopping of the street car as indicated, a train of the steam railway turned into Alameda street and proceeded in the direction of the point where the street car had been stopped and was still standing. Simultaneously with the appearance of the steam railway train on Alameda street, and as it rounded the curve at Main street, the safety gates maintained across Macy street by the defendant were closed, or "went down" behind the street car. As the steam train turned into Alameda street the towerman's bell was ringing and continued to ring as the steam train was approaching the Macy street crossing, and the headlights on the locomotive propelling the latter train reflected a bright light before the train and along Alameda street and into the street car. Upon observing the approach of the steam train, the passengers, or a large number of them, became frightened and greatly excited, and many of them about the same instant of time hurriedly left their seats and started towards the rear end of the car, where was located the only door in said car used for the egress of passengers. The passengers were for an instant bunched together at the rear end of the car, and some fell from the platform of the car, while others, from the consternation which had been produced among them, were shoved or pushed to the ground from the platform or the steps by other persons. The plaintiff in this action fell from the steps of the car and sustained the injuries complained of. These injuries were serious, so the doctor who professionally attended her testified. They consisted of a fracture of the ankle, "involving," the doctor said, "an outside bone, the fibula, about an inch above the ankle, which was broken in five pieces, and a fracture of the inside bone, which was broken once straight across; the ankle bone on which the weight of the body comes was dislocated backwards and inwards. It was a severe fracture," continued the doctor's testimony, "and there is always a good deal of swelling with a bad fracture. There was a fracture of two bones. One of them was in five or six pieces, and the other had one piece broken off." The doctor further testified that at the time of the trial (March, 1926, some 16 months after the injuries were received) the plaintiff was lame, "and it is a painful ankle, and one that does not support the body weight well. * * * She is liable to suffer pain from this injury in the future. * * * She would not be able to do anything that requires her standing on her feet, or anything of that kind." The physician expressed the opinion that she would never in the future be able to do any kind of work which might require her to stand on her feet, but that she could, of course, do work which may be done while in a sitting position.

The complaint as originally framed and filed joined the conductor and the motorman of the street car as defendants with the defendant corporation, but after both sides completed the taking of testimony in support of their respective positions in the case as made by their respective pleadings, and rested, upon motion of the plaintiff the action as to the conductor and the motorman was dismissed.

The seventh paragraph of the complaint sets forth the particular acts of negligence of the defendant which, it is alleged, were the proximate cause of the injuries plaintiff sustained, as follows:

"That the defendant railway corporation by and through its motorman, John Doe Bidwell, then and there carelessly, negligently and unlawfully caused, allowed and permitted the said street car on which the plaintiff was a passenger for hire to stop upon the said Southern Pacific steam railroad tracks, and upon which said steam railway train was approaching with a bright headlight focused upon said street car, and the conductor of said street car, Richard Roe Fort, then and there, while the said street car was stopped called, 'All out,' to the passengers on the said street car, and the motorman then and there started said street car forward with a sudden and violent jerk, while the passengers in said car were pushing and crowding to get off the same and because of the sudden starting and jerking of the said car, and the crowding and pushing of the passengers thereon, the plaintiff and other passengers were pushed and thrown off from the said street car onto the pavement where the plaintiff was left lying, and the said street car proceeded on its way; that because of the aforesaid negligence of the defendants the plaintiff received injuries as stated in the following paragraph:" (Here follows a description of the personal injuries received by the plaintiff and which is substantially the same as that given by the physician, as above shown.)

The answer specifically denies each of the material averments of the complaint, and, by way of a verbal defense, pleads contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, which negligence, it is alleged, was the direct or proximate cause of the injuries she received.

There was received at the trial a vast amount of testimony, largely that of passengers on the street car at the time of the accident, describing the excitement and the confusion among the passengers, consisting of the rushing promiscuously and frantically of the passengers towards the exit door at the rear end of the street car, when the steam railway train entered upon Alameda street and proceeded towards the point where the street car stood on the tracks of the former. It is not necessary to recite herein that testimony or the substance thereof, since counsel for the defendant, in their opening brief, make this very candid admission:

"In our opinion, the evidence was insufficient to justify a verdict against the defendant, but under the rules governing the determination of appeals, we doubt if this court can say, as a matter of law, that the defendant was not negligent, or that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. We do believe, however, that the verdict was the result of errors in law committed by the learned trial court in the admission and rejection of evidence and in the giving and refusing of instructions."

But the testimony of the plaintiff and that of another witness (a Miss Delura, who was also a passenger on the street car at the time of the mishap) may properly and, we think, should be given herein in substance. The plaintiff testified that she was a passenger on the street car at the time mentioned herein, and that, while said car was approaching the Alameda street crossing, she, with other passengers, was standing at the rear end of the car, which was then "crowded with passengers"; that, when the car had reached the tracks of the steam railway, it stopped on said tracks, at which instant of time she observed the conductor of the street car leave the car for a few seconds and then return; that she did not know whether or not the conductor, after stepping to the pavement from the car, went towards the front end thereof, but that just before or at the time he returned to the interior of the car, there was considerable excitement among and noise produced by the passengers, some of them "screaming" and rushing towards the rear end of the car; that about the same time, but after stooping and looking toward the north (the direction from which the steam railway train was approaching the street car), through a window of the street car the conductor exclaimed or yelled, "Everybody off"; that thereupon many of the passengers, including herself, in great confusion, pressed towards the steps of the car, and that while she and a few others were near the steps and about to step down and make their exit, the car was suddenly started with a jerk or lurch, with the result that she, with several other passengers were violently thrown to the pavement. On cross-examination, plaintiff stated that she did not attempt to leave the car before it was started, that it was standing still when she started to get off the car, and that (repeating) it was while she and a few others were near the steps, heeding the warning given by the conductor, that she and other passengers, in attempting to leave the car, were thrown with great force to the street by a sudden lurching forward of the car. The plaintiff was asked many questions on cross-examination relative to the circumstances immediately attending the accident, but she, in all vital particulars, faithfully adhered to the story of the accident as she told it on direct examination.

Miss Winifred Delura (above referred to) a passenger on the street car on the occasion the plaintiff received her injuries, testified, on direct, in part as follows:

"I was a passenger on an east-bound street car on Macy street, where the same crosses the railroad tracks on Alameda street, Los Angeles, on this date. The gates were down; street car stopped; gates went up and the car started again—stopped in middle of the track. The engine was approaching and everybody got excited, and the conductor said, 'Everybody off.' Just as we started to get off the car started and threw us all to the street. * * * It was about 5 or 5:15—it was just about dark. The locomotive headlight was burning; the engine bell was ringing. The locomotive was moving and about 75 or 100 feet away from the street car. When the street car stopped on the railroad track, the conductor said, 'Everybody off.' Then the passengers began to get off and got excited. Just at that moment the car started up. Miss Little and I was on the steps; the street car started with jerks and threw us both to the street, and I fell on top of her. Miss Little and I and another fellow were thrown to the street—I cannot recall his name. Miss Little was lying in the middle of the street and I was on top of her, and that man fell on top of me. * * * The car never stopped, kept right on going. A passing motorist picked us up and took us to the Receiving Hospital."

Cross-examined, Miss Delura said that at the time of the accident she was not a friend or a personal acquaintance of the plaintiff; that for the first time she learned her (plaintiff's) name "when she went to the hospital"; that she (witness) and the plaintiff were on the steps of the car when the car started with a sudden jerk. She further testified, on cross-examination:

"I was seated in the back end of the street car. The middle of the car is closed. * * * I could not see the front of the car at all; there were too many people on the car. I was seated on the left of the car, and the engine was on the left. * * * It seemed like 15 minutes from the time the street car stopped and when I got off the car; I could not say just how long. When I first saw the engine it was about 75 or 100 feet away; when I started to get out of the car, it seemed to me it was right upon us, from the arc light of the engine; * * * the engine was moving at the time I got off the car; I heard the bell ringing; I was considerably excited at the time; I thought I was going to be run into and was afraid I would be seriously hurt. I did not see the conductor, and do not know where he was—I did not turn around to look."

She stated that the exclamation, "Everybody get off," came from behind her; that she did not know the conductor, nor was she familiar with his voice, and did not know his voice from that of any other person; that she could not say definitely that it was the conductor who exclaimed "Everybody off," but that she felt sure that "it was him" who uttered those words. A statement by Miss Delura relative to the circumstances of the accident was taken and reduced to writing the day following that upon which the accident occurred. That statement was introduced in evidence by the defense. Therein she stated that, as the steam train was approaching the point at which the street car stood, some one exclaimed, "Everybody off," but that she did not know who made the exclamation. She in that statement further said that both she and the plaintiff jumped from the car.

[1-3] Since it is conceded by counsel for the defense that the state of the evidence is such that the question of the negligence of the defendant and that of contributory negligence of the plaintiff were for the jury to determine, it is not necessary to proceed further herein with an examination and review of the evidence. We will therefore proceed to consider the points of law raised herein by the defendants. First, we should notice the suggestion by counsel for the defense that it is very doubtful whether the act of the conductor in warning the passengers to leave the car, as above explained, was within the scope of his duties as conductor or agent of the defendant. Waniorek v. United Railroads, 17 Cal. App. 121, 131, 118 P. 947, is cited as lending some support to the suggestion. It is, of course, true that the defendant can only be held liable for the damage done to the plaintiff upon the doctrine of respondeat superior, and therefore any act of the conductor, although done while he is actively engaged in discharging his duties as such, but which does not fall within the scope of such duties, cannot bind the defendant, if physical injury or other damage to a passenger or other person or his property be directly caused thereby. These are elementary propositions. But common carriers of passengers for hire or reward (and plaintiff was in this case of that class) are charged with the "utmost care and diligence" for the safe carriage of their passengers (Civ. Code, § 2100). It is the duty of such carriers or their agents and employees having direct control of transportation agencies (railway trains, street cars, or other vehicles so used) to use and be prepared to use all reasonable means to secure the safety of their passengers. In other words, a carrier of persons for reward, while not required to use, for the safeguarding of its passengers against injury, "every possible preventive which the highest scientific skill might suggest," is, nevertheless, "bound to use the best precautions in known practical use to secure the safety of its passengers." Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 574, 22 P. 266, 5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175; Marovich v. Central California T. Co., 191 Cal. 295, 301, 216 P. 595. Applied to the situation as presented in the instant case, that statement of the rule means, as in effect it has been stated above, that it was the duty of the conductor to resort to any reasonable means which human agency would permit, or his judgment, under the circumstances, might suggest, that would secure the safety of the passengers. His judgment, according to plaintiff's testimony, was that the best course to be pursued by the passengers was to leave the car, and in expressing or manifesting such judgment by the warning given by him to that effect, he was clearly acting within the sphere or scope of his duties as such conductor. The case of Waniorek v. United Railroads, supra, as we understand the opinion, lays down no different rule. And it would, indeed, be strange if it did.

[4] By the foregoing observations it is not to be understood that we are holding that the act of the conductor in giving the warning or direction to the passengers to leave the car was alone the proximate cause of the accident or plaintiff's injuries. If that were all that there was to the case as to proximate cause, the direction by the conductor to the passengers that they leave the car might well have been found by the jury to have been, under the circumstances, the safest course to pursue to secure the personal safety of his passengers. But this is not the only alleged act of negligence relied upon by the plaintiff. It is alleged in the complaint, and there is testimony supporting the allegation, that as some of the passengers, including plaintiff, were in the act of leaving the car, in response to the direction by the conductor that they do so, the motorman suddenly started the car and in such manner as to cause it to start with a jerking or lurching movement. The stopping of the car on the steam railway tracks was caused, so the motorman and some other witnesses testified, by the stalling of a motortruck directly in front of the street car, and immediately upon the truck being moved from the street car tracks and the way being clear, the motorman, without any signal from the conductor, started the car. The conductor himself testified that the signal which he was required to give the motorman to stop the car or to proceed on after it had been stopped was by means of a bell, and that on the occasion in question he gave no signal at all to the motorman. It was the motorman's duty to remain standing where he stopped the car until signaled by the conductor to proceed. It was his duty, before starting, to signal the conductor that the track was clear, a fact which he was in a better position to know than the conductor, and the duty of the conductor, on receiving such signal from the motorman, to signal the latter to proceed, only, however, when the situation in the car with regard to the passengers was such as to make it safe to proceed. These were, under the circumstances, the respective duties of the conductor and the motorman, irrespective of whether there were formal rules or regulations from any source requiring such a course. That such are the customary duties of conductors and motormen of street cars is a matter of common knowledge. Thus it is plain that it was the concurrent negligence of the conductor and the motorman of the car which, as there is evidence to show and as the verdict implies, constituted the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries.

[5, 6] As to the legal points urged for a reversal, it is to be remarked that, while counsel for the defendant specify a large number of alleged errors in the trial court's rulings permitting and excluding answers to certain questions to certain witnesses, they argue in their briefs two of such assignments only, from which it is to be presumed that they have abandoned all others of the specifications in that particular. The motorman was called and examined as a witness by the plaintiff under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, among other questions propounded to him by counsel for the plaintiff, were the following: (1) "Did you ever stop before on a railroad track when there was a railroad train coming?" To which objection was made by counsel for the defendant and overruled by the court, but to which no answer was returned by the witness. (2) "Did you ever stop before on a railroad track when there was a steam train coming towards you in the nighttime with a bright headlight shining on your car?" To which objection was interposed by counsel for the defendant and the same overruled, and to which the witness answered in the negative. The purpose in asking those questions, say counsel for the plaintiff, was to rebut the statement of the motorman that, although he saw the steam railway train on the track, and the headlight of its locomotive was reflecting a bright light on the street car and the bells of warning were ringing, he was not at all nervous. The significance of the fact of the nervousness of the motorman, if he was nervous, was in that it would tend to show that, having never before as a motorman been so suddenly thrown into a situation beset by so great a peril, he became excited and nervous and as a consequence bereft of his normal mental poise, in which condition he would probably start the car with a suddenness equal to the suddenness of the appearance of the perilous situation, and thereby cause it to jerk or start with a lurching movement. Upon that theory the questions objected to were not improper. But, in any event, the questions and the answer to the last propounded were not so baleful as to justify us in holding that they played any part in bringing about the verdict. The motorman positively stated that he was not excited or nervous at the time and likewise declared that he started his car in the usual way, or without a jerking or a lurching movement.

[7] The second assignment under the present head is in the refusal by the court to strike from the testimony of Miss Delura the statement that the conductor called, "Everybody off." The ground of the motion was that the witness' statements that it was the conductor who made that exclamation involved only her conclusion or a mere assumption on her part, since she admitted that, when the exclamation was made, she did not see or was not looking at the conductor, and that she could not definitely say who made it. The motion was properly denied for at least one reason, to wit: That it was corroborative of the testimony of the plaintiff that such an exclamation was made by some one, the plaintiff positively asserting that it was the conductor. Certain of the other witnesses (passengers) declared that they heard no such exclamation uttered at all. With that testimony the testimony of Miss Delura that it was made, even if she did not know who made it, was at variance or in sharp conflict. Her testimony was competent and relevant. Its weight was, of course, a question for the jury to decide.

[8, 9] The following portion of an instruction, given by the court, is among those likewise given which the defendant contends involves a misstatement of the law:

"The plaintiff was a passenger for hire upon the street car of the defendant. The defendant is a common carrier, and common carriers of passengers bind themselves to carry safely those whom they take into their cars so far as human care and foresight will do so; that is, with the utmost care and vigilance of a very cautious person, and such carriers are responsible for any, even the slightest, negligence, causing injury to their passengers."

The criticism directed against the instruction, as it is above set forth, is that the statement therein that carriers of persons for hire "are responsible for any, even the slightest, negligence, causing injury to their passengers," is not a correct announcement of the legal principle thereby attempted to be stated, in that it fails to state that such negligence must be shown to be the proximate cause of the injury. The court, in its charge in numerous instances, stated in clear and readily understandable language, that the plaintiff could not prevail unless it was shown that the injuries she received were proximately caused by the negligence of the defendant. The instructions given by the court should be considered together, or as a whole, and if, as so considered, they correctly state the law applicable to the case, a reversal should not be had because it may happen that one instruction, taken alone, would embrace an erroneous announcement of the true rule as to any one particular phase or element of the case. See Phillips v. Hobbs-Parsons Co., 67 Cal. App. 199, 210, 227 P. 622; People v. Menden- hall, 135 Cal. 344, 346, 67 P. 325; People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 769, 100 P. 887. But, as stated, the instruction under review, and as hereinabove quoted, is a detached part of an instruction given by the court in this case. The part omitted is as follows:

"They (carriers of passengers) are required to do all that human care, vigilance and foresight reasonably can do under all circumstances to prevent accidents to their passengers, consistent with the practical operation of such cars, and if they fail in these regards and because thereof a passenger is injured who is in the exercise of reasonable care, they are liable to said passenger for all damages for injuries sustained."

The foregoing and the part hereinabove set forth were given as separate instructions in Rystinki v. Central Traction Co., 175 Cal. 336, 343, 165 P. 952, 955. The part first hereinabove quoted was criticized in that case as involving a misstatement of the law, but the court said that when the two instructions were considered together, "they correctly stated the law." It is true that the specific criticism here directed against the part of the instruction first hereinabove given was not evidently made in the case cited, as nothing is therein said regarding the omission to state in the instruction that the negligence for which the carrier would be responsible, if such negligence caused injury to a passenger, must, to bind the carrier, be the proximate cause thereof. We may assume, though, that in other parts of its charge the trial court in that case clearly explained to the jury, as was done in the instant case, that liability for the injury received by the passenger could not attach to the carrier unless the negligence of the latter was the direct or proximate cause of such injury.

[10] The defendant requested the following instruction, which the court refused to embrace within its charge:

"If the plaintiff was injured as the direct and proximate result of the mutual fault of herself and any servant or agent of the defendant, * * * then your verdict must be for the defendant. * * *"

Counsel for the defendant assert that no such instruction was given to the jury by the court. We think the principle stated in the refused instruction was fairly covered by the following, which was given by the court:

"In order, therefore, to find a verdict for the plaintiff, you must not only find from a preponderance of all the evidence that the defendant was negligent, but also that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to plaintiff, and you must further find that the evidence fails to show by a preponderance thereof that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, however slight, contributing proximately thereto; otherwise your verdict must be for the defendant."

That instruction, under a fair and reasonable construction thereof, states that a verdict for the plaintiff would not be justified if it was found that, although the negligence of the defendant was a proximate cause of the injuries, if plaintiff's negligence also contributed thereto. In other words, the instruction under a reasonable interpretation of its language, says, and the jury could readily have so understood it, that if the injuries to plaintiff were proximately caused by the concurrent or mutual negligence of both the plaintiff and the defendant, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover.

There are many other specifications involving the action of the trial court in giving, and also in refusing to give, certain instructions proposed by the defendant. We cannot give specific attention herein to all those assignments of error. Nor is it deemed necessary to do so. We have painstakingly examined the entire charge of the court and also those instructions requested by the defendant and disallowed by the court which are not specially noticed above. It is hence considered sufficient to say, in a general way, that the charge of the court embraces a full, fair and correct statement of the law applicable to a personal injury case and pertinent to the situation as it was developed and presented by the evidence. Thus also have we found that every principle of law stated in the rejected instructions which were proposed by the defendant was covered by the given instructions.

No claim is made that the damages awarded are excessive. Therefore consideration in the nature of argumentative analysis of the testimony of the physician professionally attending the plaintiff as to the extent and nature of her injuries is not called for.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Hearing by Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a hearing in the Supreme Court is denied, but such denial should not be taken as an approval of what is said by the district court of appeal with reference to the duties, as a matter of law, of the motorman and conductor under the circumstances shown in this case.

THOMSON v. CATALINA et al. (L. A. 9391.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 24, 1928.

1. Malicious prosecution $\S$ 56—Malice of each joint tort-feasor in malicious prosecution action must be proved to authorize compensatory or exemplary damages (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3294).

In actions for malicious prosecution, existence of malice in fact must be proved against each of the joint tort-feasors, in order to justify an award of either compensatory or exemplary damages under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3294.

2. Trial $\S$ 335—Jury may make awards for exemplary damages in different amounts against joint tort-feasors in malicious prosecution or other actions (Civ. Code, $\S$ 3294).

Since, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 3294, exemplary damages in addition to actual damages are to be awarded for sake of example and punishment, where defendants, though joint-feasors, in actions for malicious prosecution or other actions, have been guilty of different degrees of oppression, fraud, or malice, jury may apportion exemplary damages to make the example as well as punishment fit offense.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by A. S. Thomson against Mike Catalina and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and named defendant and certain other defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Julius V. Patrosso and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Clyde C. Triplett, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action for malicious prosecution was instituted by the plaintiff and respondent against the defendants, who are the appellants herein, and certain other persons, as to whom the action was subsequently, on motion of the plaintiff, dismissed. The plaintiff in his complaint alleged that the defendants entered into a conspiracy to wrongly and falsely charge the plaintiff with the crime of petit larceny in, the recorder's court of the city of Watts, and that, in pursuance of this conspiracy, and on May 14, 1924, Mike Catalina, one of said defendants, at the instance and instigation of the others of said defendants, filed a complaint in said court charging the plaintiff with said crime and caused his arrest and prosecution therefor, that said cause was transferred for trial to the justice's court of San Fernando township, and that upon the trial of said cause before the latter tribunal the plaintiff was acquitted of said crime. He thereupon commenced this action, alleging his right to the recovery of both compensatory and punitive damages. The answers of these several defendants put in issue the averments of the complaint, and upon a trial thereof before a jury three separate verdicts in favor of the plaintiff were returned—one against the appellant Mike Catalina in the sum of $300 compensatory damages and $200 exemplary damages, one against the appellant L. A. Edwards in the sum of $300 compensatory damages and $500 exemplary damages, and one against appellant Oscar E. Winburn in the sum of $300 compensatory damages and $1,000 exemplary damages. Upon these three several verdicts, several judgments were entered in favor of the plaintiff and against the respective appellants in the amounts named therein. A motion for new trial having been made by each of said appellants, and denied, they each took and are here prosecuting separate appeals, which by stipulation of the parties have been presented in a single transcript and also upon a single set of briefs.

The first and in fact the main contention which the appellants urge upon each of these appeals is that each of these judgments must be reversed for the reason that the jury, while awarding the same amount of compensatory damages against each of said appellants, have made an award of different amounts as exemplary damages against each, and that in an action for malicious prosecution against joint tort-feasors the damages, whether compensatory or exemplary, cannot be thus apportioned. In making this contention, the appellants place their main reliance upon two cases decided by this court. The first of these was the case of McCool v. Mahoney, 54 Cal. 491. That was an action for malicious prosecution against two defendants, wherein the jury awarded a verdict in damages against one of the defendants in the sum of $300 and against the other in the sum of $500. The judgment rendered upon such verdict was reversed by this court, which held that, in an action for malicious prosecution against several joint tort-feasors the damages could not be thus severed. An examination of the record in that case, however, shows that the sole damages sought to be recovered were compensatory damages. There can be no doubt as to the correctness of the rule thus laid down with reference to such damages. The question of the right of the jury to make such severance in an award of exemplary damages when sought was not presented in that case. The other case upon which the appellants rely is the case of Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 P. 530. That was an action for libel brought against several defendants, wherein both compensatory and exemplary damages were sought. The court instructed the jury that it was entitled to render a verdict for compensatory damages against all of the joint tort-feasors in said action, but that, as to exemplary damages, it would be justified in rendering a verdict therefor only against such of the defendants as they might find to have been actuated by actual malice in the publication of the libel complained of. It was contended upon appeal that such instruction was erroneous, but this court, while reversing the case upon other grounds, held that a proper rule of law was declared in said instruction. In its decision, however, this court, speaking through Mr. Justice Henshaw, used the following language:

"In an action for compensatory damages against joint tort-feasors—the action contemplated by section 3333 of the Civil Code—the law will not permit an apportionment of the damages, since it will not attempt to measure the degrees of culpability of the joint tort-feasors; nor in an action for malicious prosecution, where the existence of malice in fact must be found against every tort-feasor before any judgment can be rendered against him, will the law, for the same reason, admit or permit an apportionment of damages."

It is the contention of the appellants that in the reference above made to actions for malicious prosecution this court has declared it to be the rule that neither compensatory nor exemplary damages may be apportioned. It is to be noted, however, that, in the use of the language above quoted, the court was dealing with an action for libel and not an action for malicious prosecution, and hence that its reference to the damages recovered in the latter form of action is purely obiter. It is to be further noted that in the language above quoted the court appears to have been dealing solely with the question of compensatory damages, and that it was not the intention of the court to lay down in a case not before it the rule that exemplary damages may not be apportioned against the joint tort-feasors in an action for malicious prosecution, and that, on the other hand, if the writer of that opinion did intend to declare the rule that exemplary damages may not be apportioned as against several joint tort-feasors in an action for malicious prosecution, such a rule would not be supported either by reason or authority.

[1,2] It is true that in actions for malicious prosecution the existence of malice in fact must be proven against each of the joint tort-feasors in order to justify an award of either compensatory or exemplary damages. But, since exemplary damages are, under the terms of section 3294 of the Civil Code, to be awarded in addition to the actual damages and as damages "for the sake of example and by way of punishing the defendant," it would seem to be a rule of reason that, where the defendants, though joint tort-feasors, in an action for malicious prosecution, as well as in other actions, have been guilty of different degrees of oppression, fraud, or malice so as to justify a verdict or verdicts for exemplary damages under the above-quoted section of the Code, and where such damages under said section are to be awarded "for the sake of example and by way of punishing" each particular defendant according to the measure of his offending, juries should be allowed so to admeasure and apportion such exemplary damages as to make the example as well as the punishment fit the offense. This very case furnishes a most apt example of the justice of such a rule, since the evidence sufficiently showed that the defendant Mike Catalina was merely the tool of his codefendants Winburn and Edwards, the first of whom was the judge of the recorder's court and who instigated the prosecution of the plaintiff in his said court, while the latter was the city marshal of the city of Watts, who actively promoted said prosecution and sought to have the same returned to and tried before his coconspirator in said court. It was upon a showing of these facts that the trial court, upon the inquiry of the jurors, made during their consideration as to the amount of their verdict with reference to whether punitive damages could be apportioned among the several defendants, gave the following instruction:

"You are instructed that it is not necessary; the punitive damages may be found in different amounts against different defendants, if you so find."

The reasoning indulged in by this court in the case of Davis v. Hearst, supra, when that decision is read as a whole, fully justifies the application of this rule of reason to the several joint tort-feasors having different degrees of culpability and accordingly deserving different penalties in the way of exemplary damages in cases of this character; and, while the direct question has not heretofore been decided in this state, the decisions of the courts in other jurisdictions are persuasive. In Sedgwick on Damages (9th Ed.) § 352, the author quotes approvingly from the case of Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. (U. S.) 363, 14 L. Ed. 181, wherein it was said:

"In actions of trespass, where the injury has been wanton and malicious, or gross and outrageous, courts permit juries to add to the measured compensation of the plaintiff which he would have been entitled to recover, had the injury been inflicted without design or intention, something farther by way of punishment or example, which has sometimes been called 'smart money.' This has always been left to the discretion of the jury, as the degree of punishment to be thus inflicted must depend on the peculiar circumstances of each case."

In the case of Nelson v. Halvorson, 117 Minn. 255, 135 N. W. 818, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 104, also cited with approval by the above author, which was an action against two defendants for alleged false imprisonment wherein the question directly arose, the court held that a verdict in different amounts as to punitive damages against each of the defendants, depending upon their degree of culpability, should be upheld, the court saying:

"The practice of rendering verdicts against the several defendants in an action in different amounts, where their participation in the wrong sought to be redressed has not been the same in kind and motive, is not unknown in this state."

In the case of Mauk v. Brundage, 68 Ohio St. 89, 67 N. E. 152, 62 L. R. A. 478, 482, it was held that a jury might properly allow a recovery in an identical amount against all of the joint tort-feasors as compensatory damages, and a further amount against some as exemplary damages, depending upon the state of the evidence. In the case of St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. of Texas v. Thompson, 102 Tex. 89, 113 S. W. 144, 19 Ann. Cas. 1250, which was a case wherein Thompson sued a number of defendants for damages for an alleged conspiracy resulting in the wrongful expulsion of plaintiff from a labor organization, it was held that, if the jury should find that the defendants were actuated by malice in making the charges against Thompson and in wrongly procuring his expulsion, the plaintiff would be entitled, in the discretion of the jury, to recover exemplary damages against either or all of the defendants in such sum as the jury may believe should be assessed against the defendants or either of them, and that it was not necessary, as in the case of actual damages recovered, that all of the defendants should be subjected to the same verdict by way of exemplary damages.

Upon the foregoing authorities we are constrained to hold that there was no error in the instruction or in the action of the jury in relation to the making of awards for exemplary damages in different amounts in this action, depending upon what the evidence showed and the jury found to be a differing degree of culpability among these several defendants.

The next contention of the appellants is that the evidence was insufficient to justify a verdict against the appellants Winburn and Edwards. We have examined the evidence in the case, and, without attempting to review in detail the facts as shown by a somewhat extensive record, we are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict of the jury, both as to compensatory and exemplary damages against each and all of the said defendants.

The further contentions of the appellants relate to alleged errors in the rulings of the trial court upon the admission and rejection of evidence. An examination of the several objections made in the foregoing regard, in the light of the entire record in the case, convinces us that the errors thus assigned were inconsequential, and that the evidence educed as a result of these alleged erroneous rulings of the trial court was stricken out, or, if allowed to stand, was not sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal.

Upon an examination of the entire record, we are satisfied that no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court, and hence that each of these judgments should be and is hereby affirmed.

We concur: LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.

Ex parte STEIGER. (Cr. 3081.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 26, 1928.

1. Habeas corpus ☞22(1)—Writ of habeas corpus by petitioner, pleading guilty to unlawful possession of liquor and prior convictions, under return showing valid process by court of competent jurisdiction, must be discharged (Pen. Code, § 1486).

Where petitioner for habeas corpus entered plea of guilty to complaints charging unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor and prior convictions, and was sentenced to imprisonment in county jail and fine, and where return showed valid process was issued by virtue of final judgment of competent court of criminal jurisdiction under Pen. Code, § 1486, there was nothing before Supreme Court requiring action, and writ must be discharged and petitioner remanded.

2. Criminal law ☞93—Offense of possessing liquor in violation of Wright Act, held "misdemeanor" within jurisdiction of Los Angeles municipal court (Wright Act; Pen. Code, § 1486).

Offense of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor in violation of provisions of Wright

Act (St. 1921, p. 79) held "misdemeanor" within Pen. Code, § 1486, and municipal court of city of Los Angeles had jurisdiction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Misdemeanor.]

3. Intoxicating liquors ☞242—Imprisonment in county jail and fine for possessing liquor after prior convictions for similar offenses, held proper penalty (Wright Act).

Imprisonment in county jail and fine for possessing intoxicating liquor, in violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), after prior convictions for similar offenses, held proper penalty under provisions of state prohibition statute.

4. Holidays ☞5—Sentences, if imposed after 12 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, would be void.

Sentences, if imposed after 12 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, a holiday, would be void.

5. Holidays ☞5—Court had jurisdiction to pronounce judgment when it was competent to act if sentences were imposed after 12 o'clock on Saturday afternoon.

If sentences were imposed after 12 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, a holiday, court had jurisdiction to pronounce judgment at time when it was competent for it to act.

6. Criminal law ☞991(1)—Sentences based on three several judgments for possessing liquor held properly made to run consecutively (Wright Act).

Where petitioner for habeas corpus was convicted under three several judgments for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, in violation of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), provision that sentences should run consecutively was not error.

7. Criminal law ☞1213—Punishment of imprisonment in county jail and fine for unlawful possession of liquor after prior convictions for similar offenses held neither cruel nor inhuman (Wright Act).

Punishment for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, in violation of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), under complaint charging two prior convictions of similar offenses, of imprisonment in county jail and fine, held neither cruel nor inhuman.

In Bank.

Application by Louis A. Steiger for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles to secure the release of petitioner on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction. Writ denied.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. J. Lickley, City Pros. Atty., and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy Pros. Attys., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. Petition for habeas corpus. Petitioner is held in restraint under and by virtue of commitments based on three several judgments rendered by the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, certified copies of which, together with certified copies of the complaint in each referred to, are attached to the return to the writ. (Other than treating the petition for the writ as a traverse, the petitioner has not denied or controverted any of the facts or matters set forth by the respondent.)

[1] Petitioner was charged in each complaint with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, in violation of the provisions of the Wright Act. St. 1921, p. 79. In each of the complaints it is also alleged that the petitioner had suffered two prior convictions of a similar offense. He entered a plea of guilty to each complaint of the crime of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor after prior convictions of similar offenses, and was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail, and fined. From the return it appears that the situation is one in which valid process has been issued by virtue of the final judgment of a competent court of criminal jurisdiction. Pen. Code, § 1486. It is patent, therefore, that there is nothing before the court requiring action, and the writ may well be discharged. In re Kolb, 60 Cal. App. 198, 199, 212 P. 645; In re Collins, 151 Cal. 340, 342, 90 P. 827, 91 P. 397, 129 Am. St. Rep. 122.

[2, 3] Even were that not so, we are of the view that the contention made by the petitioner must be decided against him. The offenses charged were misdemeanors within the definition of the Penal Code of this state, and the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles had jurisdiction. In re Wilson, 196 Cal. 515, 523, 238 P. 359; In re Luna, 201 Cal. 405, 257 P. 76. The penalties to which the petitioner was subjected were properly imposed under the provisions of the state prohibition statute. Ex parte Humphrey, 64 Cal. App. 572, 222 P. 366.

[4-7] It is claimed that the sentences were void because the petitioner was first sentenced after 12 o'clock on a Saturday afternoon, a holiday. That fact does not appear in the record, and, if that were so, the sentences were void. But the court had jurisdiction to pronounce judgment, as it later did, at a time when it was competent for it to act. In re Dal Porte, 198 Cal. 216, 244 P. 355. No legal obstacle stood in the way of making the sentences of the petitioner run consecutively, and the punishment inflicted was neither cruel nor inhuman.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner is remanded.

Ex parte IRVIN. (Cr. 3129.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 26, 1928.

1. Intoxicating liquors ☞93—Los Angeles municipal court had jurisdiction over prosecutions for unlawful possession and sale of liquor after prior convictions (Wright Act).

Prosecution for unlawful possession and sale of intoxicating liquor after prior convictions of similar offenses, in violation of Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), held within jurisdiction of municipal court of city of Los Angeles.

2. Criminal law ☞94—$500 fine or imprisonment until paid, not exceeding 50 days for possessing liquor, and $200 fine and 18 months imprisonment for selling liquor after prior convictions, held within Los Angeles' municipal court's jurisdiction (Volstead Act, § 29; 27 USCA § 46).

Under Volstead Act, § 29 (27 USCA § 46), adopted in California Prohibition Act, penalty for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors of fine of $500, or, in default thereof, imprisonment in city jail in proportion of one day's imprisonment for each dollar of fine until paid, not exceeding 50 days, and penalty for sale of liquor after prior conviction of $200 fine and imprisonment for 18 months in city jail, held not in excess of jurisdiction of municipal court of Los Angeles.

3. Fines ☞12—Imprisonment for possessing liquor if fine was not paid, not exceeding 50 days, held proper (Wright Act; Pen. Code, § 1446; Volstead Act, § 29; 27 USCA § 46).

Provision in commitment by municipal court for unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor in violation of the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79), directing imprisonment until fine be satisfied, in proportion of one day's imprisonment for each dollar of fine, not exceeding 50 days, was proper, though Volstead Act, § 29 (27 USCA § 46), adopted in California Prohibition Act, made no provision for imprisonment for nonpayment of fine, since, in absence of such provision, section 1446 of the Penal Code controls.

Application by John Irvin for writ of habeas corpus, prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police in the City of Los Angeles to secure the release of petitioner on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

Cooper & Collings, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. J. Lickley, City Pros. Atty., and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy Pros. Attys., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, C. J. Complaints were filed against the petitioner in the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles, charging him with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor and the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor after prior convictions of similar offenses, all in violation of the provisions of the Wright Act. St. 1921, p. 79. Upon arraignment, the defendant pleaded guilty to the offense of the sale of intoxicating liquor, as charged in the complaint, and admitted the prior conviction. He also pleaded guilty to the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. Thereafter the court pronounced judgment and sentence that, for the crime of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, the petitioner pay a fine of $500, or, in default thereof, be imprisoned in the city jail of the city of Los Angeles in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for each and every dollar of said fine, until the fine was wholly satisfied, not exceeding 50 days; and that, for the crime of the sale of intoxicating liquor after prior conviction of a similar offense, the petitioner pay a fine in the sum of $200 and be imprisoned in the Los Angeles city jail for the term of 18 months.

In this proceeding the petitioner contends that the municipal court of the city of Los Angeles was without jurisdiction to entertain the complaints, and further, that, if the offense was a misdemeanor only, the imprisonment imposed was in excess of the court's jurisdiction, it being his contention that the offense was one for which the court could impose only a fine.

[1-3] The contention that the court was without jurisdiction is answered by the decision of this court in Re Steiger (Crim. No. 3081) 271 P. 201, this day handed down. The question is not new, and the decisions cited in the Steiger Case dispose of the matter.

The penalties imposed upon the petitioner were not in excess of the court's jurisdiction. Section 29 of the Volstead Act (27 USCA § 46) prescribing the penal provisions which were adopted in the California Prohibition Act, provides that:

"Any person who manufactures or sells liquor in violation of [the act] shall for a first offense be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding six months, and for a second or subsequent offense shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $2,000 and be imprisoned not less than one month nor more than five years."

The provision in the first commitment directing the imprisonment of the defendant until the fine be satisfied in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for each and every $1 of the fine, not exceeding 50 days, was proper. In re Kennerly, 190 Cal. 774, 214 P. 857. The fact that the Volstead Act makes no provision for imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine did not prevent the municipal court from committing the petitioner to jail in default of payment of the fine imposed. In the absence of such provision, section 1446 of the Penal Code controls. Ex parte Garrison, 193 Cal. 37, 223 P. 64.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded.

PEOPLE v. BODEY. (Cr. 1480.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 22, 1928.

1. Criminal law $\S$ 678(1)—All lewd acts testified to by prosecutrix as committed at same time and place were of res gestæ, and showed one transaction (Pen. Code, § 288).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for committing lewd conduct with child, testimony by prosecutrix that seven separate acts were committed on same afternoon, at same place, and by same person, on same person, showed one transaction, prosecution resting on first act mentioned, and all facts recited were of res gestæ.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 678(5)—Failure to require election, not requested, of specific act of lewdness from acts occurring at same time and place, held not error (Pen. Code, § 288).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for committing lewd conduct with child, where prosecutrix testified to seven separate acts by defendant occurring at same time and place, and information specified act committed on or about certain date, and defendant made no request for election of specific act, court did not err in failing of own motion to specify specific act or to require district attorney to elect specific act.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 789(8)—Instruction to acquit if satisfied to moral certainty beyond reasonable doubt of innocence, followed by instruction to acquit if jury had reasonable doubt of guilt, held proper (Pen. Code, § 288).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for committing lewd conduct with child, instruction to acquit if jury was satisfied to moral certainty beyond reasonable doubt that defendant did not commit acts charged, followed by instruction to acquit if jury had reasonable doubt whether or not defendant committed alleged acts, was not error.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 823(1)—Instruction to ignore instructions found inapplicable held improper but not prejudicial, where following instruction against prejudice (Pen. Code, § 288).

In prosecution under Pen. Code, § 288, for committing lewd conduct with child, instruction that jury might ignore any instruction which they found was not applicable to case, though improperly given, was not prejudicial, where instruction immediately followed instruction against passion, prejudice, and sympathy.

John J. Taaffe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The defendant was convicted of violating section 288 of the Penal Code, he made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and he has appealed from the order and from the judgment of conviction.

We will discuss all of the points made by the defendant, but not in the order stated in his brief.

When instructing the jury, the trial court read to it a charge containing nineteen paragraphs. Among others, were the following:

"XI. Testimony has been permitted by the court tending to prove other alleged acts of lewd and lascivious conduct of the defendant toward said Eleanor Torosian prior to the alleged act charged in the information. This evidence was permitted to be introduced for the purpose, and only for the purpose of proving lewd and lascivious disposition and tendency of the defendant to commit lewd and lascivious acts. This evidence is not introduced to prove distinct offenses and the defendant is not on trial for any such other alleged acts, other than are set forth in the information.

"XII. If from all the evidence you are satisfied to a moral certainty beyond a reasonable doubt that on or about the first day of May, 1927, in the City and County of San Francisco, the defendant John Ross Bodey did commit lewd and lascivious conduct upon and with the body and members of one Eleanor Torosian, then and there a female child of about ten years of age, as charged in the information, then it is your duty to return a verdict finding the defendant guilty.

"XIII. If from all the evidence you are satisfied to a moral certainty beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did not commit the alleged acts charged in the information, then it is your duty to return a verdict finding the defendant not guilty.

"XIV. If from all the evidence you entertain a reasonable doubt whether or not the defendant did commit the alleged acts charged in the information, then it is your duty to return a verdict finding the defendant not guilty."

"XVIII. The fact that the court has instructed you upon certain phrases of law is not to be deemed by you that the court necessarily feels that such instructions are necessarily applicable to the case. If from the facts you find that any such instruction is not applicable to the case, then it is your duty to ignore such instruction."

[1, 2] The defendant contends that the court erred in its failure to elect and specify in its instructions to the jury a single or specific crime out of several, shown by the evidence to have been committed on or about the 1st day of May, 1927. The question arises in this manner. The prosecutrix testified to seven separate acts on the afternoon of the 1st day of May, 1927. The information specified an act committed "on or about the 1st day of May, 1927." The district attorney did not elect to stand on any one specific act of the seven acts testified to. The defendant made no request that an election be made. The court gave the jury instruction XI, supra, and did not give any other instruction regarding an election. The defendant claims that the trial court erred because it did not of its own motion specify a specific act out of the seven acts or require the district attorney to do so. He cites and relies on People v. Hatch, 13 Cal. App. 521, 109 P. 1097, and People v. Martinez, 57 Cal. App. 771, 208 P. 170. Neither case is in point under the facts. Every one of the acts testified to by the prosecutrix was, she testified, committed on the same afternoon, on the same couch, in the same basement, of the same house, by the same person, on the same person. Under these circumstances the prosecution's case rested on the first act mentioned by the prosecutrix. The facts showed one transaction, and all of the facts recited were of the res gestæ. People v. Kafoury, 16 Cal. App. 718, 117 P. 938; People v. Gilmore, 17 Cal. App. 737, 121 P. 697; People v. Cornell, 29 Cal. App. 430, 155 P. 1026; Renfro v. State, 84 Ark. 16, 104 S. W. 542, 544.

[3] The defendant quotes instruction XIII, supra, and claims it is error. It is not. It is unquestionably sound as far as it goes. But it does not go as far as the defendant is entitled to have it go. However, in the very next instruction, XIV, supra, the court stated the rule as clearly and as broadly as the defendant could possibly ask. The verdict of the jury shows that in the minds of the jurors the case of the defendant did not fall under either instruction, but did fall under instruction XII, supra, which is not questioned as being sound in law. The argument of the defendant assumes that the instruction XIII was worded as follows:

"If from all of the evidence you are not satisfied to a moral certainty beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did not commit the alleged acts charged in the information, then it is your duty to return a verdict finding the defendant guilty."

Had it been so worded, it would have been erroneous for many reasons, and would have created a conflict. However, it will be noted at once that the instructions as given contained no conflicts.

[4] Finally, the defendant complains because the court gave instruction XVIII, supra. The complaint is not without merit. The instruction should not have been given. In some cases it might lead to confusion and perhaps to a greater degree of error. But in the instant case we cannot say that it did any harm. In the instruction immediately preceding, the court had instructed against "passion, prejudice and sympathy," etc. Now if the jurors concluded that they and each of them were not imbued with passion, prejudice, or sympathy, certainly they were entitled to take the next step and conclude that although the rule as stated was sound it had no application to them. So concluding, the jurors might with all propriety "ignore the instruction" and proceed to deliberate on the matters of import that were in truth and in fact before them. Be this as it may, there is nothing in the entire record on which we can base a conclusion that the defendant was in the least prejudiced by the instruction as given.

We think the judgment and order should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. PASSINTINO. (Cr. 1487.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 16, 1928.

1. Intoxicating liquors ⇐236(19)—Conviction of possession of still held supported by the evidence.

Evidence on prosecution for possession of still used in manufacture of intoxicating liquor held to support conviction, notwithstanding defendant's claim of lease to another.

2. Criminal law ⇐720½—Prosecuting attorney's statement, in argument, that he would not ask for conviction if he did not believe defendant guilty, held within proper limits and not prejudicial.

Prosecuting attorney's statement that, if he did not believe defendant guilty, he would not stand before the jury and ask for a conviction, made in the course of argument to the jury, and in reply to a suggestion that the prosecution had some connection with the dry issue, and after he had denied such connection, was within the latitude in argument to which he was entitled under the circumstances, and was not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Frank Passintino was convicted of possession of a still, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Peckham, of San Jose, and Hugh L. Smith and Chas. J. Wiseman, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CASHIN, J. The defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court of Santa Clara county with a felony, to wit, that on January 24, 1928, he did wilfully, unlawfully, and knowingly have in his possession and control a still and stilling device intended for use and used in the manufacture and production of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes. A jury returned a verdict of conviction, and from a judgment entered thereon and an order denying a new trial the appeal was taken.

It is contended as grounds for reversal that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict; that the verdict was against law; that the court erroneously instructed the jury; and that certain statements by the prosecuting attorney constituted prejudicial misconduct.

[1] The evidence showed that the defendant with his family occupied a dwelling situated on a 40-acre ranch the title to which stood in the name of defendant's wife; that in the rear of the dwelling distant about 60 feet was a barn, a part of which was used as a garage; that between 350 and 400 feet further to the rear was a shed or stillhouse in which was found the still in question. Between the garage and stillhouse wires were strung, by means of which a bell in the stillhouse could be rung, and it was also shown that electric wires used for lighting the stillhouse were connected with the dwelling mentioned. On the evening of defendant's arrest, which occurred at the dwelling, the officers found no fire burning under the still; but its contents, consisting of a mash of apricots and other ingredients, were hot, and from a pipe leading therefrom alcohol was dripping into a container. The officer testified that the clothing worn by the defendant at the time of his arrest bore the odor of the contents of the still, and defendant admitted at the trial that he knew that the still was being operated and that he had seen it in operation, and also that the electricity used for lighting the stillhouse was charged to him. He denied ownership or possession of the still, however, claiming that the premises with the exception of the dwelling house and the part of the barn used as a garage had been leased to one Ferrente, and that the latter or his agents were in possession of the stillhouse and its contents. Instruments purporting to show the interest of Ferrente to be as claimed were introduced in evidence, but the character of the testimony of the defendant and one Di Salvo as to the identity of the lessee and the circumstances under which the lease was executed were such that the jury might reasonably have believed the transaction to have been contrived to conceal the true facts and that the lessee named had no existence. The conclusions of the jury were fully supported by the evidence and should not be disturbed.

[2] The prosecuting attorney in the course of his argument to the jury stated, in substance, that if he did not believe the defendant to be guilty he would not stand before the jury and ask for a conviction. This statement appears to have been made in reply to a suggestion by the defense that the prosecution had some connection with the dry issue. This the prosecuting officer denied, and in his argument made the remark to which defendant excepted. As stated by the trial court, counsel was under the circumstances entitled to some latitude in his argument, and we are of the opinion that the remark was not prejudicial.

It is further contended that the court in its instructions unduly emphasized certain evidence which bore most strongly against the defendant, and that its conduct in this respect materially prejudiced his rights. Defendant offered no instructions, and a reading of those given, by which the jury was fully advised as to the law of the case, shows no reasonable ground for complaint in the respect claimed by defendant. The record shows that the verdict was fully supported, and discloses no error which could fairly be said to have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HOBSON v. KING. (Civ. 6313.)

Judgment ¶587—Judgment for defendant in suit to set aside contract held not res judicata against right to recover on the contract (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908, 1911).

Judgment for defendant in suit to set aside for fraud contract, entered into by spouses to settle and adjust their property rights prior to obtaining divorce, in view of issues, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1908, 1911, declaring a judgment, as to matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties in subsequent action, and that that only is deemed to have been adjudged in former judgment which appears on its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, held not res judicata against right of plaintiff in subsequent action, to recover moneys due under the contract, as claimed by defendant, based on a claimed finding in prior suit that plaintiff had received articles exceeding in value what defendant was required to pay under the contract, and that therefore judgment was given for defendant in such suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; P. F. Gosbey, Judge.

Action by Leona H. Hobson against Loui F. King. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Owen D. Richardson, of San Jose, for appellant.

Clarence M. Booth, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

BUCK, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action brought by the plaintiff to recover from the defendant the balance due upon a written contract for the payment of money in the sum of $3,500. The contract in question was entered into between the parties who were at that time husband and wife, for the purpose of settling and adjusting their property rights prior to the obtaining of a divorce. After the divorce was obtained, the plaintiff brought an action to rescind and set aside the contract in question upon the grounds of fraud and undue influence exercised by the defendant, and in such action also sought to have the court adjudicate the property rights of the parties. The court, adopting the advisory verdict of the jury, found that the contract in question was procured through the fraud and undue influence of the defendant, but further found in accordance with a separate defense of the defendant that "an interlocutory judgment of divorce was duly and regularly made, given and entered wherein and whereby it was adjudged that all property rights between the parties hereto had been settled."

Judgment was accordingly given in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. In the present action upon the contract it is alleged in the complaint that no part of the sum agreed to be paid under the contract except the sum of $1,300 has been paid, and the court so found. But the court further found that the action herein on the contract was barred by the judgment in the prior suit brought to set aside and to rescind the contract, and gave judgment for defendant, from which plaintiff appeals.

The rule of course is clear as laid down in sections 1908 and 1911 of our Code of Civil Procedure, that a judgment or order is, in respect to the matter directly adjudged, conclusive between the parties litigating for the same thing under the same title and in the same capacity; and—"that only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein or necessary thereto."

An examination of the judgment roll in the prior suit in equity fails to reveal that the parties therein litigated or sought to litigate anything except plaintiff's rights to have the contract rescinded on the grounds of defendant's alleged fraud and undue influence, so that the property rights between the parties could be adjudicated irrespective of such contract. Furthermore, it does not appear upon the face of the judgment in such prior suit that anything else was adjudged or that any matter pertaining to the present suit on the contract was "actually and necessarily included" in the judgment in the prior action in equity, or necessary thereto.

As stated by this court in a recent decision, Hutchison v. Reclamation Dist. No. 1619 et al., reported in volume 81 Cal. App. 427, 437, 254 P. 606, at page 610:

"It is unnecessary to analyze the cases cited by respondent which support the general rule that a judgment is conclusive not only as to the subject-matter in controversy, but also as to every other matter that was or might have been litigated in the action. It is sufficient to say that this rule is not always applicable literally, but that: 'What is really meant by this expression is, that a judgment is conclusive upon the issues tendered by the plaintiff's complaint.' Concannon v. Smith, 134 Cal. 14, 18, 66 P. 40, 42; Brown v. Brown, 170 Cal. 1, 6, 147 P. 1168; Lang v. Lang, 182 Cal. 765, 768, 190 P. 181; Linforth v. Montgomery, 195 Cal. 49, 58, 231 P. 735. Thus, where a right has accrued subsequent to the former trial, and an issue was not tendered or determined in the former trial and was not necessary to a complete disposition of the issues tendered, it could not be said that the former judgment would, in every case, be conclusive as to that issue."

Also, as stated in Freeman on Judgments (5th Ed.) Vol. 2, par. 679, at page 1435:

"More than one cause of action may grow out of the same contract. So also more than one may arise respecting the same piece of property. Hence, the identity of the contract or the property is not conclusive as to the identity of causes of action. Thus, the denial of relief in a suit in equity to rescind a contract for alleged fraudulent representations inducing it does not bar a subsequent action at law to recover the consideration paid, after a rescission for failure to perform the contract. Newhall v. Enterprise Min. Co., 205 Mass. 585, 91 N. E. 905, 137 Am. St. Rep. 461."

But in this court, and in the face of the foregoing, the sole and only contention of learned counsel for the respondent in support of his judgment is that:

"The whole point of controversy in the previous action was the contract upon which the present suit was based, and which the court in the previous case found has been fully complied with by respondent," and "the court in the previous case found that appellant had received from respondent money and furniture exceeding in value the amount required to be paid to appellant by respondent under the contract, and therefore gave judgment in favor of respondent."

But, as already indicated, in the prior action the only reference to property would be for the purpose of enabling the court, in the event the contract was set aside, to proceed to make a proper division of the separate and community property of the parties. And in this connection it was alleged in the complaint in the prior action that—

"At the time of the execution of said purported separation agreement, the community property of this plaintiff and said defendant, Loui F. King, consisted of * * * also certain household furniture which was and still is of the value of about three thousand ($3,000) dollars, and also silverware and glassware which was and still is of the value of about two thousand ($2,000) dollars. * * *

Answering that particular allegation, the defendant in his answer—

"denies that the household furniture of the plaintiff and Loui F. King was community property, and alleges that the same was separate property of Loui F. King; and denies that said household furniture was of the value of $3,000 or any other sum, except as hereinafter stated, and denies that said silverware or glassware or any portion thereof was community property, or that its value was $2,000 or any other sum except as hereinafter stated, and in that behalf this defendant alleges that furniture, silverware and glassware was the separate property of this defendant, and was of the value of $4,000 and no more."

And on the foregoing subject-matter of furniture, etc., the court made the following and only findings:

"That the furniture, silverware and glassware, including the furniture received and accepted by the plaintiff, was and now is of the value of $2,500, and all said furniture, silverware and glassware now in the possession of the defendant was and now is his separate property, except a certain lot of silverware of the value of $285 which was community property."

And, as a separate attempted defense to the prior suit in equity to set aside the contract, the defendant further alleged in his answer:

"That subsequent to the execution of the written agreement mentioned and set forth in plaintiff's complaint, plaintiff, without the consent of defendant, obtained possession of a large part of the furniture, silverware and glassware mentioned in plaintiff's complaint and converted the same to her own use. That said property so converted was and is of the value of $2,500."

"That defendant is informed and believes, and therefore alleges that since the execution of said agreement plaintiff has had and received, to and for the use of defendant the sum of $2,500, and no part of said sum has been repaid to defendant, and the whole thereof is now due, owing, payable and unpaid from plaintiff to defendant."

And, on the above matter covered by the separate defense, the court made the following and only findings:

"Regarding the separate defense set forth in the answer of the defendant, the court finds that it is not true that subsequent to the execution of the written agreement mentioned and set forth in plaintiff's complaint, plaintiff, without the consent of the defendant, or otherwise or at all, has had and received, or had or received, to and/or for the use of defendant the sum of $2,500 or any sum."

Furthermore the suit in equity was begun prior to March 6, 1922, and at that time about $2,000 under the contract was not yet payable.

From all of the foregoing it is therefore evident that in the suit in equity the court neither made nor expressly or impliedly attempted to make any finding as claimed by respondent that:

"The contract upon which the present suit is based * * * had been fully complied with by respondent."

Nor does the above record bear out the contention that:

"The court in the previous case found that appellant had received from respondent money and furniture exceeding in value the amount required to be paid to appellant by respondent under the contract and therefore gave judgment in favor of respondent."

And furthermore there was no proper issue made upon which any such finding could be based.

It appearing from the record on appeal that, in defendant's answer, the execution of the contract sued on is admitted, and it further appearing that the court specifically found that "no part of the sum agreed to be paid by defendant to plaintiff under the terms of said written agreement has been paid, save and except the sum of one thousand three hundred ($1,300) dollars, which is the aggregate amount of payments provided for in said written agreement up to and including the 10th day of August, 1921," it is ordered that the judgment be reversed, and that the trial court enter judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant in the sum of $2,200 with interest on the monthly installments of $50 per month, said interest to be computed from the due date of each unpaid installment commencing with September 10, 1921, and costs.

The plain terms of a contract cannot be varied by evidence of what one of parties supposed it to mean.

3. Evidence $\S$ 457—Under contract calling for broken white bottle glass, buyer cannot show that broken white glass bottles were intended because previous sales had been of latter commodity.

Where contract for sale called for broken white bottle glass, held that, there being no claim of fraud or mistake, buyer could not show that, because in several sales prior to one in question goods were described as broken white glass bottles, contract in question was intended to cover broken white glass bottles, since it would be in effect asserting in written contract term not found therein and contradicting unambiguous terms thereof.

4. Sales $\S$ 87(3)—Breach of contract for sale of broken white bottle glass on theory that broken white glass bottles should have been delivered held not shown.

Breach by seller of contract for sale of broken white bottle glass held not shown by contention of buyer that broken white glass bottles should have been delivered, since, if there is no difference between two, delivery of either would satisfy contract, and, if there is a recognized trade difference, terms of contract prevail, and delivery of broken white bottle glass satisfied contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Action for breach of contract by J. M. Da Rocha, an individual doing business under the name of J. M. Da Rocha & Co., against G. H. Corse, Jr., an individual doing business under the name of G. H. Corse, Jr. & Co. From the portion of the judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Resleure & Light, of San Francisco, for appellant.

F. Eldred Boland and Knight, Boland & Christin, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PARKER, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff brought his action in two counts, seeking damages alleged to have been sustained by him from defendant's breach of contract. Plaintiff recovered on the first count, and judgment was for defendant on count No. 2.

Defendant appeals from the judgment in favor of plaintiff on count 1, and plaintiff makes no appeal from that part of the judgment adverse to him. Therefore throughout we will deal exclusively with the cause of action involved in this appeal; namely, count No. 1.

The complaint alleges that in December, 1924, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff and plaintiff agreed to buy from defendant 100 tons broken white glass bottles at $19 per ton, cost and freight delivered at Hongkong; that prior to the delivery of said merchandise plaintiff paid to defendant the sum of $1,900, and, in addition thereto, paid freight and insurance to Hongkong from San Francisco; that defendant delivered to plaintiff certain broken glass bottles of an inferior quality, in that the same were a mixture of white bottle glass as distinguished from broken white glass bottles, and white glass residue, with a percentage of powdered glass, to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of $420.76. The answer of defendant denied specifically the allegations of the complaint.

The court below found the allegations of the complaint to be true, and judgment was awarded plaintiff for the full amount prayed.

On this appeal the appellant presents two principal grounds for a reversal: First, it is his claim that the evidence is uncontradicted that he fully complied with his contract; second, even if it can be determined that there was a breach on his part, nevertheless plaintiff has not shown wherein any damage, actual or constructive, followed.

It appears that in December, 1923, the business relations between the parties commenced. There is no evidence as to what, if any, negotiations preceded the first sales, or whether those sales occurred in the nature of an ordinary "over the counter" transaction without written or other contract than the generally implied contract attached to all sales. From December 10, 1923, to and including October 4, 1924, defendant made eight shipments of merchandise to plaintiff, all of which were apparently satisfactory; at least no complaint was made concerning the same. In the invoices accompanying these shipments, we find in six instances the goods described as "broken white glass bottles," and in the other two the description is "broken white bottle glass." Practically the whole contention here is that plaintiff ordered and paid for broken white glass bottles and received broken white bottle glass; that is, in so far as the claim of damages here made is concerned. By way of explanation, it may be here noted that the term "broken white glass bottles" means just what the words indicate; in other words, white glass that has been blown or manufactured into bottles and broken up. The term "broken white bottle glass" means white glass that has not been blown into bottles. The material in either case is exactly the same, of the same chemical composition, and each possessing the same qualities, chemically and otherwise.

The only contract between the parties appears from certain writings as evidenced by letters and cablegrams. On October 7, 1924, appellant offered to furnish respondent certain quantities of broken white bottle glass. After certain bargaining as to price, the respondent on December 4, 1924, cabled appellant as follows:

"We accept $19.30 50 short tons broken white bottle glass Feby. clearance, 50 tons March clearance."

It will be seen from the above that the contract was to buy and sell broken white bottle glass.

The court below stated that the only question before the court was whether the merchandise to be delivered should have been broken bottles or bottle glass, and this theory of the issues was affirmed by all counsel.

[1] The theory of respondent here advanced is that, irrespective of the written contract, the buyer respondent had a right to rely upon the previous course of dealing, and that, notwithstanding the use of the term "broken bottle glass," he had the legal right to demand broken glass bottles as had been theretofore shipped. There is nothing before us, nor was there anything presented in the court below, indicating the nature of the contract or the order or agreement under which the prior shipments had been made. If it is true that the commodities named are each of a distinct trade class, it must be assumed that those dealing therein knew the classification. If, on the other hand, the terms were used interchangeably, the difference would be one of quality only, and any representations as to the quality would be necessarily a matter of contract.

Respondent offered evidence to show that in the trade there is a recognized distinction between broken glass bottles and broken bottle glass, while appellant sought to show that both terms referred to one and the same thing. Accepting this as an issue in the case, we are bound by the trial court's determination thereof; a conflict being apparent. Therefore we accept as a fact the distinction existing, and will treat the commodities as separate as though reference were being made to coal and ice.

From this standpoint it would result in an absurdity if one could argue that he had received seven or eight shipments of coal, and that thereafter upon a contract specifying ice he ought to again receive coal. The respondent further showed that broken bottle glass, conceding all that respondent claims, was not a worthless article or a thing without a commercial use and value. His evidence in this respect showed that it differed from broken glass bottles only in saleability, in that the Chinese, the chief users thereof, were not equipped to use it as readily as the broken bottles, and for that reason there was a price differential of $4 per ton in Hongkong. This condition was known for many years, according to respondent's contention.

With all of these facts, respondent nevertheless contracted for and received broken bottle glass, an inferior article of distinct grade and classification. His contention here amounts to no more than a claim then that his contract must have included a warranty separate and distinct from the written provisions thereof and resting upon prior dealings or upon an assumption. Such a warranty cannot be read into the contract that is before us. It might be that, if it had been shown that the term "white bottle glass" had by a general custom and usage been understood as meaning broken glass bottles, the evidence of prior shipments would be material in support of the proof of custom. But the mere fact that it happened that broken bottles had been previously shipped stands here alone. For aught that appears in the record before us, the price may have been different and the order might have specifically referred to broken white bottles. It seems quite clear that, if plaintiff was familiar with the grades and classification, he should have specified the same in his contract. There is no question of fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation involved here; the issue is solely on the breach of contract, with the damages alleged to have ensued.

[2, 3] As indicated, there is no claim that broken bottle glass meant or was understood in the trade to mean broken glass bottles, and in fact all of the case of plaintiff is to the effect that the two were in no wise identical. The plain terms of a contract cannot be varied by evidence of what one of the parties supposed it to mean. Estate of Gurnsey, 177 Cal. 211, 170 P. 402. It would be clearly beyond any recognized principle of law, in the absence of a claim of fraud or mistake, to permit a buyer to show that, because in prior dealings with the seller he had purchased certain articles, a contract calling for an article of different class or grade was intended to describe the commodity originally purchased. It would in effect be inserting in the written contract a term not found therein and varying and contradicting the unambiguous terms thereof. United Iron Works v. Outer Harbor Co., 168 Cal. 81, 141 P. 917. See, also, Germain Fruit Co. v. Armsby, 153 Cal. 585, 96 P. 319; Kullman, Salz & Co. v. Sugar Co., 153 Cal. 725, 96 P. 369. The doctrine of the cited cases is affirmed and approved in the more recent case of Nimmo v. Fitzgerald (Cal. Sup.) 261 P. 1015.

[4] Summing up, we find respondent in this situation: If there is no difference between broken white glass bottles and broken white bottle glass, there was no breach of contract if he received either. If there is a recognized trade difference, then the terms of the contract prevail, and the contract is satisfied by the delivery of broken bottle glass. We conclude the contract was not breached.

Finally, while not necessary to go further, we find the evidence of damage intrinsically weak. The only testimony thereon was that of plaintiff, who placed the differential in Hongkong at $4 per ton, predicated his estimate upon the fact that his buyers demanded a refund in that amount—incidentally this being at a time apparently after the American holidays, when broken bottles were more plentiful, at least at a time, according to the evidence, when the broken glass market was glutted.

STENZEL v. KRONICK. (Civ. 6337.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 13, 1928.

1. Brokers ⇐8(3)—Evidence in action for fraudulently inducing exchange of realty for note and mortgage held to support finding that defendant was plaintiff's agent in transaction.

In action for damages for fraudulently inducing plaintiff to convey realty in exchange for note and mortgage on land worth much less than amount of note, evidence held to support finding that defendant was plaintiff's agent in transaction.

2. Fraud ⇐49—Defenses, not pleaded, that plaintiff waived fraud and lost rights by laches, are unavailable.

Defenses that plaintiff waived fraud by his actions and lost his rights by laches are not available in action for damages, where not pleaded.

3. Fraud ⇐34—Award of damages for fraudulently inducing plaintiff to convey realty for note and mortgage before foreclosure of mortgage held not error (Code Civ. Proc. § 726).

In action for damages for fraudulently inducing plaintiff to convey realty in exchange for note and mortgage on land worth much less than amount of note, court did not err in awarding damages before foreclosure of mortgage, where it was not claimed that plaintiff did not get full value on sale of note and mortgage; Code Civ. Proc. § 726, requiring that action on note secured on any property be exhausted against security, relating only to action for recovery of debt or enforcement of right secured by mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by A. E. Stenzel against Harry S. Kronick. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Rose & McTavish, of Los Angeles (H. E. Forster, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

John C. Packard, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

STROTHER, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for damages claimed to have been suffered as the result of defendant fraudulently inducing plaintiff to convey real property in exchange for a mortgage.

[1] Plaintiff was the owner of real property in Los Angeles county which he wished to sell in order to supply an urgent need for money. In a conversation with the defendant, plaintiff told him of his necessity, and defendant asked what price he would take for the property. Plaintiff named a price, net to himself. A few days later defendant told plaintiff that he had a cash buyer for the property, but that, in order to turn it, plaintiff would have to increase a mortgage on the property to about half the price. Defendant negotiated and procured a loan for plaintiff.

Thereafter defendant told plaintiff that the trade he had in mind was the transfer to plaintiff of a note for $8,000 secured by mortgage on land in San Bernardino county; that the maker of the note was then in San Francisco raising the money to pay it off, and it would be practically a cash transaction.

Plaintiff, at defendant's instance, gave escrow instructions to a bank to deliver the deed of his property upon receiving in exchange, for him, the note and mortgage and assignment of the same. Plaintiff executed his deed to defendant as grantee; the latter having represented to him that the real party in interest did not wish to take the title to the property at that time.

This transaction was consummated in the latter part of April, 1924, and the original complaint in this action was filed August 13, 1924. Plaintiff's subsequent investigations disclosed that there was no prospect of the mortgage note being paid and that the property securing the mortgage was worth about $2,500. He made a sale of the note and mortgage after the commencement of the action, and realized about $2,000 net.

This case was tried without a jury, and findings of fact were made by the court establishing the truth of all of the allegations of the complaint, and the conclusions of law drawn from the findings were in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment was rendered accordingly. In his opening brief, appellant states that:

"The testimony being in open conflict on practically every material issue involved, appellant on this appeal concedes that unless the judgment is erroneous as a matter of law it cannot be disturbed in view of the conflicting nature of the testimony."

In view of this frank statement we are somewhat at a loss to know why this appeal was prosecuted, as all of appellant's assignments for reversal seem to be based on alleged defects in the evidence. The first assignment is that there is no evidence to support the finding that defendant was plaintiff's agent in the transaction. A consideration of the brief recital of facts appearing in evidence, given above, shows that the objection is without foundation.

[2] The second and third assignments are as follows:

"The judgment is erroneous, as the plaintiff by his actions waived the fraud."

"The judgment is erroneous, as the plaintiff's rights were lost by laches."

Neither of these matters is set up as a defense by appellant, or was presented to the trial court, and the court made no findings as to either of them. In the absence of pleadings, such defenses are not available. Wienke v. Smith, 179 Cal. 220, 176 P. 42; Larkin v. Mullen, 128 Cal. 449, 60 P. 1091. Furthermore, the defenses are not supported by the evidence.

[3] The fourth and last assignment is that the court "erred in awarding damages prior to foreclosure of the mortgage." It is not claimed that the plaintiff did not get full value on his sale of the note and mortgage, and the only argument made in support of the contention is that "the Code provision of this state directs that an action founded on any note secured on any property must be exhausted against the security itself." Presumably this is a reference to section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure, relating to actions for recovery of a debt or enforcement of a right secured by a mortgage. As this is not such an action, the Code provision has no application.

The judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MULLER v. COAST COUNTIES GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (Civ. 6385.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 22, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 21, 1928. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Corporations ⇨252—Creditor's remedies against corporation need not be exhausted before action is commenced against stockholders (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

It is not necessary that creditor's remedies against corporation be exhausted before action is commenced against stockholders, under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322.

2. Corporations ⇨252—Separate actions may be instituted independently against stockholders and corporation (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

Separate actions may be instituted independently against corporation and stockholders under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, since liability of each is original, direct, and primary.

3. Abatement and revival ⇨9—Plea of another action pending cannot be made in later suit on stockholder's liability because of pending of earlier action against corporation (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

Plea of another action pending cannot be made in a later suit on stockholder's liability under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, on account of pending of an earlier action against corporation, since parties are not the same in the two proceedings.

4. Corporations ⇨253—Stockholder is not prevented by prior judgment against corporation from defending suit on stockholder's liability on merits (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

In suit on stockholder's liability under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, stockholder is not prevented by prior judgment against corporation from defending on merits and proving that corporation does not owe debt asserted.

5. Torts ⇨22—Plaintiff may sue all tort-feasors together, or may sue them separately.

Plaintiff may sue all tort-feasors together, or may sue each or less than all separately.

6. Corporations ⇨253—Judgment against corporation is not res judicata as to liability of stockholder and does not constitute an estoppel (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

Judgment against corporation is not res judicata as to liability of stockholder under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, and does not constitute an estoppel, since neither parties nor law imposing liability is the same in the two actions.

7. Corporations ⇨253—Liability of corporation is open question in creditor's suit against stockholder so long as there has been no satisfaction of first judgment against corporation (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

Liability of corporation is an open question in creditor's suit against stockholder under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, so long as there has been no satisfaction of first judgment against corporation itself; "liability" and "judgment" being two different things.

8. Corporations ⇨253—Liability of stockholders in an action against them for personal injuries sustained in street railway accident is not limited to amount of unsatisfied judgment recovered in former action against street railway corporation (Const. art. 12, § 3; Civ. Code, § 322).

Liability of stockholders of corporation under Const. art. 12, § 3, and Civ. Code, § 322, in an action against them for personal injuries sustained through negligent operation of street railway car, is not limited to amount of unsatisfied judgment recovered in former action against street railway corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel O. Deasy, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Mildred Muller against the Coast Counties Gas & Electric Company. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leo. H. Susman, Thos. J. Straub, and Robert Duncan, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. Appellant, Mildred Muller, on July 21, 1921, sustained a personal injury through the negligent operation of a street railway car in the city of Santa Cruz. This car at the time of the accident was operated by a corporation known as Union Traction Company. As a result of the accident appellant's spinal cord was completely severed in the lumbar region, resulting in complete permanent paralysis of all the muscles and organs of the body below the point of severance.

Following the injury so sustained appellant brought suit against Union Traction Company for damages, and recovered judgment in the sum of $38,000. From this judgment defendant Union Traction Company appealed. Following such judgment plaintiff commenced the present action against Coast Counties Gas & Electric Company, which was and is the sole stockholder of Union Traction Company. The latter case was brought for trial before a jury, and resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff and against Coast Counties Gas & Electric Company in the sum of $118,000. Entry of judgment following the return of this verdict was stayed by the court. While this stay was effective, Union Traction Company dismissed the appeal in the prior action, and the judgment therein became final. Union Traction Company then made a written offer to pay the plaintiff the then amount owing on the first judgment, which amounted at the time to $44,275. Plaintiff refused the tender. The trial court directed that judgment be entered for the sum of $44,275, although its findings and order found that plaintiff sustained damage in the sum of $118,000. From this judgment, and particularly from the part thereof denying plaintiff judgment in the sum of $118,000 and limiting the liability of defendant to the sum of $44,275, plaintiff has appealed.

[1-4] The appeal presents a single question of law, viz.: May a stockholder of a corporation in an action for tort be held to a greater liability than that found due from the corporation in a former action brought by the same plaintiff, which judgment in the former action remained unsatisfied; or, as stated by appellant, did the trial court err "in concluding that it was compelled to reduce plaintiff's recovery in the present action from $118,000 to an amount not in excess of the judgment against the corporation in the earlier action"?

The court in its findings and order specifically finds that the plaintiff sustained damage in the sum of $118,000; that the sum of $118,000 was a reasonable amount to be awarded plaintiff for the injury sustained by her, and specifically found and so states that the sole reason for directing the entry of the judgment in the sum of $44,275 instead of $118,000 was that the liability of the stockholder could not exceed the amount of the prior adjudication against the corporation.

The liability of stockholders for the debts of the corporation did not exist at common law, and is a creation of the statutes and constitutional provisions. Bank of San Luis Obispo v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 103 Cal. 594, 37 P. 499. In California the stockholder's liability is regulated by article 12, § 3, of the state Constitution and section 322 of the Civil Code. Article 12, § 3, so far as relevant to the present issue, reads:

"Each stockholder of a corporation, or joint-stock association, shall be individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred, during the time he was a stockholder, as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock, or shares of the corporation or association.

Section 322 of the Civil Code provides in part:

"Each stockholder of a corporation is individually and personally liable for such proportion of all its debts and liabilities contracted or incurred during the time he was a stockholder as the amount of stock or shares owned by him bears to the whole of the subscribed capital stock or shares of the corporation. Any creditor of the corporation may institute joint or several actions against any of its stockholders, for the proportion of his claim payable by each, and in such action the court must ascertain the proportion of the claim or debt for which each defendant is liable, and a several judgment must be rendered against each, in conformity therewith."

The California scheme of stockholder's liability differs radically from that of practically all other states. Authorities from other states are therefore of no avail in determining questions arising under the California system. Ellsworth v. Bradford, 186 Cal. 316, 199 P. 335; Buttner v. Adams (C. O. A. 9th) 236 F. 105. In most of the other states the liability is secondary. The stockholder standing in the position of a surety or guarantor, a judgment must be obtained against the corporation and execution returned before the stockholder can be sued. In California, on the contrary, the Constitution makes the liability of the stockholder direct and primary, and the Civil Code provides that the stockholder may be sued upon his liability without joining the corporation as a party. It is not necessary that the creditor's remedies against the corporation be exhausted before action is commenced against the stockholders. Morrow v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 383, 1 P. 354; Dolbear v. Foreign Mines Dev. Co. (C. C. A. 9th) 196 F. 646. And this stockholder's liability in California extends to torts. 6 Cal. Jur. 991; Damiano v. Bunting, 40 Cal. App. 566, 181 P. 232; Lininger v. Botsford, 32 Cal. App. 386, 163 P. 63. It is settled in this state that separate actions may be instituted independently against the corporation and stockholders, as the liability of each is original, direct and primary. Mokelumne Hill v. Woodbury, 14 Cal. 265; Faymonville v. McCullough, 59 Cal. 285; Sonoma Valley Bank v. Hill, 59 Cal. 107; Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 28 P. 110; Morrow v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 383, 1 P. 354; Hyman v. Coleman, 82 Cal. 650, 23 P. 62, 16 Am. St. Rep. 178; Eva v. Andersen, 166 Cal. 420, 137 P. 16; Aronson v. Pearson, 199 Cal. 286, 249 P. 188, 51 A. L. R. 1380; Niles State Bank v. Jennings, 22 Cal. App. 66, 133 P. 329; Ellsworth v. Bradford, supra. It is also the settled rule that the plea of another action pending cannot be made in a later suit on a stockholder's liability on account of the pending of an earlier action against the corporation, as the parties are not the same in the two proceedings. Each may proceed to trial and judgment. Herman v. Hecht, 116 Cal. 553, 48 P. 611; Union Trust Co. v. Journeay, 29 Cal. App. 502, 156 P. 999; Bridges v. Fisk, 53 Cal. App. 117, 200 P. 71; Chase v. Swain, 9 Cal. 130. There is no merger of the claim in the first judgment, so as to bar a judgment in the second suit, nor does the judgment constitute an estoppel. Ellsworth v. Bradford; Bridges v. Fisk, supra. A stockholder is not prevented by a prior judgment against the corporation from defending on the merits and proving that the corporation does not owe the debt asserted. 6 Cal. Jur. 1031; Wheatley v. Glover, 125 Ga. 710, 54 S. E. 626;

Partridge v. Butler, 113 Cal. 326, 45 P. 678; Ellsworth v. Bradford; Bridges v. Fisk, supra. This conclusion follows naturally from the principle of constitutional law that every defendant is entitled to his day in court. Where the stockholder is not a party to the proceeding against the corporation, he is not bound by the judgment, but is still entitled to defend upon the merits of the claim asserted against him. A judgment binds only parties and privies, and a stockholder is not in privity with the corporation for this purpose. His liability is not derivative but direct. Since the judgment against the corporation does not conclusively fix the liability of the stockholders to pay anything, it would seem that neither does it fix the maximum of the liability. If the stockholder can claim that there is no indebtedness, the creditor can enforce the actual original indebtedness, whatever it may be, under the principle of mutuality. The liability of the stockholder is either the original debt to be fixed by appropriate proof in the suit against him to a sum certain, or it is that as provided and liquidated in the judgment against the corporation. If the former, and it has been so held (Partridge v. Butler, 113 Cal. 326, 45 P. 678; Bridges v. Fisk, 53 Cal. App. 117, 200 P. 71; Damiano v. Bunting, 40 Cal. App. 566, 181 P. 232; Ellsworth v. Bradford, supra; 6 Cal. Jur. 1018, 1019), the judgment against the corporation does not conclude either party. There can, of course, be but one payment; hence satisfaction clearly destroys the other judgment (Butler v. Ashworth, 110 Cal. 614, 618, 43 P. 4, 386; Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646, 654), but until the debt is paid, there is no such other extinction or even limitation by one proceeding upon the other.

[5] In Buttner v. Adams, supra, the court holds that while the stockholders' liability is contractual and they are not tort-feasors, they are liable as if they were. In Ellsworth v. Bradford, supra, the respective liabilities of stockholders are said to be comparable to the liabilities of partners, and it is settled that the liabilities of partners for torts are those of joint feasers. Rogers v. Ponet, 21 Cal. App. 577, 581, 132 P. 851; Murphy v. Coppieters, 136 Cal. 317, 320, 68 P. 970. A plaintiff may sue all the tort-feasors together, or may sue each or less than all separately. Grundel v. Union Iron Works, 127 Cal. 438, 59 P. 826, 47 L. R. A. 467, 78 Am. St. Rep. 75; Cole v. Roebeling Co., 156 Cal. 443, 105 P. 255; Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151, 86 P. 178; Dawson v. Schloss, 93 Cal. 194, 29 P. 31. Separate judgments for different amounts may be obtained against each, and one judgment does not constitute a bar to a judgment against another joint tort-feasor until there has been satisfaction of one judgment. Cole v. Roebeling; Grundel v. Union Iron Works, supra. It is further held that a claim for damages for a single tort against several tort-feasors is not merged in the judgment against one or more of them, but each judgment remains separate and independent until satisfaction (15 Cal. Jur. 170; Fisher v. L. A. Pac. Co., 21 Cal. App. 677, 132 P. 767; Cole v. Roebeling, supra), and in Young v. Rosenbaum, 39 Cal. 646, the court says:

"A judgment against the corporation does not extinguish or suspend the liability of the stockholders, and it clearly does not merge it."

[6] The only way in which two separate claims upon the same debt may be so brought into unity that a judgment upon one remaining unsatisfied could or would affect the other by way of bar, abatement or limitation as to the amount recoverable, would be by the application of one of the following doctrines: (1) Res adjudicata; (2) merger; (3) estoppel by judgment. The judgment against the corporation is not res adjudicata as to the liability of the stockholder, for the reason that neither the parties nor the law imposing the liability is the same in the two actions. This is so held in numerous cases already cited, as also is the doctrine of merger repudiated in the cases referred to, and estoppel by judgment is but another name for the application of the rule of res adjudicata and by virtue of the identical authorities does not apply. 15 Cal. Jur. 99.

The recent case of Ellsworth v. Bradford, supra, is the leading case in this state upon the question of stockholder's liability and the effect of a prior judgment against the corporation. The learned and painstaking opinion in that case sets at rest the position of the courts of California with respect to the relationship between the two classes of judgments. The nature of the stockholder's liability and the distinction between the California system and those of other states are fully discussed and the conclusion reached that the actions are independent of each other because they involve different parties, different liabilities, different statutes of limitation, and that the claim against the stockholder is enforceable independently of proceedings against the corporation, and further, in reiteration of the previously expressed opinions, holds that the action against the stockholders is always upon the original indebtedness, regardless of any judgment against the corporation, and that therefore a judgment against the corporation is not evidence conclusively fixing the liability of the stockholder. The three distinct viewpoints of the various jurisdictions are discussed and classified, and the middle course adopted, namely, that a prior judgment against the corporation is only prima facie evidence of liability subject to rebuttal. This being true, it follows that a higher verdict may be returned than the amount awarded in the first judgment, if the evidence warrants a higher verdict, or it might readily be that a verdict in favor of the defendant could be rendered.

In Ellsworth v. Bradford, supra, the New York case of Assets Realization Co. v. Howard, 70 Misc. Rep. 651, 127 N. Y. S. 798 (affirmed 211 N. Y. 430, 105 N. E. 680) is referred to as authority in support of the California rule, which case holds that while a judgment against the corporation undoubtedly binds the assets and property of the corporation, yet it does not bind the stockholders. That case is the only one from other jurisdictions involving substantially similar constitutional and statutory provisions which has been brought to our attention. In that case it appears that the New York Banking Act provided, like the California Constitution and statutes, that the liability of the stockholder was direct and primary. In 1892 the New York statute was amended to provide that no action should be brought against a stockholder until judgment had been entered against the bank and execution returned unsatisfied. There the court uses this language:

"It is somewhat argued that the force of the foregoing authorities is destroyed by an amendment adopted in 1892. * * * Previous to this amendment it was provided that no action should be brought against a stockholder for any debt of the corporation until judgment therefor had been rendered against the corporation and an execution issued thereon had been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part. The amendment then provided: 'And the amount due on such execution shall be the amount recoverable, with costs against the stockholder.' It is asserted that this amendment is equivalent to saying that the judgment and execution shall be all the evidence that is necessary to fix the amount recoverable from the stockholder. That interpretation does not appeal to us. The section now containing said amendment is entitled 'Limitation of Stockholders' Liability.' It contains the requirement as limiting the stockholder's liability that a judgment must be recovered and execution issued before such liability attaches. Under these circumstances, I think that the meaning of the amendment was that the amount due on the execution thus required to be issued should be a limitation of liability and not proof of an indebtedness for which the stockholder is liable."

In California the statutory limitation limiting the stockholder's liability is absent from the statute, and, following the reasoning of the New York court as to the effect of the amendment, the amount in controversy under our statute is open to adjudication in the second suit against the stockholder in the same manner as is the question of liability.

Respondent urges that the judgment against the corporation is the debt of the corporation, and that therefore the judgment sets the upper limit to the corporate liability so far as appellant is concerned. The idea that the judgment is the debt is not expressly stated by respondent, but appears mostly through the fact that it uses the words "judgment" and "liability" interchangeably and that it refers to the judgment as the debt of the corporation. That the debt and the judgment are not one and the same is held in Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 613, 34 P. 335 (37 Am. St. Rep. 87) in which the court says:

"The complaint bases the right to recover on the making of the note and the judgment against the corporation; but, as the liability of a stockholder is a separate and independent one, commencing with and dependent upon the original indebtedness, it is doubtful if the averments of the complaint in the case at bar are sufficient."

And in Bridges v. Fisk, 53 Cal. App. 117, 120, 200 P. 71, 73, we find this language:

"The gist of appellant's objection to the complaint is that it does not state a cause of action upon the original indebtedness, but that, instead, it attempts to state a cause of action upon the judgment against the corporation. If the averments of the complaint justified any such criticism, then unquestionably that pleading would fall short of a statement of a cause of action on appellant's statutory liability as a stockholder; for the stockholder's liability under our statute is a separate and independent one, commencing with and dependent upon the original indebtedness."

That is to say, the stockholders can be held only for the original liability of the corporation, not for a judgment against it. Again, the liability exists before the payment, and a judgment may be taken against the stockholders without previous suit against the corporation. 6 Cal. Jur. 995; Favorite v. Superior Court, 181 Cal. 261, 184 P. 15, 8 A. L. R. 290; Knowles v. Sandercock, 107 Cal. 629, 40 P. 1047; Ellsworth v. Bradford, supra. In short, the judgment against the corporation is not the debt or liability for which the stockholders are responsible.

In support of its claim that the judgment sets the upper limit of the corporation's debt, respondent advances the argument that as the judgment limits the liability of the corporation it also limits the liability of the stockholders, and, furthermore, as the stockholders would be discharged by payment of the judgment, they cannot be held to a liability greater than the amount of the judgment.

We have already seen that the liability exists entirely independent of the judgment. It exists and may be measured whether there has been a judgment or not. This follows from the fact that the stockholder may be sued before the corporation. The debt exists without the judgment; its amount is determined by occurrences out of court, not by the judgment, where the question is not res adjudicata. Respondent is no doubt led to its conclusion by the fact that between plaintiff and the corporation neither one may question the correctness of the judgment. This does not mean that the judgment is necessarily correct, for as between the original parties it is none the less a bar by reason of its being erroneous. Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 322, 331, 165 P. 935; Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 95, 77 P. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66.

It is true that had the first judgment been paid, plaintiff would have been barred from bringing the second action. "The bar arises not from any particular form in which the action is brought, but arises from the fact that the party complainant has been compensated for his injury." Adams v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 266 P. 541.

[7, 8] The appeal presents a unique question so far as the adjudicated cases are concerned. Strangely, the question has never before been passed upon in this state; but, applying the well-settled principles of analogous cases, it is not difficult of solution. By way of recapitulation it may be said that the "liability" and the "judgment" are two different things. The stockholders can be held only on the original liability. The judgment against the corporation fixes the existence of this liability conclusively only as between the corporation and plaintiff. The liability of the corporation is an open question in the creditor's suit against the stockholder, the former judgment being merely prima facie evidence. It remains an open question as long as there has been no satisfaction of the first judgment. Consequently, the creditor may enforce his verdict against the stockholder, even though the jury found the original liability against the corporation in the action against the stockholder to be greater than the judgment against it showed.

It has long been settled that the same matter may be litigated twice. In short the rule that before satisfaction a creditor may recover different judgments against the corporation and the stockholders in this state is the natural and logical conclusion from well-settled rules of law.

Here the single question presented is whether the liability of the stockholders of a corporation in an action against them is limited to the amount recovered in a former action against the corporation. Whether the verdict is excessive or is supported by the evidence is not involved on this appeal.

The verdict having been reduced for the sole reason that the liability of the stockholder could not exceed the amount of the prior adjudication against the corporation, it follows that the judgment must be reversed and the cause remanded for proceedings in accordance with the views here expressed.

LOS ANGELES CITY HIGH SCHOOL DIST.
OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. KENNARD et al. (Civ. 5955.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error §989—Appellate court only determines whether there is substantial evidence to support trial court's finding.

Appellate court will not weigh evidence, pass upon credibility of witnesses, nor substitute its judgment on these matters for that of trial court, even where there is no conflict in evidence and the inferences fairly deducible from facts and circumstances in evidence are such that different conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom; it being appellate court's duty to determine only whether there is substantial evidence to support finding.

2. Dedication §45—Whether offer to dedicate easement for road purposes on property was revoked by erection of wire fence before acceptance of easement by city held for trial court.

Whether wire fence, built across premises after offer to dedicate an easement for road purposes thereon was made, which prevented ingress and egress upon the property, constituted a formal revocation of the offer of dedication before acceptance of the easement by the city, held for trial court in condemnation proceedings.

3. Dedication §34—What constitutes reasonable time for acceptance of offer of dedication depends upon particular facts.

What constitutes reasonable time in which to make valid acceptance of offer of dedication depends upon the facts and circumstances of each particular case.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Joseph W. Vickers, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by Los Angeles City High School District of Los Angeles County to secure for public use certain property, against the Clark & Sherman Land Company, Teresa Kennard, and John W. Maltman. From an interlocutory decree condemning the property, the last two named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Hill, Morgan & Bledsoe and John W. Maltman, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, and Homer I. Mitchell, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, Justice pro tem. In this action the school district, the plaintiff, obtained an interlocutory decree condemning for public use certain property, which it alleged was already subject to an easement for road purposes. It was the contention of the appellants and defendants on the trial that the property was not already subject to an easement for public purposes. But the trial court found against the defendants on this question and awarded damages on that basis.

On October 31, 1894, a map known as "Maltman's First Street Addition" was recorded by the owner in the county recorder's office, showing Park drive platted thereon. Park drive included the parcel of land in question. At that time the property was outside the city, but it was annexed on April 2, 1896.

On February 15, 1897, an ordinance was adopted by the city changing the name from Park drive to Juanita street. Again, on December 27, 1897, it changed the name to Juanita avenue. On December 30, 1899, the owner recognized the street under its new designation by conveying certain property, describing one of the boundaries as "the center line of Juanita avenue, formerly Park drive, as shown on the map" above described. And on October 7, 1901, the city passed an ordinance accepting generally all streets which had been theretofore offered to be dedicated in the city. Never at any time has the property actually been used as a street.

Appellants rely upon "five theories of defense," as follows: (1) That the offer of dedication was revoked before acceptance by the city; (2) that there never was a valid acceptance of the offer of dedication; (3) that, if accepted, the easement was impliedly abandoned; (4) that the award was too small if no easement existed; (5) that the award was too small if the easement existed.

[1] It is axiomatic that it is the province of the trial court to find questions of fact and of the appellate court to review errors of law. This court will not exercise the functions of a jury. While the question of the sufficiency of the evidence, as a matter of law, to support a finding may be presented to this court for review, its duty in that event is to determine whether or not there is some substantial evidence to support the finding. The court will not weigh the evidence, nor pass upon the credibility of the witnesses; and it will not substitute its judgment on these matters for that of the trial court. Even where there is no conflict in the evidence, if the inferences fairly deducible from the facts and circumstances in evidence are such that different conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom, the conclusion drawn by the trial court should not be disturbed. MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 95, 170 P. 616.

[2] There was no formal revocation of the offer of dedication. Appellants rely upon certain acts of the owner which they claim indicate an intention to revoke the offer. It is the contention of appellants that a wire fence was built across the premises after the offer was made, which prevented ingress and egress upon the property. It is the contention of respondent that the wire fence was built prior to the offer of dedication for the purpose of keeping cattle on a large tract of land and without any thought of revoking the offer of dedication; and this is a reasonable inference from the evidence. While there is some evidence which indicates the owner's intention to revoke the offer, there are other facts and circumstances in evidence from which the inference may reasonably be drawn that he did not intend to revoke his offer.

[3] It is appellants' contention that there was no valid acceptance of the offer of dedication because it was not accepted within a reasonable time. But what is a reasonable time depends upon the facts and circumstan-es of each particular case. It is a question of fact for the determination of the trial court, and we would not be justified in reversing the finding of that court in this regard.

What has been said heretofore applies with equal force to appellants' contention that the easement, if accepted, was impliedly abandoned, and as to the amount of the award, either without or with the existence of an easement. There was substantial evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court on all the above matters.

Judgment affirmed.

BURKE v. MEYERSTEIN. (Civ. 6262.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 18, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Specific performance ⇨123—Finding in specific performance suit, that suit to reform contract was instituted and that findings made in such suit were attached and by reference made part thereof, was not finding that findings in first case were true.

In specific performance suit, court's findings, with reference to previous suit to reform contract, "that an action was instituted as therein stated; that the pleadings were therein stated; that the findings made by the court in said action are attached hereto, marked Exhibit A, and by this reference made a part hereof for all purposes"—hekl not in effect a finding that findings in first case were true.

2. Trial ⇨404(5)—Findings not necessary to judgment are not conclusive as to matters found.

Findings not necessary to the judgment or inferentially contrary thereto are not conclusive as to matters found.

3. Trial ⇨404(5)—Finding in suit for reformation that contract's terms were identical with those agreed upon by parties was conclusive on parties to action.

Finding in suit for reformation of land contract that its terms were identical with those which had been agreed upon by parties was conclusive as to issue which it determined, and was binding on both parties to action.

4. Judgment ⇨948(1)—Plaintiff need not plead finding in reformation suit as estoppel in specific performance suit, where defendant's defense and evidence disclosed adjudication of such issue.

In suit for specific performance of land contract, it was unnecessary for plaintiff to plead finding in previous suit to reform contract to effect that terms of contract were identical with those which parties agreed upon as an estoppel, where defendant's defense and evidence offered in its support disclosed adjudication of such issue in previous case.

5. Contracts ⇨167—When law affects validity, etc., of contract, it enters into and forms part of contract.

When law affects validity, construction, discharge, or enforcement of contract, it enters into contract and forms part of it, measuring obligations of one party and rights acquired by the other, since parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to laws in existence at time contract was made.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⇨172—Where land contract did not provide otherwise, interest on deferred payments was allowed only from time payments fell due (Civ. Code, § 1917).

Where contract for sale of land did not provide otherwise, interest on deferred payments could be allowed only from time payments fell due, under Civ. Code, § 1917.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⇨172—Land contract having paragraph relating to interest payments deleted, but having other paragraphs containing references to interest, did not provide for interest on deferred payments.

Contract for sale of real estate having paragraph providing for interest deleted, but containing other paragraphs containing references to interest payments, held not to provide for interest on deferred payments, but it was reasonable to assume that in absence of express provision for payment of interest on deferred installments, delinquent installments were contemplated.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action for specific performance by Frank J. Burke against Alfred L. Meyerstein. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph C. Meyerstein, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John D. Harloe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. The parties to the above action entered into a written contract on August 30, 1916, by the terms of which the defendant agreed to sell and the plaintiff to buy certain real property. The action was brought by the plaintiff to specifically enforce the contract, and from the judgment entered therein the defendant appealed.

The latter claimed that his assent to the contract was given under the influence of mistake and misapprehension. It is urged as grounds for reversal that, in view of the evidence and the findings respecting the mistake alleged, the court erred in granting specific performance of the contract, as well as in its conclusion that under the contract as executed no interest was chargeable upon deferred installments of the purchase price.

The court found that the contract was prepared by defendant's secretary, who deleted from a printed form of contract a clause providing for interest on unpaid installments of the principal; that in preparing the contract the secretary acted under the direction of defendant's agent, who had negotiated the sale on behalf of the defendant; that the contract so prepared was in accordance with the actual terms agreed upon between the agent and the plaintiff, it having been expressly agreed between them that no interest should be charged upon deferred payments; that after the contract was prepared the defendant signed the same without reading it or observing that the printed clause providing for interest on deferred payments had been deleted; and that the failure was due to defendant's negligence and not to any act of the plaintiff. The court also found that plaintiff, in reliance upon the contract and within the consent of the defendant, took possession of the property and has punctually made the payments as provided, and, further, that such occupancy was advantageous to defendant in furtherance of the latter's plan to sell neighboring lots, and one of the inducements to the remission of interest on the deferred payments.

[1] Some time before the present action was commenced an action, entitled, "Alfred L. Meyerstein v. Frank J. Burke," was brought in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco to reform the contract in the above particular. The court made certain findings therein and entered its judgment, denying the relief asked. [See 193 Cal. 105, 222 P. 810.] In the present action the defendant set up as special defenses by way of estoppel portions of the pleadings, together with certain of the above findings, and in the course of the trial introduced in evidence the judgment roll in that action. With respect to these findings the court found as follows:

"That an action was instituted as therein stated; that the pleadings were as therein stated; that the findings made by the court in said action are attached hereto, marked 'Exhibit A,' and by this reference made a part hereof for all purposes."

Plaintiff contends that by the above finding the court in effect found that the findings in the first case were true. We do not so construe the findings, it being clear that the court found only that the findings referred to and attached were those filed in the first action.

[2-4] The findings referred to were in effect that the secretary employed by Meyerstein negligently deleted the provision in the printed form of contract for the payment of interest, and that Meyerstein at the time he signed the contract supposed that it contained the deleted provision. It was also found, however, that the writing as executed expressed and was identical with the actual agreement between the parties and that Burke understood that the deleted portion should not be included.

Defendant contends that the above findings constituted an affirmative adjudication of his claim that his assent was given under the influence of mistake and misapprehension, and that specific performance of the contract cannot be enforced, citing subdivision 4, § 3391. of the Civil Code.

The only finding necessary to support the judgment denying the prayer for a reformation of the contract was that its terms were identical with those which had been agreed upon by the parties, and other findings not necessary to the judgment (Estate of Heydenfeldt, 127 Cal. 456, 59 P. 839; Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 P. 298, 60 P. 974, 66 P. 982; Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 398, 81 P. 542), or inferentially contrary thereto, were not conclusive as to the matters found (Estate of Funkenstein, 170 Cal. 594, 150 P. 987). The essential finding, however, was for the reason stated conclusive as to the issue which it determined, and was binding on both parties to the action (Estate of Clark, 190 Cal. 354, 212 P. 622); and although the finding was not pleaded by the plaintiff as an estoppel such pleading was unnecessary in view of the defense and the evidence offered in its support, which disclosed the adjudication of this issue in the previous case (Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. 221, 41 P. 1017, 45 P. 252; Guy v. Leech, 47 Cal. App. 704, 709, 190 P. 1067; Zenos v. Britten-Cook Land Co., 75 Cal. App. 299, 242 P. 914). While, according to the testimony of the defendant, his assent to the execution of the contract as the same was written was influenced by mistake and misapprehension, the implied conclusion of the trial court to the contrary is supported not only by the adjudication in the former action, but by the circumstances attending its execution as shown by other facts in evidence and found by the trial court.

[5-7] It is further claimed that the contract as executed provides for interest on deferred payments. As stated, in the preparation thereof a printed form was used a portion of which was deleted. Two of the remaining paragraphs, however, contained references to interest payments. The contract contained an express promise by the vendee to purchase the property and pay therefor the sum of $7,000 at the times and in the manner following: $1,000 upon the execution of the agreement, receipt of which was acknowledged; the sum of $50 each month thereafter until the whole purchase price had been paid—no provision being there made for the payment of interest on deferred payments. The paragraph mentioned relates to the deed to the property which the vendor agreed to execute upon full payment of the sum of $7,000, "with interest at the rate and for the time above specified; * * *" and the second, which referred to the rights of the vendor in case of default, provided as follows: "If said party of the second part (the vendee) shall fail, and such failure shall continue for a period of sixty (60) days, to make any of the aforesaid payments of principal or interest, etc., * * *"—in which event it was provided that the vendee should forfeit all interest in the property and the payments made thereon.

Parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to laws in existence at the time the contract was made; and when a law affects the validity, construction, discharge, or enforcement of the contract it enters into and forms a part of it, measuring the obligations of one party and the rights acquired by the other. Connecticut Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Cushman, 108 U. S. 51, 2 S. Ct. 236, 27 L. Ed. 648; Northern Pac. R. R. Co. v. Wall, 241 U. S. 87, 36 S. Ct. 493, 60 L. Ed. 905; Ede v. Knight, 93 Cal. 159, 28 P. 860. At the time the above contract was executed section 1917 of the Civil Code provided: "Unless there is an express contract in writing, fixing a different rate, interest is payable on all moneys at the rate of seven per centum per annum after they become due, on any instrument of writing, except a judgment. * * *" And, as held in the following cases, unless the parties to such a contract shall otherwise provide, interest on deferred payments is allowed only from the time the payments fall due. City of Los Angeles v. City Bank, 100 Cal. 22, 34 P. 510; Gero v. Richey, 38 Cal. App. 21, 175 P. 91.

An inconsistency was inferentially created by the above references in the contract to interest payments; but in view of the form used the elimination therefrom of a printed paragraph, to which the above-quoted portions clearly refer, taken in connection with the facts preceding its execution as disclosed by the record and found by the court, the construction which the court placed thereon was not unreasonable, and its conclusion should not be disturbed. Slama Tire Protector Co. v. Ritchie, 31 Cal. App. 555, 161 P. 25; Manley v. Pac. Mill & Timber Co., 79 Cal. App. 641, 250 P. 710. Moreover, in accordance with the views expressed in Gero v. Richey, supra, wherein the court considered the effect of a clause similar to the above, it was reasonable to assume therefrom, in the absence of an express provision for the payment of interest on deferred installments, that delinquent installments were contemplated, in which event it was the intention to provide for the payment of interest thereon from their due dates as a condition to the execution of a deed, and also that a failure for 60 days to make such payments with interest as above should work a forfeiture of the vendee's interest in the property.

All the equities of the case were in favor of the plaintiff, and the record discloses no ground for the reversal of the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. ELROY. (Cr. 1505.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 18, 1928.

1. Witnesses $\Leftrightarrow$ 45(2)—Nine years nine months old girl in third grade at school, testifying she was required to tell truth or be sent to reform school, held competent witness (Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 2).

In prosecution for violating Pen. Code, § 288, girl nine years and nine months of age, testifying that she attended school in third grade, that oath required her to tell the truth, and that girls who did not tell the truth would be sent to reform school, held qualified to testify, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 2.

2. Witnesses $\Leftrightarrow$ 79(2)—Previous testimony by nine year nine months old girl could be considered in determining her qualifications as witness.

In determining qualification of girl nine years and nine months of age to testify as witness, fact that she had previously testified could be taken into account.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Melvin Elroy was convicted of violating Penal Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent W. Hallinan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of violating Penal Code, § 288. The sole point upon appeal is that the court erred in permitting a girl nine years and nine months of age to testify against the defendant. Upon examination of this witness by the court she testified that she was nine years old, attended school in the high third grade; that she had testified previously at this trial; that the oath required her to tell the truth; and that girls who did not tell the truth would be sent to the reform school. The court thereupon announced his opinion that the witness was qualified, and the direct examination proceeded without objection nor attempt at cross-examination by the defense as to her qualification.

[2] The point is not well taken. This examination, as well as the witness' testimony as a whole, showed her to be qualified within the meaning of Code of Civil Procedure, §

1880, subd. 2; the fact that she had previously testified could also be taken into account; and, finally, the record fails to show any abuse of discretion on the part of the court in permitting her to testify. People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 460, 469, 44 P. 186; People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 244, 250, 49 P. 186; People v. Delaney, 52 Cal. App. 765, 199 P. 896; People v. Reyes, 194 Cal. 650, 220 P. 947.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 24, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\Leftrightarrow$ 612(1)—Reviewing court held limited to consideration of judgment roll, where certificate of trial judge was not attached to transcript (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Reviewing court held limited to consideration of judgment roll, where transcript, though containing certificate of clerk, failed to bear certificate of trial judge, on appeal taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit $\Leftrightarrow$ 43(5)—Newspaper accounts of departure of plaintiff's former attorney held not to support motion for leave to produce additional evidence after dismissal (Code Civ. Proc. § 583, and section 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583).

Newspaper accounts of departure of plaintiff's former attorney from San Francisco held mere hearsay and not admissible to prove truth of assertion made, and therefore they did not support motion for leave to produce additional evidence, under Code Civ. Proc. § 956a, as added by St. 1927, p. 583, after dismissal of action, for failure to prosecute under Code Civ. Proc. § 583.

Action by R. A. Wolf against Helen P. Drew. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals and applies for leave to produce additional evidence. Judgment affirmed, and motion to produce additional evidence denied.

Samuel J. Jones, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John William Ham, of San Francisco, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment dismissing the action under section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, for failure to bring the same to trial within two years after answer filed. The appeal is taken under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and the transcript contains, in addition to the judgment roll, what purports to be a copy of an affidavit and certain oral testimony introduced in the court below in opposition to the motion to dismiss. Counsel have stipulated for diminution of the record by the addition thereto of a copy of an affidavit introduced by respondent in support of the motion.

[1] The transcript contains the certificate of the clerk, but no certificate of the trial judge. In this state of the record this court is limited to a consideration of the judgment roll. "Neither the certificate of the clerk nor the stipulation of the attorneys * * * can take the place of the judge's certificate so as to constitute the transcript a sufficient record under section 953a." People v. California Protective Corporation, 76 Cal. App. 354, 365, 244 P. 1089, 1093; Pouchan v. Godreau, 21 Cal. App. 365, 131 P. 879; Jeffords v. Young, 197 Cal. 224, 239 P. 1054.

[2] Counsel for appellant have applied to this court for leave to produce additional evidence under section 956a, Code of Civil Procedure, as added by St. 1927, p. 583. This evidence consists of two newspaper accounts of the departure of appellant's former attorney from San Francisco. Apart from any other consideration, it is clear that these newspaper accounts are hearsay and not admissible to prove the truth of what they assert.

The motion to produce additional evidence is accordingly denied, and, no error appearing from the judgment roll, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KIRK. (Cr. 1481.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 19, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Embezzlement ⇨47—Intent to embezzle is for jury.

The question of intent as to whether person charged with embezzlement intended to feloniously appropriate the money to his own use being incapable of direct proof, except where facts proved afford no reasonable ground as inference for intent, it is the peculiar province of the jury to find the intent from the facts and circumstances of the case and to say what particular intent follows from acts done.

2. Embezzlement ⇨11—Fact that no demand was made upon defendant convicted of embezzlement to return funds constitutes no ground for reversal.

Fact that no demand was ever made upon defendant convicted of embezzlement, for a return of funds embezzled, constitutes no ground for reversal.

3. Embezzlement ⇨4—Test of "embezzlement" is whether evidence shows fraudulent appropriation of money.

The test of crime of embezzlement is whether evidence shows clearly a fraudulent appropriation of money.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Embezzle—Embezzlement.]

4. Embezzlement ⇨44(1)—Evidence held to support conviction for embezzlement.

In prosecution for embezzlement, evidence held sufficient to show fraudulent appropriation of money, supporting conviction therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Edward L. Kirk was convicted of embezzlement, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph P. Lacey, William R. Geary, and G. W. Lupton, Jr., all of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Defendant was charged and convicted of the crime of embezzlement. He appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The information charges him with having on or about the 4th day of June, 1927, embezzled the sum of $400, the personal property of one Bessie N. Buschke. Defendant is an attorney at law. He represented the owners of certain real property in Alameda county who were nonresidents of the state. One Glen H. Moseley, a licensed real estate broker, had supervision of the property for the collection of rents and other purposes. He acted under the direction of defendant, Kirk. The property consisted of a residence situated at Broadmoor boulevard, San Leandro. Moseley advertised the same for sale, and as a result thereof certain offers were received by him from prospective purchasers. The first offer was for the sum of $5,000 cash. Moseley, believing that defendant had been given authority as the agent and attorney for the owners to make the sale, communicated with him concerning this offer. Defendant submitted the offer to the owners for their approval, but they were dissatisfied with the same and so advised defendant. Subsequently, on April 13, 1927, Bessie N. Buschke made an offer of $5,750. This offer was conditioned on a down payment of $500, balance at the rate of $45 per month to be applied to principal and interest. Mrs. Buschke was guardian of the estate of her husband, and her offer was subject to the further condition that the court approve of the transaction. Upon receiving the offer Moseley took a deposit from Mrs. Buschke in the sum of $100, subject to the owner's approval, and submitted the offer to defendant,

Kirk. Kirk informed Mrs. Buschke that if she wanted the property that her offer and terms would be acceptable. Defendant volunteered to attend to the application before the probate court for permission to use the guardianship funds for the purchase without charge to Mrs. Buschke. Prior to the hearing of this application and on May 27th of the same year Mrs. Buschke sent her bank book to defendant Kirk, together with an order on the bank authorizing it to pay Kirk the sum of $400 from the guardianship account. Defendant withdrew this sum from the said account on June 4, 1927, and deposited the same to his personal account and subsequently checked out the funds for his own personal benefit. On the same day Mrs. Buschke signed a deed of trust and a note in conformity with the terms of sale. Prior thereto, and on May 1, 1927, Mrs. Buschke had entered into possession of the premises with the understanding that the deposit of $100 which she had made with Moseley was to be considered as rent in the event that the court failed to approve the transaction. Upon the hearing of the application defendant secured an order of the court that the sum of $424.48 be invested in the enterprise. Subsequent to July 1, 1927, Mrs. Buschke made three monthly payments of $45 to defendant and received his receipt for the same. At various times during the months of June and July, 1927, defendant paid Moseley the amount of his commission in procuring the purchaser. It appeared in evidence that at the time Mrs. Buschke made her offer for the property defendant telegraphed the owners concerning the same and recommended acceptance. He received a telegram in reply advising him not to accept the offer upon the tentative terms, the owners stating that they wanted cash. As heretofore stated, defendant thereafter received the payment from Mrs. Buschke on May 27, 1927, but he failed to inform his clients of this fact, but placed the money in his own personal bank account and subsequently checked out the amount for his own personal use and benefit. At the time Mrs. Buschke made the payment to defendant, and at various other times, she demanded a deed from him, but was put off from time to time, with the assurance that the matter would be taken care of. The owners of the property heard nothing further from defendant concerning the transaction. Upon a visit to this state they discovered the condition of affairs. They employed an attorney, who interviewed defendant to ascertain from him upon what authority he had made the sale. Defendant claimed he was authorized to do so by the owners, but subsequently admitted that he had no such authority. On September 13, 1927, over three months after defendant had received the deposit, Mrs. Buschke was served with written notice from the owners to surrender the property. On the following day she swore to a complaint charging defendant with embezzlement and subsequently quitted possession of the premises.

[1] Defendant contends that this evidence does not establish the fact he ever had the intent to feloniously appropriate the money in question to his own use. The question of intent being incapable of direct proof, a jury is permitted to determine this question from the facts and circumstances of the case, and except in a case where the facts proved afford no reasonable ground for an inference as to intent, it is the peculiar province of the jury to find the intent and to say what particular intent follows from the acts done. People v. Tom Woo, 181 Cal. 315, 326, 184 P. 389; 8 Cal. Jur. p. 278. The prosecution attempted to prove similar offenses committed by defendant for the purpose of showing a guilty intent, but this evidence was rejected by the trial court. Aside from any question concerning this ruling, we are of the opinion that the facts and circumstances in evidence were amply sufficient to satisfy the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge. No attempt was made by defendant to explain his acts, the defense having rested upon the conclusion of the case made out by the prosecution. Nor does the fact as claimed that no demand was ever made upon defendant for a return of the funds constitute ground for reversal.

[2-4] The guilt or innocence of defendant does not depend upon the question whether or not any demand was made upon him for the money involved. The real question is: Does the evidence establish the crime charged? The test of the crime of embezzlement is whether the evidence shows clearly a fraudulent appropriation by the defendant of the money; and proof of a demand is not required when the evidence otherwise shows the fact of such fraudulent appropriation. It is only in the absence of such other sufficient proof of a fraudulent appropriation that a demand may be necessary to fix the fact of the fraudulent appropriation; but the test of the crime is not thereby altered, but always is: Does the whole evidence establish the crime charged? People v. Blair, 19 Cal. App. 688, 127 P. 657. A careful reading of this entire record convinces us that it does. It shows that while defendant had authority to receive bids for the property, he had no authority to make the sale in question. On the contrary, he had received positive instructions from the owners not to do so. Notwithstanding these instructions, he accepted the funds belonging to Mrs. Buschke, placed them in his personal bank account and subsequently misappropriated the same to his own use. The judgment and order should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

CARBONDALE MACH. CO. v. EYRAUD.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 957(1)—Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 139—Motion to vacate default judgment is addressed to trial court's discretion, which is not interfered with unless clear abuse is shown (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Granting or denying of motion to set aside default judgment on ground of mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and neglect, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, is largely a matter of discretion with the trial court, and trial court's order will not be disturbed unless abuse of discretion clearly appears.

2. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 143(12)—Inadvertent failure of attorney to file answer, due to rush of business and associate's absence, justified court's vacation of default judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Affidavit of defendant's counsel showing that law firm had large number of contested cases, that one of members of firm was out of state, and that affiant had failed to serve answer through inadvertence in rush of business, held to show excusable neglect under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, justifying trial court in opening default judgment.

3. Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 167—Court properly refused to impose terms on opening default judgment, where plaintiff failed to show he was prejudiced (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Where on defendant's motion to set aside default judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, plaintiff failed to show that it would suffer any prejudice from having case heard on the merits, court did not abuse its discretion, but acted properly, in refusing to impose terms upon defendant.

4. Appeal and error $\hookrightarrow$ 957(1)—Judgment $\hookrightarrow$ 138(1)—Power to set aside default judgments should be liberally exercised, and reviewing court will not interfere unless opening of judgment results in injustice (Code Civ. Proc. § 473).

Power of trial court to vacate default judgments for inadvertence, surprise, mistake, or excusable neglect under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to permit disposition of cases on their merits should be freely and liberally exercised, where plaintiff will not be prejudiced and court's orders will not be reversed unless setting aside of judgment is calculated to defeat rather than to promote justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by the Carbondale Machine Company against A. J. Eyraud. From an order setting aside and vacating a default judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

McGowney & Klein, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newby & Palmer, of Los Angeles (Nathan Newby, Jr., of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from an order setting aside and vacating a default judgment.

On May 14, 1926, the plaintiff, the Carbondale Machine Company, a corporation, commenced this action in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles against defendant, for damages for breach of a certain contract, signed by defendant, wherein plaintiff agreed to erect for defendant an automatic refrigerating plant. On the same date the summons was issued and personally served upon the defendant, A. J. Eyraud, in the county of Los Angeles. No appearance was made by defendant within the time allowed by law, and on June 9, 1926, the default of the defendant was entered, and thereafter, on June 23, 1926, the court ordered judgment entered against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,609.30, damages and costs, and on the same day said judgment was entered.

On July 17, 1926, defendant made application to the trial court to have the default set aside and the judgment vacated upon the ground "that said judgment was entered through mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and neglect of defendant's counsel."

In support of this motion the defendant presented his own affidavit and the affidavit of his counsel setting forth the facts upon which he relied. No counter affidavits were filed, or counter showing made by plaintiff, and the court granted defendant's motion and vacated the default and set aside the judgment, and permitted defendant to file his answer. The court did not impose any terms upon the defendant.

[1] The granting or denying of a motion of this character is so largely a matter of discretion with the trial court that, unless it is clearly made to appear that there has been an abuse of this discretion, this court will decline to set aside the trial court's order. Nicoll v. Weldon, 130 Cal. 666, 63 P. 63; Staley v. O'Day, 22 Cal. App. 149, 133 P. 620; Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., 71 Cal. App. 773, 236 P. 336, and cases there cited.

[2] There is no showing whatever of any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court. The court was satisfied from the undisputed evidence presented to it that the neglect of the defendant was excusable, and we see no reason for questioning its conclusion in that respect. The defendant filed a sufficient affidavit of merits with his application for relief.

The affidavit of defendant contains these facts:

"* * * That he was served with a summons in the above-entitled cause on the 24th day of May, 1926, and upon said day that he took the copy of the summons and complaint that had been served upon him to Wm. Fleet Palmer, of the firm of Newby & Palmer, and employed him to defend said action, * * * and he was further advised by said attorney that he would take care of the said matter and would appear in the said cause and would present the defendant's defense in said action, and affiant, fully relying upon the statement of the said Wm. Fleet Palmer, and resting in confidence that the said Mr. Palmer would take such steps as were necessary to defend him in said action, and affiant believed that such steps had been taken by said attorney, until the 12th day of July, 1926, at which time affiant was informed that a judgment had been entered against him by default in said case. That affiant, immediately upon hearing that a judgment had been entered against him by default in said case, called up said attorney by telephone and asked him about the matter, and then for the first time learned that the said Wm. Fleet Palmer had failed to file an appearance for him in said cause. * * *"

The affidavit of defendant's counsel, Wm. Fleet Palmer, is also in part as follows:

"That on the 24th day of May, 1926, the defendant in the above entitled cause brought to him a copy of the complaint and summons in said cause that had been served upon defendant on that day * * * and the defendant then and there directed affiant to look after the matter for him and to enter an appearance and make his defense. Affiant further says that the firm of Newby & Palmer had at that time a large number of cases that were being sharply contested, and there was a great volume of business in the office of said firm; that on the 22d day of April, 1926, Nathan Newby, Esq., of said firm, left the state of California on a business and pleasure trip, and has ever since said day been absent from said city. That there devolved upon affiant at said time the duty of managing and caring for all of the business of said firm; that at the time the employment by said defendant in said cause was accepted, affiant fully intended to file an appearance in said cause and present the defense of the defendant thereto; that in the rush and confusion of attempting to carry on the business of said firm in the absence of Mr. Newby, affiant totally, by inadvertence and oversight, failed to prepare and serve and file the answer * * * and affiant avers that the said cause of action totally escaped his attention and remembrance until affiant was called upon the telephone by defendant on July 12, 1926, when defendant informed affiant that a judgment had been entered by default. * * *"

The facts presented by these affidavits, as we have stated, were undisputed, and we think constituted excusable neglect under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and fully warranted the court in granting the motion.

[3] Appellant contends that the court abused its discretion in relieving defendant from his default, without imposing terms upon him. There is no merit in this contention. There was no showing made to the court that would warrant it in imposing any terms upon the defendant; neither did plaintiff make any showing whatever that it would suffer any prejudice by the default being set aside and the judgment vacated, and the case heard upon its merits. Therefore, in the absence of such a showing, it would have been improper for the trial court to have imposed any terms upon the defendant. It is to be assumed, if nothing to the contrary is shown, that plaintiff will be able at any time to establish its cause of action. If, for any reason, it will be unable to do so, that fact should be made to appear. Nicoll v. Weldon, supra.

[4] It has often been stated by the appellate courts of this state that the power of the trial court should be freely and liberally exercised, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to mold and direct its proceedings so as to dispose of cases upon their substantial merits, and its orders will not be reversed unless its power has been exercised in a manner which is calculated to defeat, rather than advance, the ends of justice. Buell v. Emerich, 85 Cal. 116, 24 P. 644; Harbaugh v. Land & Water Co., 109 Cal. 70, 41 P. 792; Nicoll v. Weldon, supra.

In Berri v. Rogero, 168 Cal. 740, 145 P. 97, the court used the following language, which is particularly appropriate in the case at bar:

"The law does not favor snap judgments. The policy of the law is to have every litigated case tried upon its merits, and it looks with disfavor upon a party who, regardless of the merits of his case, attempts to take advantage of the mistake, surprise, inadvertence, or neglect of his adversary. Where a party in default makes seasonable application to be relieved therefrom, and files an affidavit of merits alleging a good defense, and the plaintiff files no counter affidavit and makes no showing that he has suffered any prejudice or that injustice will result from the trial of the case upon its merits, very slight evidence will be required to justify a court in setting aside the default."

If the appellant had exercised as much industry in trying to bring about a trial of this case on the merits as it has in trying to prevent a trial on the merits, the action would no doubt have long since been finally determined.

We see no reason to continue this discussion. We think the appeal is wholly without merit.

The order is affirmed.

The true facts not appearing from record on appeal from judgment denying a petition for writ of mandate, every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record must be indulged in favor of the judgment.

2. Mandamus $\S$ 187(9)—It is presumed, record not showing reason for denying writ of mandate to compel corporation to issue financial statement, that there was legal one (Civ. Code, $\S$ 302a).

Notwithstanding that no reasons appear from record for entry of order denying a petition for writ of mandate to compel corporation to issue financial statement, as provided by Civ. Code, $\S$ 302a, it must be presumed that there was a legal one.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Application by Chris Kovacevich for writ of mandate against the Fischer Motor Body Company, formerly the Fischer-Gaffney Body Company, and others, to compel respondents to issue a financial statement. From a judgment denying the petition, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Josephine L. Kovacevich, for appellant.

Peter tum Suden and Richard tum Suden, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a judgment denying a petition for a writ of mandate.

Appellant, who was a stockholder in respondent corporation, sought by the proceeding to compel the issuance of a financial statement, as provided by section 302a of the Civil Code. A demurrer with an answer to the petition was filed by the respondent corporation. The answer denied certain of the material allegations of the petition. The demurrer was sustained, with leave to amend, and subsequently an amended petition was filed, to which respondent corporation on October 20, 1927, again demurred, filing therewith its motion to strike out portions of the amended petition. Thereafter, on November 4, 1927, the court made and entered the following order or judgment, from which the plaintiff appealed: "In this action, good cause appearing to the court, it is ordered that the petition for writ of mandate be and the same is hereby denied." The appeal was taken on the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions or the transcript provided by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure other than the clerk's transcript of the papers constituting the judgment roll. The certificate attached thereto enumerates the matters included therein, and the record fails to show what proceedings were had or that no evidence was adduced before the court at the time the judgment was rendered.

Appellant claims in his brief that the case was never set for trial, that there was no trial of any issue of fact, and that the entry of the judgment appealed from followed a hearing upon the demurrer to the amended petition.

[1, 2] Whatever may have been the true facts the same do not appear from the record before us; and although, as contended by appellant, the answer was before the court only in the event the petition stood the test of demurrer (Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Rolph, 184 Cal. 557, 194 P. 1005), yet, so far as shown, the demurrer might have been withdrawn or waived and the case have proceeded to trial upon the answer filed. Every intendment and presumption not contradicted by or inconsistent with the record on appeal must be indulged in favor of the judgment (Throop v. Weaver, 180 Cal. 335, 181 P. 55); and notwithstanding that no reason appears for the entry of the order denying the petition, it must be presumed that there was a legal one, in the absence of anything to show the contrary (Woods v. Diepenbrock, 141 Cal. 55, 74 P. 546; Jackson School District v. Culbert, 134 Cal. 508, 66 P. 741; Brown v. Vidal, 1 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 15; Myers v. Canepa, 37 Cal. App. 556, 174 P. 903, 906).

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

In trial under St. 1923, p. 696, $\S$ 2, for carrying of concealed weapons by one previously convicted of felonies, the clerk's reading to jury of prior conviction, which defendant admitted, instead of one he denied, in violation of Pen. Code, $\S\S$ 1025, 1093, subd. 1, and court's submission to jury of confessed prior convictions, contrary to sections 1025, 1158, amounted to error.

2. Witnesses $\Rightarrow$ 337(6)—Cross-examination of defendant as to convictions of burglary and carrying concealed weapons held permissible as impeachment (St. 1923, p. 696, § 2; Code Civ. Proc. § 2051; Pen. Code, §§ 1025, 1093).

In trial under St. 1923, p. 696, § 2, for carrying of concealed weapons by one previously convicted of felonies, cross-examination of defendant as to confessed prior convictions of second degree burglary and carrying concealed weapons was permissible as impeachment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, notwithstanding provisions of Pen. Code, §§ 1025, 1093.

3. Criminal law $\Rightarrow$ 1202(7)—Clerk's reference to confessed prior convictions in reading information, and court's submission thereof to jury, held not reversible error, where evidence thereof was properly received to impeach defendant (St. 1923, p. 696, § 2; Pen. Clerk's reference to admitted prior convictions in reading to jury information under St. 1923, c. 339, § 2, for carrying of concealed weapons by one previously convicted of felonies, in violation of Pen. Code, §§ 1025, 1093, subd. 1, and instructions submitting such convictions to jury in violation of sections 1025, 1158, held not reversible error, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, where evidence of such convictions was properly received as impeachment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2051, on cross-examination of defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James G. Conlan, Judge.

Roy Rogers was convicted of violating the statute making a felony of carrying concealed weapons by one previously convicted of a felony, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harry S. Whitthorne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and W. Augustine, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of violating section 2 of chapter 339 of the Statutes of 1923, making a felony of carrying concealed weapons by one previously convicted of a felony. The information under which the defendant was tried charged three prior convictions of felony: The first, July 4, 1918; the second, burglary at San Francisco, January 26, 1922; and the third, carrying concealed weapon in Humboldt county, March 20, 1924. Upon arraignment, the defendant denied the first prior alleged, but admitted the second and third.

[1] Notwithstanding these pleas, the clerk, in reading the information to the jury, read the second prior, which the defendant had admitted, instead of reading the first prior, which the defendant had denied. In submitting the case to the jury, the court submitted forms of verdicts upon the second and third priors. The reading of the information by the clerk in the manner stated was a violation of Penal Code, § 1025, and of subdivision 1, § 1093, Penal Code. In submitting to the jury as an issue the confessed prior convictions alleged second and third in the information, the court violated sections 1158 and 1025 of the Penal Code. That the foregoing proceedings at the trial amounted to error admits of no doubt, but whether such error requires a reversal of the judgment depends upon whether the record shows that a miscarriage of justice has occurred.

[2] The defendant also urges as ground of appeal the cross-examination of the defendant, who was a witness in his own behalf.

"Q. Have you ever been convicted of a felony? A. I have.

"Q. What one? A. Here in San Francisco.

"Q. What one? A. Second degree burglary.

"Q. What else?

"Mr. Whitthorne: I will have to object to it as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"The Court: Overruled.

"Mr. Skillin: What else? A. Concealed weapon.

"Q. What? A. Humboldt county, 1924.

"Q. For carrying concealed weapons? A. Yes."

These two convictions are the same as the second and third priors alleged in the information. This cross-examination was permissible as impeachment, under Code of Civil Procedure, § 2051. It was held in People v. Arnold, 116 Cal. 682, 687, 48 P. 803, that such cross-examination was permissible, notwithstanding the provisions of Penal Code, § 1093, and the language used in that decision is broad enough to include the provisions of Penal Code, § 1025, which provides that prior convictions confessed by the defendant shall not be alluded to on the trial. It is there said that the object of the section was to give the defendant the benefit of withholding from the jury the knowledge of such prior convictions in all instances other than where by the conduct of his own case the production of such facts is rendered essential to a proper presentation of the case of the People. See, also, 8 Cal. Jur. p. 647; People v. Booth, 72 Cal. App. 160, 166, 236 P. 987; People v. Crowley, 100 Cal. 478, 482, 483, 35 P. 84; People v. Oubridge, 38 Cal. App. 68, 175 P. 276.

[3] Eliminating those references at the trial to the priors which were made in violation of the provisions of the Penal Code, there would still remain for the consideration of the jury proof properly received of the same prior convictions. It would not be reasonable to believe that, if the references to prior convictions made by the clerk in reading the information and by the trial judge in giving his instructions had been eliminated, the jury's verdict would have been different, where evidence of the same priors remained before them, given from the mouth of the defendant himself.

Our examination of the record convinces us that the guilt of the defendant was clearly proven, and that a new trial should not be ordered, because of the errors committed at the trial, in view of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution.

It is therefore ordered that the judgment of conviction be and the same is hereby affirmed.

1. Evidence $\S$ 458—Parol evidence is admissible to show circumstances surrounding execution of guaranty, where intent as to limitation thereof is not clear from writing.

Written guaranty is limited or continuing according to purpose and intent appearing from the instrument, and, when the writing is ambiguous, parol testimony is admissible to show surrounding circumstances.

2. Guaranty $\S$ 38(1)—Entire written guaranty must be read together in determining whether continuing guaranty was intended.

Entire written guaranty must be read together to determine whether intent was to give a limited or a continuing guaranty.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 1050(3)—Admission of oral testimony as to purpose for which guaranty was given, though rendered unnecessary by express statement of instrument, held not prejudicial.

Admission of oral testimony to prove that guaranty was given to establish line of credit, though unnecessary in view of statement to that effect in written guaranty itself, was not prejudicial, in action upon the guaranty.

4. Guaranty $\S$ 38(1)—Guaranty limiting amount of guarantor's liability, but containing no limitation as to time, will generally be construed as continuing.

Where guaranty contains limitation as to the amount for which the guarantor will be bound, but contains no limitation as to time, guaranty will be generally construed as continuing and operative without limit until revoked, except as to the amount of the liability, which refers to the guarantor's liability and not to the amount of dealing between the principal and the guarantee.

5. Guaranty $\S$ 38(1)—Guarantor's liability, though limited, will be regarded as continuing, where purpose of contract is to give standing credit to principal debtor.

Liability under guaranty will be considered as continuing, where by the terms of the contract the object is to give standing credit to the principal debtor, though amount of guarantor's liability is limited.

6. Guaranty $\S$ 27—Guaranty should be construed to effectuate purpose for which writing is executed.

Instrument of guaranty should be construed like any other instrument to effectuate the purpose for which the writing is executed.

7. Husband and wife $\S$ 87(2)—Married woman's guaranty of her husband's account to amount of \$500, for purpose of establishing husband's credit, held continuing guaranty under which guarantor was liable regardless of extent of purchases of principal.

Written guaranty by married woman, "for the purpose of establishing my husband's credit," and providing, "I hereby guaranty Mr. K.'s account to the amount of $500," held continuing guaranty, under which guarantor was liable to extent of maximum sum named regardless of extent of dealings between guarantee and principal, especially where the first purchase of merchandise was for an amount much below the maximum sum.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Miller, Judge.

Action by Kierulff & Ravenscroft against Tresa E. Koping. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.
Jacobs & Jacobs, of Stockton, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The action is founded upon a written guaranty in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Stockton, Calif., May 5, 1923.

"Kierulff & Ravenscroft, Dear Sirs, Following is a list of property owned by me described for the purpose of establishing my husbands credit with you who is the owner of the radio store known as the Stockton Radio Shoppe; 1 apartment house, value $31,000 at 437 E. Fremont St., Stockton (¼ interest); 1 22-acre ranch value $6500, six miles E. of Stockton on The Linden Road (½ interest); 1 4-room bungalow at 150 Ramona St., Stockton, value $2700 (sole owner).

"Following is a list of the mortgages:

Apt house	$12000
Ranch	2500
House	1400

"I hereby guarantee Mr. Koping's account to the amount of $500 Five hundred dollars.

"[Signed] Tresa E. Koping."

The transcript shows that at and prior to the execution of this guaranty, V. G. Koping, the husband of the defendant, was conducting a radio shop or store in the city of Stockton, and that he desired to place in the store certain radio equipment or merchandise kept and sold by the plaintiff. It appears that this merchandise could only be handled by regularly licensed dealers, or at least was only sold to and through regularly licensed dealers. It further appears from the transcript that the plaintiffs, before selling such merchandise to the said V. G. Koping, desired some guaranty as to his credit, not being satisfied with V. G. Koping's credit rating as it theretofore existed. In pursuance of the understanding had between the plaintiffs, V. G. Koping and the defendant, relative to the sale and purchase of such radio equipment, the defendant signed the foregoing written guaranty, which guaranty was forwarded to the plaintiffs by the said V. G. Koping. Thereafter, and during the course of the business conducted by the said V. G. Koping, he ordered and received from the plaintiffs several hundred dollars worth of radio merchandise, leaving, on October 7, 1926, a balance due the plaintiffs of the sum of $600. During the course of the business conducted by the said V. G. Koping and his dealings with the plaintiff, it appears that he paid on account of merchandise purchased from them the sum of $542.

[1] The action herein is founded upon the theory that the writing executed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiffs is a continuing guaranty.

Some minor objections are urged by the defendant as a reason for ordering a reversal of judgment, but these objections all appear to be answered by the provisions of our Civil Code. In the first place it is urged that the record shows no acceptance of the guaranty executed and delivered by the defendant. Section 2795, Civil Code, changes the rule announced in many cases, and provides that an absolute guaranty is binding upon the guarantor without notice of acceptance. Some question is also raised as to whether notice was given to the defendant of the default of V. G. Koping in payment of the merchandise ordered from the plaintiffs. This objection, again, is obviated by section 2807, Civil Code, which reads: "A guarantor of payment or performance is liable to the guarantee immediately upon the default of the principal, and without demand or notice." These Code provisions are a complete answer to the decisions of courts of other states having no such legislative enactments. As we read the record, there is really but one question in this case, and that is, does the writing executed by the defendant and delivered to the plaintiffs, as herein stated, constitute a continuing guaranty? If so, then and in that case the defendant is liable even though V. G. Koping purchased goods of more than twice the value of the amount specified as the extent of the defendant's liability, and also paid to the plaintiffs, during the course of his business dealings with them, a sum of money in excess of that set forth in the guaranty limiting the amount for which the defendant agreed to stand chargeable. The cases having to do with guaranties set forth many examples and discuss the limitations contained therein whether as to time or as to amount, or as to a particular transaction, and hold the written guaranty as limited or continuing according to the purpose and intent appearing from an inspection of the writing itself, or when the writing is ambiguous, then resort is had to the surrounding circumstances under which the writing was executed, and testimony showing the same is admissible.

In the case of Lean v. Geagan, 20 Cal. App. 260, 128 P. 792, we find this statement:

"A guaranty limiting the amount for which the guarantor will be bound, but without limitation as to time, and without circumstances to evince a contrary intention, will, in general, be construed to be a continuing guaranty and operative till revoked. The guarantor will be held liable to the extent of his guaranty, though the principal debtor may have during the existence of the guaranty contracted debts equal to or greater than the sum named therein."

In this case the guaranty read in part:

"In consideration of such sale and credit extended I hereby guarantee the payment of any and all indebtedness which may hereafter become due * * * provided the amount due or to become due shall at no time exceed the sum of $1,000.00."

The trial court at first held this to be a continuing guaranty; subsequently, granted a motion for a new trial, and upon appeal, the order granting a new trial was reversed. The controlling principle in that case appears to be the purpose for which the guaranty was granted, to wit, the establishment of a credit on the part of the person about to make purchase of merchandise. It appears, also, that the merchandise purchased in that case was not merchandise included in one order, but merchandise purchased upon successive orders. The holding of that case is further to the effect that, there being no limitation of time, and no limitation as to the guaranty of any specific order, it ran in favor of the person to whom the guaranty was executed, to the extent of the sum of $1,000, the limitation mentioned having reference only to the amount of the guarantor's liability, and not to the extent of the dealings between the purchaser and the one giving credit.

In the case of Nason & Co. v. Kennedy, 40 Cal. App. 159, 180 P. 349, circumstances were presented from which the court held that the writing executed and delivered as a guaranty was not a continuing one. The writing involved in the Nason Case is worded as follows:

"I do hereby guarantee the account of L. C. Kennedy up to the sum of $750.00, for what goods in your line he may purchase from you, and it is understood that if he does not pay his bills under the terms of purchase that I will pay them or see that they are paid."

The court, in its opinion in that case, observes that the guaranty was silent as to what particular account or bill it referred to, and, therefore, that under such uncertainty, resort should be had to the circumstances surrounding the execution of the instrument in order to determine the intention of the parties, and that the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence showed that the defendant's son was desirous of engaging in the mercantile business and had placed an initial order for a stock of goods with the Los Angeles agent of the plaintiff, whose place of business was in the city of San Francisco. Upon receiving this order, the plaintiff wrote to the agent, stating, in substance, that it could not make shipment of the goods unless payment thereof was guaranteed, and inclosed with its letter the form of guaranty, with the request that the agent have the mother of Kennedy sign the same, etc. And it appears from this, and from further statements in the opinion in that case, that there were sufficient facts disclosed to justify the trial court in finding that the intent and purpose of the guaranty was to cover the particular transaction, to wit, the initial order of a stock of merchandise, and was not a guaranty covering other or further transactions. The writing in the Nason Case contains nothing which indicates a purpose to establish the credit of the intending purchaser. It would appear that a stock of goods was being ordered, and the mother of the purchaser simply guaranteed the payment of the specific stock of goods ordered.

[2, 3] In the case at bar the whole instrument must be read together, the first sentence as well as the last clause. In the first sentence the intention of the guarantor is expressed in direct language, to wit: "For the purpose of establishing my husband's credit with you," etc. The record in this case indicates a like purpose, and while we think the instrument itself discloses sufficiently the purpose, and that oral testimony was unnecessary, the admission of oral testimony indicating a like purpose cannot be held prejudicial.

[4, 5] In the annotation to the case of Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Cassidy, Ann. Cas. 1918E, p. 611, appears a long list of cases, so many as to prohibit their being set forth herein, supporting the following statement:

"Where by the terms of the guaranty it is evident that the object is to give a standing credit to the principal to be used from time to time either indefinitely or for a certain period it is generally deemed a continuing guaranty."

And, further:

"Whether a contract of guaranty is a continuing undertaking is a question of intention which must be gathered from the instrument itself, or from the course of dealings between the parties or from both. If it appears that a future course of dealing for an indefinite time, or a succession of credits to be given, was contemplated by the parties, the contract will be construed to be a continuing guaranty."

It is further held that the mere fact that the person for whose benefit and credit the guaranty is executed in the course of his dealings has bought and paid for more goods than the amount specified in such instrument does not discharge a continuing guaranty. On the other hand, as stated in 28 California Jurisprudence, 959:

"Where a guaranty contains no express limitation as to either time or amount, and there is nothing in the instrument itself from which it can be inferred that it was a guarantor's intention to leave it open as to both, the guaranty will generally be understood as referring to a single transaction," etc.

In the instant case there is a limitation as to the amount, and therefore, subject to the rule stated in the same volume on page 960:

"Where the guaranty contains a limitation as to the amount for which the guarantor will be bound, but contains no limitation as to time, and there is nothing in the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract to evince a contrary intention, it will in general be construed to be a continuing guaranty and operative without limit, except as to the amount of the liability, until revoked. The limitation mentioned in such a guaranty has reference to the amount of a guarantor's liability, and not to the amount of dealing between the principal and the guarantee," etc.

Likewise, as appears on page 961 of the same volume:

"Although the amount is limited, the liability under the guaranty will be regarded as continuing when, by the terms of the contract, it is evident that the object is to give a standing credit to the principal debtor, to be used from time to time either indefinitely or until a certain period," etc.

This latter statement coincides precisely with the circumstances presented in the instant case, to wit, the giving of a standing credit.

[6, 7] While the subject of construction of guaranties has received considerable attention, it is now held that an instrument of guaranty is to be construed like any other instrument, neither to limit nor to extend the terms of the instrument under or beyond the intention of the parties, but to effectuate the purposes for which the writing is executed. See note to Scovill Mfg. Co. v. Cassidy, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 609. That the writing in the case at bar was intended to be a continuing guaranty is further shown by the size of the merchandise order of V. G. Koping, at the time of the execution of the instrument. That order shows a purchase of merchandise in the value of only $85.70, and it is not reasonable to hold that the guaranty in the sum of $500 was executed simply to cover that specific order, or any other particular specific order, and if such is not the case, then it necessarily follows that the purpose of the instrument was to establish the credit of V. G. Koping, and charge the defendant with liability for his dealings with the plaintiffs, to the extent, at least, of the sum of $500.

While the objection has been raised, we find nothing in the record which indicates a purpose or intent to vary the terms of the written instrument, though the record does contain testimony disclosing the intent of the guarantor, just as set forth in the writing signed by her.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re CATE. (Civ. 4702.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Nov. 22, 1928.

On petition for rehearing.

For former opinion, see 270 P. 968.

Alfred E. Cate, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Hewitt, McCormick & Crump, of Los Angeles (Guy Richards Crump, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent Los Angeles Bar Ass'n.

WORKS, P. J. Respondent bar association takes the ground, in addition to other points presented in support of its petition for a rehearing of this proceeding, that confusion would result from the establishment in California of the rule that courts have inherent power to admit, discipline, and disbar attorneys at law and to readmit disbarred attorneys, a rule already firmly fixed in most other jurisdictions. This confusion is feared because the inherent power naturally rests in several courts, it being unnecessary to decide where the line is to be drawn which will segregate the courts which do not enjoy it from those which justly may wield it. The fear is more imaginary than real. In the first place, the power in each court is confined to its own bar. No court may, through its exercise, except under the supreme judicial control below to be mentioned, impose a bar on any other court, nor may it interfere with the bar of any other. Secondly, we have not found that any confusion has resulted from the existence of the rule in any other jurisdiction in which it has maintained a footing, nor has respondent bar association pointed us to a state of confusion under the rule anywhere. Again, if it be granted for the sake of argument that confusion will result from the adoption of the rule, the havoc wrought by it will be negligible when compared with the damage to be done to the administration of justice by a concession of sole and exclusive power over such matters in the Legislature. Nor will the confusion to follow the adoption of the rule, still admitting the possibility of it for the sake of argument, in any degree approach the inharmony to result from a concession of a part of the power to the Legislature; the remainder resting in the courts.

Finally, if confusion should result from the adoption of the rule, we know of no reason why the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its plenary control over the law of judicial decision within the state and treating the power as one resting in the judiciary generally and not in particular courts, could not determine what courts should and what courts should not exercise it, thus holding the rule in abeyance for the time being, under a sound judicial public policy, in the excluded courts. The Supreme Court, beyond a doubt, to our minds, could determine that itself alone should exercise the power. That court, we think, could declare, if, indeed, the specific declaration were necessary, that its exercise of the power should be binding upon the tribunals of the state which are inferior to it. The court could thus, through admissions or readmissions ordered by it in the exercise of its inherent power, if the exercise were ever necessary, add to the number of members of the bar entitled to practice in all the courts of the state. Such is the effect of the opinion rendered in Hoopes v. Bradshaw, 231 Pa. 485, 80 A. 1098.

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 18, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Correct version of transaction between owner and contractor in action to foreclose mechanics' liens held for trial court, and finding under conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055).

In action to foreclose mechanics' liens, correct version of transaction between owner and contractor, whereby realty was conveyed by owner to contractor, with understanding that contractor should complete building and sell property, retaining amount of contract out of profits and giving balance to owner, was for trial court, and finding in accordance with version testified to by contractor under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 2055, based on conflicting evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Finding that lien claimant did not know of contractor's cancellation of building contract, based on conflicting evidence, held correct on appeal.

In action to foreclose mechanics' liens, finding by trial court that none of laborers or materialmen knew of cancellation of building contract between owner and contractor, based on conflicting evidence, must be accepted as correct on appeal.

3. Mechanics' liens §315—Surety under bond for owner and materialmen held not released by owner's conveyance to contractor and contractor's trust deed to owner (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183; Civ. Code, § 2836).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that surety on contractor's bond shall not be released by change in building contract between owner and contractor, transfer of premises by owner to contractor and execution of trust deed by contractor, whereby building was to be sold after completion and proceeds divided between owner and contractor, did not under Civ. Code, § 2836, release surety on bond running in favor of owner and laborers and materialmen.

4. Mechanics' liens §315—Recorded transfer to contractor, and trust deed to secure payment, held not notice to lien claimants.

Where transfer by owner to contractor and trust deed by contractor to owner was intended to secure contractor in payment of contract price, and provision for canceling building contract was not brought to notice of lien claimants, recording of transfer and execution of trust deed was not notice to lien claimants, who were not required, after notice of contract, to daily examine files of county recorder's office, to ascertain if terms of contract had been changed or modified.

5. Mechanics' liens §315—Cancellation clause, attached to building contract after building was partly completed, held "modification" not releasing surety (Code Civ. Proc. § 1183).

Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that no modification of building contract shall work release of surety, held to cover cancellation clause attached to building contract after building had been partly completed, especially where knowledge of cancellation was not brought to materialmen or laborers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter Guerin, Judge.

Consolidated cases by the Western Brick Company against F. L. Smith and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Eagle Indemnity Company appeals. Affirmed.

J. Karl Loddell and H. L. Watt, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo, H. B. Cornell, Glen Behymer, Irl D. Brett, Alfred J. Smallberg, R. L. Horton, and Andreani & Haines, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Eagle Indemnity Company, a corporation, from a judgment rendered in seven cases, consolidated and tried as one, for the foreclosure of certain mechanics' liens.

On or about the 27th day of May, 1924, one I. G. Simons, the owner of certain real property in the city and county of Los Angeles, entered into a building contract with one Robert W. Clark for the erection of a five-story apartment and store building. The cost of said building named in the contract was $82,869, payable as follows: A first trust deed in the sum of $45,000; a second trust deed in the sum of $27,500; final payment in cash of $10,369 upon completion of the building. At the time of the execution of the contract, the contractor, as principal, and the Eagle Indemnity Company as surety, entered into an undertaking in the sum of $73,000, the surety bond containing the usual covenants providing that it should inure to the benefit of both the owner, laborers and materialmen; the contractor and surety undertaking to complete the building, and agreeing to pay for all labor and materials. The contractor proceeded with the construction of the building as provided for in the building contract, and completed the building on or about the 5th day of November, 1924, on which last-named date notice of completion was filed in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county.

During the course of the construction of said building the owner informed the contractor that he would not be able to pay the $10,369 called for in the contract upon the completion of the structure. Thereupon, and on or about the 13th day of August, 1924, Simons, as owner of the premises, executed a deed of conveyance to the contractor, Robert W. Clark. This deed was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Los Angeles county. At the same time Clark executed and delivered to Simons a promissory note in the sum of $17,500, and as security for the payment thereof executed and delivered to Simons a trust deed covering the property that had been conveyed to him by the deed just referred to as executed and delivered by Simons. Thereupon the following words were written upon the building contract just referred to:

"In consideration of $10.00 and other good and valuable considerations paid to said owner by said contractor, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, it is mutually understood and agreed that this agreement is cancelled, terminated and discharged. [Signed] Robert W. Clark, Contractor. I. G. Simons."

In relation to the transaction just referred to, the trial court found as follows:

"That on or about the 13th day of August, 1924, the said Isaac G. Simons transferred and conveyed said real property above described to the said Robert W. Clark under the agreement and understanding between said parties that the said Robert W. Clark should complete said building, but after the completion thereof, said property should be sold. That out of the proceeds of said sale Robert W. Clark should first receive and be paid the full amount of his contract, and that any balance thereof then remaining should be given and paid to the said Isaac G. Simons."

The cancellation of the contract, as shown by the above writing, was also found by the court, but in relation thereto the court found as follows:

"That none of the plaintiffs above named had any knowledge or information concerning the transfer or conveyance of said property to said Robert W. Clark or the termination of said building contract prior to the completion of said building, as aforesaid, but at all times prior to the completion of said building, said plaintiffs thought and believed that the said Robert W. Clark was constructing said building as contractor, under and pursuant to the terms of said building contract described in paragraph III hereof."

The record shows that the property was sold on or about the 26th day of June, 1925, under the second trust deed hereinbefore referred to, which deed was prior in right to the mechanics' liens owned by the respective plaintiffs, and judgment therefor was entered against the surety company for the amount of the liens and foreclosure upon the property denied.

[1] The appellant strongly urges that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding of the court, which we have quoted herein, to the effect that there was an understanding between Clark and Simons relative to the completion of the building that the building should be sold and out of the proceeds the contractor was to receive his contract price, and the owner whatever balance should remain. The contractor, Robert W. Clark, called as a witness under the terms of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, testified upon direct examination as follows:

"I started work upon the construction of the building, and about the time the roof was on Simons informed me that it would be impossible for him to pay me the money that would be due under the contract. * * * We simply agreed that inasmuch as he, Simons, did not have the money to pay me on the contract, that this agreement was made in order to see if it would be possible it might work out. These transfers were made to secure me as to my contract price. Over and above the contract price, he was to get any proceeds of the sale."

Upon cross-examination by counsel for the appellant herein, this witness modified his testimony to some extent and testified as follows:

"I gave Simons the third trust deed for $17,500, an agreement to that effect, or a statement to the effect that I would finish the things as successfully as possible and sell it; that I was to receive my full contract price. Then he was to receive what balance there might be up to the $17,500, and that I was to receive all the balance if there was any."

Upon redirect examination, referring to a deposition theretofore given by the witness, the witness testified:

"I testified that there was a separate agreement to the effect that, if the building were disposed of for a sufficient amount to give me my full payment of the contract, Simons was to get all over and above that money. I gave Simons a third trust deed for $17,500, on the premises, which was the amount we agreed as being the value of the lot, and incidentally a separate agreement to the effect that if the building were disposed of for a sufficient amount to give me my full payment of the contract, Simons was to get all over and above that money."

Again, the record shows that, upon examination by counsel for appellant, the witness gave a different version of the transaction and testified that Simons was to get only $17,500, and he, the witness, was to get his contract price and also all over and above the $17,500. Our attention has not been called to the testimony of any other witness relative to this transaction, and as the trial court had the benefit of the witness Clark appearing before him, and being able to judge of the manner in which he testified, just what was the correct version was and is distinctly a matter for the trial court, and if the trial court believed the version given by the witness under his direct examination conducted under the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, the finding of the trial court is sufficient to support it, and cannot be disturbed on appeal.

[2] Again, the finding of the court that none of the laborers or materialmen knew of the so-called cancellation clause indorsed upon the contract is challenged by the appellant. Here, again, the testimony is in conflict. The witness Clark testified that he notified the laborers and materialmen; his testimony in this particular is contradicted by a number of witnesses. The court resolved this conflict in favor of the lien claimants, and, being based upon conflicting evidence, must be accepted as correct.

[3] The main reliance of appellant is based upon section 2836, Civil Code, which reads in part as follows: "A surety cannot be held beyond the express terms of his contract"—and quotes to some extent from the cases of Alexander v. Bosworth, 26 Cal. App. 589, 147 P. 607; County of San Luis Obispo v. Ryal, 175 Cal. 34, 165 P. 1; Turner v. Fidelity & Trust Co. of Maryland, 187 Cal. 76, 200 P. 959; Roberts v. Security Trust & Savings Bank, 196 Cal. 557, 238 P. 673; and also some other cases in which it is held that a surety is not bound by a contract that he has not made or authorized. All of these cases we have examined, and find that they state the law just as insisted upon by appellant, but are not governing in this case by reason of the Code provisions relating to building contracts and the conditions and stipulations contained in the bond executed by the Eagle Indemnity Company. Section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, contains, among others, the following provision:

"No change or alteration of the work or modification of any such contract between the owner and his contractor shall release or exonerate any surety or sureties upon any bond given under this section."

The bond executed by the appellant runs not only in favor of the owner of the premises, but runs in favor of any one who should perform labor upon the building being constructed, or furnish materials for the construction of the building mentioned in the contract. The words of the bond are as follows:

"That this bond shall inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon, or furnish materials to be used in the work described in said contract so as to give such persons a right of action upon this bond, upon any suit brought to foreclose the liens provided for by the laws of the state of California, or in a separate suit upon this bond."

There is no question in this case but that everything mentioned in the mechanics' liens went into the building described in the contract. That the transaction had between Clark and Simons did not release the Eagle Indemnity Company, see the well-considered opinion in the case of Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 170 P. 1093. We quote from that opinion as follows:

"It is the rule generally that a surety has a right to stand upon the terms of his contract of suretyship, and that he will be exonerated to the extent that he has been prejudiced by any violation of the covenants of the contract, but we are forced to the conclusion that this general rule cannot be made to apply to the contract of suretyship in suit here. And this is so, we think, because of the fact that the bond in question was executed pursuant and in obedience to the requirements of a statute which, although it permits such a bond to contain conditions for the performance of the contract, nevertheless also expressly provides that 'no * * * modification of any * * * contract between the owner and his contractors shall release or exonerate any surety * * * upon any bond given under this section.' Code Civ. Proc. § 1183."

The same question was before the Supreme Court in the case of Hub Hardware Co. v. Aetna Accident & Liability Co., 178 Cal. 264, 173 P. 81, where it was held that the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, enter into every surety bond given to insure the performance of a building contract. The language of the court there used, is as follows:

"The bond itself specifies that the principal and surety 'are held and firmly bound unto any and all persons, companies or corporations, who perform labor on, or furnish materials to be used in the said work of improvement aforementioned, in the sum of $17,500.' Statutes upholding liability inuring to the benefit of those with whom the person bound has no contractual relation have been repeatedly sustained. If the surety makes the contract with the law before him, the law enters into and becomes a part of the agreement"—citing Jones v. Great Southern Fireproof Hotel Co. (C. C. A.) 86 F. 370; Hollenbeck-Bush Planing Mill Co. v. Amweg, 177 Cal. 159, 170 P. 148.

In the case at bar, just as in the Hub Hardware Co., supra, Case, the surety bound itself to pay for any materials furnished to be used, and used in the described work. In other words, the surety contracted to pay for the materials that went into the work, and not whether Simons or Clark claimed to be the owner of the structure when it was completed.

[4, 5] It is further insisted that the recording of the transfer from Simons to Clark, and the execution of the trust deed by Clark in favor of Simons, was notice to the lien claimants. We do not well see how this would in any wise release the surety for the payment of the materials that went into the described building. While not expressly so found by the trial court, the transaction was, in effect, one designed simply to secure the contractor in the payment of the contract price, and, as the finding that the so-called cancellation clause written on the contract was not brought home to the lien claimants, we do not find any tenable theory upon which the surety should be relieved from the terms and provisions of the bond executed by it.

The argument of appellant that the cancellation clause attached to the contract after the building had been partly completed is not covered by the provision of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that no modification of a building contract shall work a release of the surety, while certainly ingenious, does not impress us as being outside of what was intended by the Legislature. While the word "modification" in its ordinary use would relate only to a limitation or reduction in degree, it would be unreasonable to hold that the Legislature intended that after a contract had been partly completed, and laborers had performed work and materialmen had furnished materials, that a cancellation clause attached to the contract and signed by the contractor and owner would relieve the surety and leave the laborers and materialmen remediless, and especially so in a case where knowledge of such cancellation has not been brought home either to the materialmen or to the laborers. Under such circumstances we think the clause quoted from section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, applies.

Whether the transaction disclosed by the record in this case would work a release of the surety bond as to the beneficial interest of the owner in the property is not necessary for us to decide, as that question is not directly before us. The fact is, however, that the building was erected according to the conditions of the contract, and all the circumstances connected with the case indicate that the arrangement entered into between the contractor and the owner was simply for the purpose of further securing the contractor in obtaining the contract price agreed upon, and that the beneficial ownership of the property never did pass from the owner to the contractor. Again, we think the law does not require a laborer or materialman, after having notice of a contract, to daily examine the files of the county recorder's office to ascertain if the terms of the contract have been changed, modified or canceled before proceeding with his labor or delivery of materials. This requirement is the effect of appellant's argument.

The minor points urged for reversal by the appellant have been examined, but do not demand extended consideration herein.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

Ex parte BLACK. (Cr. 1736.) ★

1st District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Oct. 19, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1928.

1. Infants $\S$ 16—Charge of delinquency is not a criminal charge.

Charge of delinquency is not a criminal charge, it being neither a misdemeanor nor a felony, and hence the ordinary provisions of the Penal Code relating to such matters, such as section 1387, do not apply.

2. Infants $\S$ 16—Infant's discharge under first petition did not require discharge under second petition for moral delinquency, showing sexual familiarity with man named in first petition and other man (Juvenile Court Act, $\S$ 6).

Discharge of infant under petition to commit her to detention home for moral delinquency, because court failed to make proper findings, held not to entitle her to discharge under second petition for moral delinquency because of sexual familiarity with men, under Juvenile Court Act (St. 1915, p. 1229) $\S$ 6, where in specifying such delinquency it named other occasions than those in first petition with the same man, as well as with another man.

Application by Anna Black for a writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Superintendent of the Ventura County Detention Home. Writ denied.

Jarrett Beckett, of Ventura, for petitioner.

Burton Rogers, Dist. Atty., of Ventura, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner, Anna Black, is detained in the Ventura county detention home. She seeks to be released upon habeas corpus. It appears that on August 1, 1928, a verified petition was filed by the probation officer of Ventura county in the superior court, averring said Anna Black to be a person under the age of 21 years, and that she was then leading a dissolute and immoral life, and praying that she be adjudged a ward of the juvenile court; that on the 2d day of August, 1928, that court made an order committing her to the Ventura School for Girls. She was placed in that institution and remained therein until October 5, 1928. On the 3d day of October she filed a verified application in the superior court for a writ of habeas corpus. The writ was issued and made returnable October 5th, at which time she was ordered released and discharged. This order was made because it appeared that the proceedings up to that time had been defective, in that no proper findings had been made by the court before ordering the minor committed and depriving her parents of her custody.

Immediately thereafter, and on October 5, 1928, the district attorney of Ventura county filed another petition to have Anna Black adjudged a ward of the juvenile court. She was thereupon committed to the detention home, where she still remains. In the oral argument before this court, as well as in petitioner's briefs, the principal reliance is placed upon section 1387 of the Penal Code.

[2] However, it is provided in section 6 of said act that "if said person shall be discharged by the juvenile court * * * such order of discharge [or dismissal] shall constitute a bar to any further proceedings in any court against said person upon said charge." St. 1915, p. 1229. The mere reading of this language is sufficient to establish the proposition that, if the second petition filed herein were substantially the same as the first, the petitioner would be entitled to her discharge, but this is not the case. An examination of the second petition shows that the principal complaint concerning this minor is that she has been guilty of sexual familiarity with certain men. However, the second petition names other occasions than those named in the first, with the same man, as well as with another man. It is apparent that these additional acts are of themselves sufficient to give the juvenile court jurisdiction to declare petitioner a delinquent, as being in danger of leading a lewd and immoral life. Of course, the principal purpose of the juvenile court act is to safeguard the morality and character of persons of tender years. Its provisions are for their benefit, and we do not think a fair construction of them warrants the conclusion that it was intended that one in need of its aid should be deprived thereof because of a discharge by the juvenile court, where, after such discharge, other acts of delinquency than those presented to and considered by the court previous to the discharge are subsequently brought to its attention through a proper proceeding.

The petition for writ of habeas corpus is denied, and the petitioner is remanded.

PEOPLE v. GORMAN et al. (Cr. 1691.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 19, 1928.

1. Embezzlement $\S$ 44(6)—Conviction for embezzlement held sustained by testimony that corporate officer appropriated to own use proceeds of checks fraudulently issued for false credits entered by officer.

In prosecution for embezzlement, evidence that officer of corporation in charge of accounts carried account of one dealer under fictitious name, and issued checks for goods not delivered to corporation, but falsely credited by officer to fictitious person's account, and that officer used money derived from payment of checks, ostensibly cashed by fictitious payee, for his own use, established the corpus delicti, and was sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Embezzlement $\S$ 35—Allegation that corporate officer embezzled money held not variance from proof showing embezzlement of check under evidence.

Where evidence in prosecution for embezzlement showed that corporate officer fraudulently appropriated to own use certain money belonging to corporation and within custody of officer, there was no variance between allegations that embezzlement charged was of so much money, and proof that offense, if committed, consisted in embezzlement of check.

3. Criminal law $\S$ 1186(4)—Admission, in prosecution for five offenses of embezzlement, of evidence concerning other embezzlements, not charged nor proved, was not error, where no bad faith nor prejudice was shown (Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½).

In prosecution of defendant for five separate offenses of embezzlement, introduction of evidence tending to prove commission by defendant of two other embezzlements, neither of which was charged in information against defendant, and as to which proof failed, was not error, where defendant was convicted of two embezzlements and acquitted of three, and there was no suggestion of bad faith in prosecuting officer, and no showing of prejudice to defendant, in view of Const. art. 6, $\S$ 4½.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 1162—Errors of judgment, not too serious in probable effect, if committed in criminal prosecution, should be overlooked.

If, in good faith, errors of judgment be committed in criminal prosecution, which are not too serious in their probable effect, they should be overlooked or condoned.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Edmund B. Gorman and Abraham Kirsch were convicted of embezzlement, and Abraham Kirsch appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph W. Ryan and Samuel Horowitz, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Asa Keyes, Dist. Atty., and Tracy C. Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction on each of two counts of embezzlement, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] The first point presented by appellant is to the effect that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. While an examination of the transcript discloses the fact that the evidence was not as clear as might have been desired, nevertheless sufficient is therein contained from which the jury was warranted in deducing therefrom the following conclusions, to wit: Defendant was the vice president and assistant secretary of the Amalgamated Metals Corporation, which, among other things, was engaged in the business of buying junk or scrap metal. Among the persons from whom junk was purchased were two brothers named Koplowitz. Some trouble with the police department having arisen concerning the method of purchasing junk from individuals other than licensed dealers, the account of the Koplowitz brothers, who were peddlers of junk, was changed on the books of the Amalgamated Metals Corporation, so that said account was carried under the fictitious name of C. Bronson, and thereafter, as payments became due for junk delivered to the Amalgamated Metals Corporation by the Koplowitz brothers, checks were drawn in favor of C. Bronson. As vice president of the corporation, defendant exercised his authority to control the manner in which such account should be handled. He also gave directions to various employees of the corporation with reference to making out credit slips which represented the weight of junk received from "C. Bronson" and the price to be paid therefor. Although not without conflict, the evidence showed that by the order of defendant, on each of the occasions charged in the information, the C. Bronson account was credited in specified amounts, which represented the delivery to the corporation of junk which in fact was never received by the corporation. Thereafter checks were issued by the corporation in favor of C. Bronson in payment of the several amounts credited to such account, which checks were ostensibly cashed by the payee thereof. According to the admission of defendant, the money derived from the payment of such checks was eventually received by him and appropriated to his own use. In such assumed circumstances, it is clear that the corpus delicti was established, and that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

[2] Appellant also urges that a variance existed as between the allegations contained in the information and the "proof," in that the embezzlement as charged in the information was as of so much money; whereas the evidence showed that, if guilty at all, the offense consisted in the embezzlement of a check. But, as hereinbefore stated, the evidence was sufficient to justify the conclusion that by means and methods designed and adopted by defendant certain specified moneys belonging to the corporation, which in fact were within the custody and control of defendant, or had been intrusted to him by the corporation, were fraudulently appropriated by defendant to his own use and benefit, from which it results that the contention of defendant in this regard cannot be sustained.

[3] Appellant also complains that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court, in that on the trial of the action, over the objection of defendant, the prosecution was allowed to introduce evidence which it was claimed tended to prove the commission by defendant of two other certain embezzlements, neither of which was charged in the information against defendant, and as to which, as conceded by the deputy district attorney in charge of the prosecution, the proof failed. In the case of People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507, it is held, generally, but with some explanation, that, on a prosecution of the defendant on a charge of uttering a forged indorsement on a draft, evidence of other forgeries claimed to have been committed by the defendant were admissible against him, notwithstanding the fact that, as to such other alleged forgeries, the defendant had theretofore stood trial and been acquitted of the commission of such offenses.

In connection with such claim of prejudicial error arising from the admission of evidence relating to other similar offenses alleged to have been committed by defendant, the record herein discloses the fact that by the terms of the information on which defendant was prosecuted he was charged with the commission of ten separate offenses, of which five were for embezzlement and the remaining five were for grand larceny, based upon the identical facts which constituted the foundation for the several charges of embezzlement, and that, after evidence had been introduced relating to such charges of embezzlement and grand larceny, the charges as to grand larceny were dismissed, leaving intact the charges as to five separate embezzlements by defendant, and as to each of which evidence was introduced by the prosecution. It further appears that defendant was acquitted as to three of such embezzlement charges, and convicted on two of them. Having failed to secure the conviction of defendant on either of such three charges of embezzlement, it is clear that, so far as affects the two charges of embezzlement on which defendant was convicted, each of the three unsustained charges stands on the same footing as each of the other alleged embezzlements as to which the proof failed, and as to the introduction of evidence relating thereto the appellant now complains. The extension of the principle for which appellant contends would inevitably lead to the result that in every case in which two or more embezzlements were charged, and wherein the proof failed as to any one or more of them, if defendant were convicted as to any of the others, he would be entitled to a new trial as to such offenses of which he was convicted, because, forsooth, the prosecution had prejudiced the defense by injecting into the case a suspicion that the defendant was guilty of some other offense, when as a matter of fact, as to such crime, he was altogether innocent. As a result of such a rule, in the service of public interest and financial economy, no prosecution would ever be had wherein a defendant was charged with the commission of more than one offense, because, ordinarily, no prosecuting officer would feel justified in taking the chances of a mistrial, which necessarily would be involved where two or more offenses were charged in the same information or indictment.

[4] However, on the one hand, it is apparent that if, on the trial of a criminal action, a prosecuting attorney be permitted to promiscuously and indiscriminately present for the consideration of the jury various and sundry scraps of evidence which utterly fail to make out even a prima facie case as to an offense similar in its nature to that for the commission of which the defendant is on trial, but which merely have the effect of casting a suspicion upon him, the defendant necessarily will be placed at a considerable disadvantage, if not seriously prejudiced, as to his defense. On the other hand, it should be remembered that the law is not an exact science; that facts are at least difficult, if not impossible, of demonstration; and that lawyers and judges often differ one from the other in their interpretation of the law, just as members of the jury may likewise differ in their conclusions on the ultimate facts. If, for example, in a proper case, a prosecuting attorney should attempt the presentation of facts which in his judgment were sufficient to establish the prior commission by the defendant of an offense similar to that of which the defendant may stand charged, but with such conclusion as to the law the trial judge be not in accord, or that at a critical point in the proposed chain of evidence, by reason of some unforeseen happening, an indispensable witness either should fail to appear at the trial or to give the anticipated testimony, should it necessarily and inevitably follow that a mistrial should result?

It is manifest that human frailty and the ideal administration of justice are often in conflict and that perfection cannot be attained. All that reasonably may be expected is an approximation. The modern tendency is that if, in good faith, errors of judgment be committed—if they be not too serious in their probable effect—they should be overlooked or condoned. No rule may be formulated which in all cases will be an infallible guide to justice. The determination of a question such as is here presented must depend largely upon the surrounding circumstances. In the instant case no suggestion is made regarding bad faith in the prosecuting officer, and the situation as presented was undoubtedly attributable to an error in judgment. Concretely, as disclosed by the reporter's transcript of the evidence, each of the two questioned transactions was entirely regular, and not properly subject to adverse criticism from either an ethical or a legal standpoint. In fact, so far as the jury was concerned, it is readily conceivable that the questioned evidence but redounded to the credit of the business sagacity of defendant, and that the failure of the prosecution to "make good" on its claim of the commission by defendant of other similar offenses operated as a boomerang, so that in the eyes of the jury the defendant became an innocent, persecuted individual, rather than some person standing trial on a charge properly preferred against him in good faith. In any event, the only disadvantage which may have accrued to defendant was at the outset, arising from a possible suspicion in the minds of the members of the jury of fraudulent or criminal dealing, engendered by what might be termed the unfounded claim made by the prosecuting attorney regarding the previous similar offense or offenses committed by defendant. But with the combined declarations of the attorneys for defendant and the prosecuting attorney, and finally with the official declaration by the judge of the trial court, in substance that the evidence was wholly insufficient to establish the commission by defendant of any other previous offense, the ultimate prejudicial effect of the incident was negligible, so far as concerned honorable traits of character in defendant. So viewed, and especially in consideration of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, the point is not available as a reason for a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

LOS ANGELES AUTO TRACTOR CO. v. SUPERIOR COURT WITHIN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 5646.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 23, 1928.

1. Judgment ☞301—Chancery court has power to supervise execution of its orders, and may modify them, affecting details of performance, where decree is subject to confirmation of further order.

Chancery court has power to supervise the execution of its orders, and may modify them in matters affecting details of performance, where decree, though final in nature, requires a further order of the court for the execution of the original decree.

2. Judgment ☞203—It is not presumed court will dispose of case piecemeal, by successive final judgments.

In absence of clear showing, it will not be presumed that court will attempt to dispose of a case piecemeal, by successive final judgments, since only one final judgment is contemplated in each case.

3. Mandamus ☞52—Quieting title ☞52—Where court quieted plaintiff's title, allowing defendant 30 days to pay purchase money and receive deed, subsequent orders extending period for payment held within court's discretion, not warranting interference by mandamus.

Where court entered decree quieting plaintiff's title to property, with provision that defendant should have 30 days after entry of decree to pay price to plaintiff, in which case plaintiff would be required to make conveyance, court had jurisdiction to extend time, and successive orders allowing defendant additional period in which to make the payment, continued for period of about one year, did not constitute abuse of discretion, justifying appellate court's interference by mandamus, especially where in certain cases stipulations were made for extensions.

4. Mandamus ☞28—Court's discretion will not be controlled by mandate, except in case of palpable abuse.

Where trial court is vested with discretion in exercise of its judicial power, exercise of such discretion will not be controlled by mandate, except in case of palpable abuse.

Application by the Los Angeles Auto Tractor Company for mandamus, to be directed to the Superior Court within and for Los Angeles County and Victor R. McLucas, Judge. Writ denied.

Bart F. Wade, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, Claude H. McFadden, Deputy Co. Counsel, and Loewenthal, Lissner, Roth & Gunther, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. An alternative writ of mandate was issued herein, pursuant to an amended and supplementary petition filed on the 8th day of January, 1928, whereby the petitioner sought to compel the respondent court, in an action pending therein, to enter a final decree quieting petitioner's title to certain described real property. Prior to that time the action had been tried before respondent judge, McLucas. Findings of fact and conclusions of law had been filed, and in accordance therewith, on the 18th day of November, 1926, a so-called interlocutory decree had been entered. By that decree it was adjudged that the plaintiff's title to said property be quieted against the claims of defendant Gladiator Manufacturing Company, unless within 30 days after entry of the interlocutory judgment the company paid to a "trustee," appointed and named in the decree, and for the plaintiff, the sum of $15,500 and interest, and certain sums expended by plaintiff for taxes, all found to be due by virtue of a contract for the sale of said real property by the plaintiff to the company's assignors. It was provided that, upon payment by the company to the trustee, within said period of 30 days, of said sums of money, plaintiff should execute a deed conveying said real property to said defendant company, and at the same time should deliver a certificate of title made by the Title Insurance & Trust Company, showing clear title in the plaintiff, subject only to certain conditions, restrictions, and tax liens. If, within 10 days after the deposit of said moneys with the trustee, plaintiff did not comply with said requirements as to deed and certificate of title, then by the terms of the decree the trustee was authorized and empowered to make the conveyance on behalf of the plaintiff, and on behalf of the plaintiff comply with said other duties of the plaintiff. The closing paragraphs of the decree were as follows:

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that if said Gladiator Manufacturing Company shall not, within thirty days after the entry of this interlocutory decree, pay to said trustee the said sums hereinbefore provided to be paid by it, then and in that event, the title to the plaintiff in and to the aforesaid real property shall be quieted against all claims of the defendants and each of them and said plaintiff shall have and recover possession of the same.

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the Title Insurance & Trust Company be, and it is hereby, appointed as trustee of said court with full power and authority to do each and all of the acts hereinbefore provided to be done by said trustee and such other acts as from time to time may be required by said court to be done by said trustee in carrying out and enforcing the provisions of the decrees of the court in the above entitled action.

"It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that on or before the expiration of sixty days from the entry of this interlocutory judgment, a final judgment shall be made by said court finally determining all the rights of the parties herein."

Defendant company did not deposit with the trustee the required sums of money within said period of 30 days from and after November 18, 1926, although it made financial arrangements under which it claimed that it would have paid except for a controversy which arose concerning the demands made by the plaintiff. On the 4th day of January, 1927, pursuant to notice, the plaintiff moved for final judgment as provided in the interlocutory decree. Thereupon the court directed plaintiff to deposit with the trustee, within one week, the required deed and certificate of title. The plaintiff complied with this order, but the funds were not deposited with trustee. Again, upon notice, the plaintiff, on February 7, 1927, moved the court to enter its decree quieting plaintiff's title. Thereupon, upon representations made by said defendant that the moneys necessary to comply with the interlocutory decree would be obtained within two weeks, the court made an order extending until February 21, 1927, the time allowed to defendant corporation for payment of the required money.

On February 21, 1927, counsel for the respective parties again appeared before the court, and the matter was continued until February 28, 1927. Thereupon, on February 28th, upon representations made by defendant corporation, the court made the following order:

"Motion for judgment continued to March 14, 1927, to give defendant opportunity to close escrow, and with understanding this will be final continuance and that if defendant does not close escrow by that time, court will amend findings."

Further continuances were made as follows: On March 14, 1927, to March 17, 1927; March 17, 1927, to March 28, 1927. On March 28, 1927, said motion of February 7, 1927, was ordered off calendar. Thereafter the matter of said motion was restored to the calendar, and on April 4, 1927, the court denied said motion for entry of decree quieting title.

On April 15, 1927, on motion of defendant corporation, and on the ground that the Title Insurance & Trust Company refused to act as trustee in accordance with the terms of the interlocutory decree, an order was entered amending the interlocutory decree by appointing F. J. Zettler as commissioner to carry out the terms of the decree, by receiving and applying the moneys to be paid by defendant corporation and by executing deed, etc., if plaintiff failed so to do. This amendment followed the form of the original interlocutory decree in its remedial provisions, but in such terms as to extend until May 15, 1927, the time within which the required payment should be made.

On the 21st day of April, 1927, plaintiff again moved for final judgment, and the motion was denied. On May 13, 1927, pursuant to stipulation duly filed, the court ordered that:

"The time for the defendant, Gladiator Manufacturing Company, to comply with the terms of the interlocutory decree in the above entitled action, be, and the same hereby is, hereby extended up to and including May 25, 1927."

Similar stipulations and orders extended the time to July 7, 1927. On the 14th day of November, 1927, the plaintiff again moved for final judgment. Thereupon, on "stipulation of said defendant made in open court that upon condition that the court continue the motion for two weeks no further continuance would be requested by said defendant," the court continued the motion to November 28, 1927. It was further ordered that, unless the money was paid by defendant by ten o'clock a. m. of November 28, 1927, "the court will grant the said motion of plaintiff and order judgment in favor of said plaintiff."

On November 28, 1927, said motion came on for hearing and at the same time there was presented a petition wherein it was shown that defendant corporation had assigned its interest in the subject-matter of the action to one Everett B. Sawyer. By said petition Commissioner Zettler set forth that said assignee, Sawyer, had tendered a sum of money to him, and petitioner asked the court for instructions. Thereupon the matter was transferred to another department for further hearing before Hon. Hartley Shaw, a judge of said superior court, by whom plaintiff's motion was denied and the commissioner was instructed to accept tender of the money by Sawyer. It was further ordered that commissioner's deed be executed to Sawyer, if upon 10 days' notice of payment of the money the plaintiff should fail to execute such deed. Said period of 10 days expired on December 9, 1927, but the court prior to that time extended the time within which deed was to be executed by plaintiff until the 9th day of January, 1928.

Respondents contend that the decree as entered by the court was interlocutory, and not final, and that therefore it was subject to amendment by the trial court in the exercise of its discretion. In Thompson v. White, 63 Cal. 505, the court referred to the Code definition of a judgment, as distinguished from an order, and discussed in relation thereto the matter of interlocutory decrees in equity. It was held that there was no intention to abolish the power of a court of equity to pronounce what in equity practice was called an interlocutory decree. The subject was further discussed on a later appeal of the same case (Thompson v. White, 76 Cal. 381, 18 P. 399), and the court directed attention to the fact that under the old equity practice an interlocutory decree may be modified on final hearing, as the law and the evidence shall require. Looking to the terms of the decree as entered in the case at bar, we see in it a complete determination of the facts and of the rights of the parties. This being so, we are inclined to regard it as a final decree.

It should be noted, however, that in a recent decision of the Supreme Court upon a very similar case, it was held by Mr. Justice Sloss (Justices Shaw and Richards concurring) that the judgment therein considered was an interlocutory judgment or decree. We refer to Krotzer v. Clark, 178 Cal. 736, 174 P. 657. That was an action to quiet title, wherein it appeared that the plaintiff owned the land, and had entered into a contract for sale thereof to defendant, and afterward brought an action to set aside the contract. The court entered a so-called interlocutory judgment requiring that the plaintiff tender to defendant a deed and certificate of title, and providing that if the defendant should for 20 days thereafter fail to make the payments provided for in the contract, the plaintiff should be entitled to have his title quieted. Tender was made and refused, whereupon the court entered its final decree quieting title. There were two appeals, one from the interlocutory judgment, and the other from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Referring to the former, the Supreme Court said:

"There is, in the record, a notice of appeal from the interlocutory judgment, but it is not effectual for any purpose. The Code authorizes appeals from interlocutory judgments in certain cases only. Code Civ. Proc. § 963. This is not one of such cases, and the court is, therefore, without jurisdiction of the attempted appeal. Ill. Trust & Sav. Bank v. Alvord, 99 Cal. 407 [33 P. 1132]; Grey v. Brennan, 147 Cal. 355 [81 P. 1014]; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Cal. Development Co., 159 Cal. 484 [114 P. 838.] The defendant did not appeal from the final judgment."

Conversely, in Sugarman, etc., Co. v. Miller & Lux, Inc. (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 1113, the appeal was from the final, and not from the interlocutory, judgment, and was considered as an appeal properly taken.

It is possible, however, for a decree in equity to be a final determination of the rights of the parties and of the specific relief to be granted, and yet the decree might contain a reservation of a right of supervision by the court over the administration of the remedy. This appears to have been attempted by the court in the decree now under consideration. The decree, after providing a period of 30 days within which defendant company should pay the stated sums of money, and further providing for conveyance to be made on behalf of the plaintiff if the plaintiff itself did not comply with the requirements as to deed and certificate of title, ordered that on or before the expiration of 60 days from the entry of this interlocutory judgment, a final judgment shall be made by the court "finally determining all the rights of the parties herein." From the language thus used, it seems clear that the court did not intend that the "interlocutory" judgment should of itself operate to complete the record of the action, but that the court intended that the ultimate remedy, as between two stated alternative conditions, should depend upon the actions of the respective parties in relation to the execution of the decree, and that in accordance with those subsequent transactions a final judgment should be granted. The terms of the final judgment, therefore, would depend upon proof of the facts of such subsequent transactions.

[1, 2] "There are some decrees which though final in their nature, dismissing the bill or granting relief, nevertheless require some further order or decree for the execution of the original decree or for complete adjustment of all matters incidental to the litigation. These may be termed supplemental decrees." Whitehouse, Equity Practice, § 402. "A decree made without any reservation of further directions constitutes a final decree, and, after it has been pronounced, the cause is at an end, and no further hearing can be had. When further directions are reserved by a decree or order, it becomes necessary to set the cause down for hearing for such further directions." Fletcher's Equity Pleading and Practice, § 740.

The power of a chancery court to supervise the execution of its orders, and even to modify them in ways affecting only the details of their performance, has long been recognized. "There are some cases of decrees which, although they are final in their nature, require the confirmation of a further order of the court, before they can be acted upon. In cases of decrees of foreclosure, the court will, upon application, enlarge the time for payment of the money, even though the final order has been enrolled." Daniell's Chancery Practice (6th Am. Ed.) pp. 991-993. We find nothing in our statutes or decisions which can be said to have been intended to limit the power of the superior court in a suit in equity to grant relief properly adjusted to the equitable rights of the parties as determined by the court, and to control the parties in all matters connected with their required obedience to the orders embodied in the decree. It is true that, as stated in Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 454, 114 P. 579, our system of procedure contemplates that there shall be but one final judgment in a cause, and that in the absence of a clear showing it is not to be presumed that the court would attempt to dispose of a case piecemeal by successive final judgments, each covering a part of the matters in controversy.

[3] In the case at bar the court did not attempt to leave undetermined either the rights of the parties or the remedies to which they are entitled. The reservation made by the court and the orders which it made from time to time enlarging the limits of time within which payment might be made by defendant company, were, as we think, within the scope of the court's authority to supervise the execution of its orders, so that the remedies provided for might be directed in their operation, with due regard to the rights of the parties as determined and declared by the court in its decree. The stipulations made from time to time, signed by counsel for the respective parties, to which we have referred, indicate that negotiations were pending and that the several granted extensions of time were, in some instances, allowed by actual consent.

[4] In view of all these facts we think that the record does not show that the court has exceeded its jurisdiction or abused its discretion in the orders thus far made. Where a trial court is vested with discretion in the exercise of its judicial power, the exercise of such discretion will not be controlled by mandate except in case of palpable abuse. Realty, etc., Co. v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 543, 132 P. 1048.

The alternative writ is discharged, and the petition for peremptory writ is denied.

RIVERSIDE PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v.
ANCHOR LAUNDRY CO. et al.
(Civ. 3584.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 20, 1928.

1. Limitation of actions $\S$ 167(1)—Lien on corporation stock sold after limitations had run against notes secured was not extinguished, where action on notes had been commenced within time (Civ. Code, $\S$ 2911).

Where payee of notes, after expiration of time for bringing action on notes had expired, caused shares of stock in corporation given as security to be sold, but prior thereto and within time instituted action on the notes, the lien of the pledge was kept alive by commencement of the prior action on the notes, so as not to make applicable Civ. Code, $\S$ 2911, providing that lien is extinguished by lapse of time within which action can be brought on principal obligation.

2. Subrogation $\S$ 17—Payee of notes secured by stock paying another's notes secured by same stock became subrogated to benefits of lien extinguished (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 2876, 2903, 2904).

Where payee of notes secured by shares of stock in corporation paid prior notes made to another secured by the same stock under Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 2876, 2903, 2904, he became subrogated to all the benefits of the lien thus extinguished.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by the Riverside Portland Cement Company against the Anchor Laundry Company, M. E. Schaffer, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. O'Connell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo, H. B. Cornell, and O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. July 25, 1919, the appellant executed the contract set out in full in Riverside Portland Cement Co. v. Anchor Laundry Co., 75 Cal. App. 286, 288, 242 P. 879, by the terms of which he assigned 200 shares of the capital stock of the Anchor Laundry Company (then held by the Hellman Commercial Trust & Savings Bank in pledge to secure the payment of his two promissory notes in the total sum of $18,400) as security for the payment of a series of notes of $5,000 each executed by him and payable to the plaintiff. The first of these notes became due and payable May 6, 1918, the second June 5, 1918, and the others at later dates. The plaintiff paid the Hellman bank the amount due on the appellant's aforesaid notes and received delivery of the 200 shares of stock. May 5, 1922, the plaintiff brought an action to recover from appellant and others the amount of all the promissory notes, but did not seek in that action to foreclose its lien on the capital stock. June 29, 1922, the plaintiff caused the 200 shares of stock to be duly sold to satisfy the whole of the appellant's indebtedness to it, including the amount paid by it to the Hellman bank on account of the appellant's aforesaid two notes. Thereafter the plaintiff made demand upon the Anchor Laundry Company for the transfer of the 200 shares of stock on the books of that company. The demand was refused, and thereupon this action was commenced to compel such transfer. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, and this appeal is from the judgment.

[1] Appellant contends that at the time the stock was sold the statute of limitations had run against the first and the second notes of the series, and that the lien of the pledge was thereby extinguished as to them, citing section 2911 of the Civil Code, which reads:

"A lien is extinguished by the lapse of the time within which, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, an action can be brought upon the principal obligation."

[2] By bringing the action upon the notes, as stated, however, the plaintiff kept its lien alive. Commercial Savings Bank v. Hornberger, 140 Cal. 16, 21, 73 P. 625.

Appellant further contends that the stock was not pledged to the plaintiff as security for the amount it paid to the Hellman bank on his notes. Upon payment of the amount of such notes the plaintiff became subrogated to all the benefits of the bank's lien on the stock. Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 2903, 2904, and 2876.

The judgment is affirmed.

SWITZLER et al. v. ROBERT A. KLEIN & CO. (Civ. 3581.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 20, 1928.

1. Vendor and purchaser $\S$ 15, 109, 334(1)—Reservation of strip for city on map recorded after sale of lot, worked partial failure of consideration and entitled purchasers to rescind and recover payments.

City's exercise of rights to install public sewer and use as alley a 10-foot strip, reserved for it on map recorded after execution of contract for sale of lot including such strip, deprived purchasers of all beneficial interest in strip, except light and air coming over it, and worked failure of consideration to such extent, so as to entitle them to rescission and recovery of payments, whether such reservation conveyed the res itself or merely gave city an easement therein.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇐37(2)—Purchasers of lot were not bound to search record for vendor's subsequent reservation of strip for city.

Purchasers, to whom vendor presented map showing lot with 46-foot frontage, agreed to be conveyed free and clear of easements or conditions other than certain building restrictions, were not bound to investigate record to ascertain whether vendor made any change which would work fraud on their rights or limit extent or value of property sold, as by entering reservation of 10-foot strip off lot for city on map as recorded after execution of contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⇐114, 336—Purchasers employing attorney to settle immediately on learning of vendor's fraud did not waive right to rescind and recover payments by not suing immediately.

Purchasers, employing attorney to investigate and negotiate for settlement immediately on learning that they did not own lot to extent stated in agreement by reason of vendor's entry of reservation of 10-foot strip for city on map recorded after execution of contract, did not waive right to rescind and recover payments by not suing immediately on discovery of alleged fraud, as effort to secure settlement without litigation should be looked on favorably.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇐43(1)—Keeping up payments for short time, pending negotiations for settlement, held not ratification barring rescission for fraud.

Keeping up monthly payments on purchase price of lot for short period of time, pending negotiations for settlement after discovery of alleged fraud in reservation of strip for city on map recorded after execution of contract, held not such ratification as to bar rescission; such payments being merely facts to be considered by trial court in determining whether purchasers ratified transaction, notwithstanding change in map.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇐117, 339—Purchasers conveying lot to vendor after discovering latter's fraud, held to have offered to place him in statu quo, as required to rescind and recover payments.

Purchasers executing and delivering to vendor a deed to lot purchased, and demanding refund of all payments after failure of negotiations for settlement instituted by attorney employed by them immediately after discovering vendor's reservation of strip for city on map recorded after execution of contract, held entitled to rescission and recovery of payments as against contention that they did not offer to place vendor in statu quo.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; E. J. Marks, Judge.

Action by Robert Benson Switzler and another against Robert A. Klein & Co., a corporation. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Haves, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Allen & Lyon, of Fullerton, for respondents.

PLUMMER, J. Action for rescission and recovery of partial payment. Plaintiffs had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

On the 27th day of March, 1923, the plaintiffs and defendant entered into an agreement in writing by which the plaintiffs agreed to purchase and the defendant agreed to sell and convey a certain lot in the city of Fullerton, in the county of Orange, known as lot 40 in tract 460, said lot having, as specified in the contract, a frontage of 46 feet on Roosevelt avenue, the purchase price of the lot being fixed at the sum of $1,850, upon which the plaintiffs had made payments aggregating $785. The suit is founded upon the action of the defendant company in making a reservation 10 feet in width in favor of the city of Fullerton along the entire south side of said lot 40, which left in the undisputed control and possession of the plaintiffs a lot only 36 feet in width facing Roosevelt avenue. The contract or agreement of purchase referred to was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant prior to the recording of the map of the addition to the city of Fullerton. The complaint alleges, and the court so found, that after entering into the contract of sale and purchase, the defendant, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, or of either of them, caused the proposed plat of the addition to the city of Fullerton, in which said lot 40 is situate, to be so changed as to reserve to the city of Fullerton, for such uses and purposes as the city might desire, a strip of land along the entire south line of said lot 40, 10 feet in width. The map or plat, as it existed at the time the plaintiffs entered into the agreement of purchase referred to, and which was exhibited to the plaintiffs, did not show or have upon its face any markings indicating a reservation to the city of Fullerton. The map just referred to was filed as a tentative map on April 17, 1923. It appears that the authorities of the city of Fullerton refused to accept the same or permit record thereof until a reservation 10 feet in width had been made in favor of the city of Fullerton, along the south side of lot 40, and certain other lots in line therewith, but not involved in this action. Thereupon, the defendant entered, or had entered, upon said map a reservation in favor of the city of Fullerton, as just described, and said map was, on the 8th day of May, 1923, approved and recorded. Thereafter, and some time during the early part of 1924, the city of Fullerton entered upon said 10-foot reservation and proceeded to construct a sewer along the entire course of said reserved part of lot 40. This sewer apparently was finished on or about the 4th day of February, 1924.

The contract or agreement of purchase provided that upon the election of the defendant a deed might be executed for said lot, delivered to the plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs execute a mortgage or trust deed securing the unpaid portion of the purchase price of said lot. The record shows that during the month of July, 1924, a deed was executed conveying to the plaintiffs lot 40 in block No. 460 of said tract, without specifically mentioning the number of feet frontage of said lot on Roosevelt avenue. The agreement of purchase called for a lot 46 feet on said avenue, free and clear of incumbrances, save and except as to the conditions specified in the agreement, which conditions are not involved in this action. The deed referred to the map on record, but neither the agreement of purchase nor any of the indorsements thereof, nor anything in the deed called attention to the fact that the reservation made upon the official plat or map had been made thereon, nor is there anything in the agreement, nor does there appear anything in the record, to indicate that the plaintiffs were to receive a lot having less than 46 feet frontage on Roosevelt avenue, free and clear of all conditions and reservations, save and except as specified in the agreement of purchase. The reservation of 10 feet along the south side of said lot 40 was made without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, and was made after the plat or map had been exhibited to the plaintiffs, after the agreement of purchase had been entered into by them with the defendant, and after the reservation was made, no information thereof appears to have been conveyed by the defendant to the plaintiffs.

The only contention that the plaintiffs had knowledge thereof is the argument put forth upon the theory that the filing of the plat or map with the reservation thereon made as stated, after the execution of the agreement of purchase and sale, amounted to constructive notice. The record shows that the plaintiff Robert B. Switzler visited the lot a number of times after entering into the agreement of purchase, and in his visits obtained knowledge that the city of Fullerton was constructing the sewer, as heretofore mentioned. His testimony is to the effect that he made discovery of the installation of the sewer in September, 1924. This date, however, is undoubtedly incorrect because the sewer was completed early in February, 1924. The testimony, however, is undisputed that early in September, 1924, the plaintiffs were informed by a man who was fumigating orange trees that they, the plaintiffs, had only one row of orange trees instead of two. This was early in September, 1924. Thereupon the plaintiffs consulted an attorney by the name of C. R. Allen, who made an investigation of the records, and it was then that the plaintiffs became aware of the entry of the reservation in favor of the city of Fullerton, as hereinbefore stated. This was some weeks after the execution of the deed of conveyance from the defendant to the plaintiffs, and the execution and delivery by the plaintiffs to the defendant of a trust deed to secure the remainder of the unpaid purchase price of said lot. Immediately upon making the discovery that the deed describing the lot did not convey to them, free and clear, the 46-foot frontage on Roosevelt avenue, as specified in the contract or agreement of purchase, the plaintiffs retained C. R. Allen as their attorney for the purpose of securing a settlement with the defendant. Negotiations were carried on between Mr. Allen, as attorney for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Robert A. Klein, representing the defendant, for some period of time, but not being able to reach an agreement, and the defendant apparently refusing to do anything, the plaintiffs, on or about May 6, 1925, executed and delivered to the defendant a deed to the lot in question, and demanded a refund of all of the payments theretofore made by the plaintiffs to the defendant. The deed was accepted and retained, but the defendant refused to refund the payments. Hence this action.

The court found that the agreement called for 46 feet frontage on Roosevelt avenue; that the reservation was made without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs, and was made in fraud of the right of the plaintiffs; that at the time of the execution and delivery of the deed by the defendant to the plaintiffs of the lot in question, on or about the 3d day of July, 1924, the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the reservation made in favor of the city of Fullerton, and relied upon the statements of the defendant and the contract of purchase, hereinbefore referred to, that they were receiving, under the deed, a lot having 46 feet frontage on Roosevelt avenue, unburdened by any reservations, or, rather, that the plaintiffs were receiving a conveyance to the lot according to the contract of purchase. That the failure to convey a lot containing 46 feet frontage on Roosevelt avenue, according to the agreement of purchase, constituted a failure of consideration, and, further, that the defendant was guilty of fraud in changing the plat or map covering said lot, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs. The court found further that the plaintiffs had not waived their right to rescind the contract, and had done nothing which constituted a waiver of their right to rescind, and had not, by their acts, done anything which could be considered as a ratification of the change made, with respect to said lot, by the defendant. We have not followed the language of the findings, but have stated their substance and effect.

[1] On the part of the appellant it is first contended that the reservation made by the defendant in relation to lot 40 gave to the city of Fullerton only an easement therein, and that the res itself was not conveyed to the city. This contention, however, is immaterial. The record shows that the city of Fullerton had taken possession of the reserved strip for the installation of a public sewer; that it had the right of ingress and egress on and over said reserved strip, and, in addition to installing a public sewer, might use the same for a public alley. The exercise of such rights under the easement, if easement was created, took away from the plaintiffs all beneficial interest or ownership therein as a place of residence or as a tract of land upon which they could erect any building or structure. If it be admitted that there was conveyed to the plaintiffs a title to the strip of land in question, the circumstances show that the only beneficial interest they obtained therein would be in the way of light and air coming over the same. Under any circumstances, it is evident that a failure of consideration would immediately be worked in so far as the reserved strip of land is concerned, and for residential purposes a serious lessening of the value of the remaining portion of the lot. An inspection of the agreement of purchase referred to shows a tract of land subdivided into lots for residential purposes. The agreement of purchase contains a number of conditions and specifications limiting the location of the residences to be constructed upon the lots and upon lot 40, the value of the structures to be erected, the distance from Roosevelt avenue, etc.

Appellant calls our attention to a number of authorities where relief by way of cancellation has been denied, and insists that this case is governed thereby. These authorities and their application we will consider.

[2] In 12 California Jurisprudence, 800, § 61, it is said:

"Relief cannot be granted on the ground of fraud where it appears that the party seeking it, when the duty was incumbent upon him to investigate, has, through his own negligence, failed to ascertain matters of public record. The rule in such cases is that one is presumed to know whatever he might, with reasonable diligence, have discovered, and when the facts upon which the alleged fraud rests are matters of public record, open to inspection, ignorance of the fraud will not excuse him. Where, however, there is no duty imposed to examine the records, and where, under the circumstances, a prudent person would not be put upon inquiry, the mere fact that such means of knowledge are open and not availed of does not bar relief when actual discovery is made. The circumstances must be such that the inquiry becomes a duty, and the failure to make it, a negligent omission."

The same statement of the law is found in the case of Tarke v. Bingham, 123 Cal. 163, 55 P. 759. In that case an action was brought to reform a mortgage, and, as reformed, for foreclosure. An error was made in the recorder's office by which it appeared that the action on the promissory note involved was barred. The court held that nothing had occurred which would put the plaintiff upon notice, and that the plaintiff was not negligent in not making an examination of the records. In the case at bar the plaintiffs were presented, for inspection, a proposed plat or map of the addition of the city of Fullerton, in which lot 40 was described as having a frontage of 46 feet on Roosevelt avenue. This lot was unburdened by any easements or conditions, save and except certain building restrictions specifically and particularly set forth in the agreement of purchase. Having had presented to them a map or plat showing 46 feet frontage of said lot, having an agreement in their possession calling for a lot having 46 feet frontage, free and clear, no duty was cast upon the plaintiffs to investigate the record and ascertain whether the defendant had been guilty of making any change which would work a fraud upon their rights or limit either the extent or value of the property which they were to obtain as shown by the map and as covenanted in the agreement of purchase already executed, signed, and delivered to them by the defendant.

[3] It is further insisted by the appellant that the plaintiffs have waived any right to rescind by reason of not having begun this action immediately upon the discovery of the fraud alleged. The record shows, however, that immediately upon knowledge being brought to the plaintiffs that they did not own the property to the extent set forth in their agreement, the plaintiffs employed an attorney to investigate the matter and to take up with the defendant the proposition of settlement or adjustment. The record fails to disclose just what attempts were made to avoid litigation, but it does show that the plaintiffs did not sleep upon their rights, but immediately began to take steps to secure some adjustment. The record shows that no considerable time elapsed while these negotiations were being carried on, and instead of being construed as a waiver of any rights to rescind, we think the effort to secure settlement without litigation should be looked upon favorably.

In the case of Lady Washington Consolidated Co. v. Wood, 113 Cal. 482, 45 P. 809, relied upon by the appellant as supporting the theory of waiver, the opinion shows that the minutes of the plaintiff corporation disclosed everything relied upon as a basis for its action. All the acts relating to the execution of the release, which it desired to have set aside, appeared upon the record books of the company. The defense was made that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The court there said that it is not sufficient for the plaintiff to allege that he was ignorant of the facts at the time of their occurrence, and had not been informed of them within three years, etc.; that the plaintiff would be presumed to have knowledge of the facts which he ought to have known; that the plaintiff, in order to excuse himself, must show that the fraud, or acts of fraud, were committed under such circumstances that he would not be presumed to have knowledge of them; and further, if it appears that the plaintiff had notice or information of circumstances which would put him on inquiry, which, if followed, would lead to knowledge, or that the facts were presumptively within his knowledge, he will be deemed to have had actual knowledge of these facts. In that case, however, the books of the company contained facts sufficient to put a reasonable man upon inquiry, and differed from the case at bar in that the plat exhibited to the plaintiffs and the agreement delivered to them were calculated to prevent inquiry, as they fully set forth just what the plaintiffs understood they were purchasing.

In Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 14 P. 88, the validity of a recorded homestead was involved. There is no disputing the fact that a recorded homestead, under the codes, is constructive notice to all the world, and is readily distinguishable from the facts surrounding the case at bar.

In the case of Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 P. 899, cited as authority that the action to rescind must be begun promptly, the record shows that instead of beginning the action promptly after the discovery of the alleged fraud (the fraud being in relation to a lease of a certain theater), the plaintiff waited until after the profitable season had gone by and did nothing until the arrival of what is called the dull season by theater operators. Under such circumstances the court held the plaintiff was not entitled to equitable relief.

In the case of Harrington v. Paterson, 124 Cal. 542, 57 P. 476, there was a long wait on the part of the defendant in complaining of the fraud relied upon, and, in fact, nothing was done by him until after suit to enforce the obligation had been begun.

In the case of Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 668, 53 P. 304, the record discloses that the plaintiff had knowledge of the alleged fraud for a long period of time, and had so dealt with the lands and premises involved as to waive his right to equitable relief.

In Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 140 P. 283, the court, having before it the question of whether the circumstances showed action within a reasonable time, held as follows:

"Whether the party entitled to rescind has acted promptly is a question to be decided by the trial court upon the facts of the particular case,"

edge of the facts, was not ready to end the contract, and that continuing to treat the same for his own purpose, as valid and binding, he failed to make known any desire to terminate the contract for such a length of time and under such circumstances as to preclude the exercise by him of the right of rescission. The trial court, in the instant case, had the right to determine, upon the facts presented, whether the plaintiff had brought his action for rescission within a reasonable time. We find nothing in the case which indicates that after the discovery of the fraud the plaintiffs were willing to treat the conveyances made to them as valid and binding, or that indicates that the plaintiffs were willing to ratify the transaction as conveying to them the property for and as the property contracted for. The fact that they employed an attorney to represent them in the matter, who immediately opened negotiations with the defendant, shows an entirely contrary state of facts from those set forth in the case of Cross v. Mayo, supra, and also in the other cases relied upon by the appellant.

[4, 5] Again, citing 9 California Jurisprudence, 1198, it is insisted that the plaintiffs, in making monthly payment upon the purchase price of the premises, after the discovery of the fraud and pending the period of attempted settlement, ratified the contract. While the payment of the purchase price has in many cases been held to indicate a ratification, it cannot be held that keeping up monthly payments for a short period of time during the pendency of negotiations seeking a settlement, is such a ratification as to bar rescission. Such payments, under the circumstances, constituted merely facts or acts to be considered by the trial court in determining whether the plaintiffs had or had not ratified the transaction, notwithstanding the alleged change in the map referred to, and which prevented them from receiving the property as contracted for. We do not find anything tenable in the contention by the appellant that the plaintiffs did not offer to place the defendant in statu quo. The record shows that what was done with regard to the trust deed was at the request of the defendant, and the plaintiffs, by their conveyance to the defendant, offered to restore to the defendant everything of value which they had obtained, and demanded a refund of the moneys paid to them on account of the purchase price of the premises and certain other items which do not appear to be objected to if the plaintiffs were held entitled to the property.

The judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

SICHTERMAN v. R. M. HOLLINGSHEAD CO. (Civ. 6310.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Automobile driver's negligence was not imputable to injured fellow employé riding with him when collision occurred, neither having authority over other.

Where employé, injured while riding in employer's truck alongside of fellow employé driving it, stood on same plane as driver, not being obliged to take orders or directions from him, the driver's negligence was not imputable to him, though injured party was a member of corporation owning truck and driver did not have license; the relation of master and servant or of principal and agent not existing.

2. Automobiles ⇨227(1)—Doctrine of last clear chance held not applicable, where driver of truck colliding with car had no reason to believe car struck in unavoidable danger.

Where evidence did not disclose any fact which showed to driver of truck with which Ford car collided that Ford was in a position of danger from which it could not extricate itself, doctrine of last clear chance was not applicable in action by occupant of Ford car to recover for injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Richard Sichterman against R. M. Hollingshead Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Leandro, for appellant.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages for injuries sustained in an automobile collision. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendant has appealed.

In his complaint the plaintiff charged negligence in general terms following the pleading of the plaintiff in Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 P. 663. In its answer the defendant denied any negligence on its part and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. In its opening brief the defendant contended that it was not negligent and quoted from the record to sustain the contention. It also contended that the plaintiff was negligent and quoted from the record to sustain that contention. Furthermore, as stated above, it made the contention that prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in giving an instruction on the doctrine of the last clear chance. When the plaintiff filed his brief he quoted no part of the record refuting the contentions made by the defendant, but merely addressed himself briefly to citing some authorities on the question of imputed negligence and some on the subject of the doctrine of the last clear chance. He says:

"The evidence was quite conflicting upon the question of the negligence of defendant and contributory negligence of plaintiff. Counsel for defendant admits that the evidence was conflicting upon these questions (App. Br., line 4)."

The reference is incorrect. However, on page 4 and not line 4, we find the following:

"The evidence in the case conflicted sharply as to the facts of the accident complained of, but it was uncontradicted in other matters of substantial importance."

Whatever the writer meant by the language just quoted, it is perfectly clear, to one who picks up the defendant's brief and examines its 122 pages and the appendix of 51 additional pages, that the defendant is not to be understood as admitting that the evidence is conflicting on the issue of the defendant's negligence, nor that it is conflicting on the issue of the plaintiff's negligence. On these all-important matters the plaintiff gives us no help. Considering the rights of the litigants we have been at great pains to study the record, which is very long and which is not printed in whole or in part by the plaintiff.

[1] 1. It will greatly simplify this decision if we first discuss the question of imputed negligence. The facts pertinent to that issue are these: The plaintiff was riding on the right-hand side of the front seat of a Ford touring car. J. P. Knight was at the wheel, and there is no claim that the plaintiff had physical hold or control of any part of the car. J. F. Mahoney was formerly the owner of a business conducted under the name of Mahoney Floor Polishing Company. The plaintiff was an employé. Later Mahoney extended the lines of his business. To do so the Peerless Safety Device Company was incorporated. He owned a part of the stock, W. H. Cherry owned a part, and the plaintiff owned a part. There were no other stockholders. Mahoney acted as manager or superintendent. Sichterman took orders from Mahoney and continued as an employé. When there was work for more persons, extra help was hired. The employés, whether stockholders or otherwise, were each paid by the hour. The company owned the Ford touring car. J. P. Knight was an employé. When the car was to be driven it was Knight's duty to drive it, and when a certain job was reached he stepped from the wheel and worked with the rest of the employés. As Mr. Mahoney testified:

"We all worked together. I got down on my hands and knees the same as the rest. We all worked together."

As to the power to boss or superintend, there was evidence that Knight and Sichterman stood on an even plane; neither had authority to direct the other. There was no conflict in the evidence on the question of the relative authority of these two servants. Under these circumstances the trial court did not err in giving instructions to the effect that the driver's negligence was not to be imputed to the plaintiff. Bryant v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 174 Cal. 737, 742, 164 P. 385. The court quotes with approval from Nonn v. Chicago City Ry. Co., 232 Ill. 378, 83 N. E. 924, 122 Am. St. Rep. 114, where it is said:

"There can be no such thing as imputable negligence, except in those cases where such a relation exists as that of master and servant or of principal and agent."

As there was no such relation existing between this plaintiff and Knight, the negligence of the latter may not be imputed to the former. The trial court did not err in giving instructions to that effect.

2. The defendant calls to our attention the fact that Knight did not hold a chauffeur's license and that the plaintiff was riding with him and that the omission of Knight and of the Peerless Safety Device Company to procure such license constituted negligence which is to be imputed to the plaintiff, and that such negligence constituted contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The authority cited on the first point discussed by us is against this contention of the defendant. So is Irwin v. Golden State Auto Tour Corp., 178 Cal. 10, 14, 171 P. 1059. These two cases are addressed to the negligence, if any, of Knight. As to the negligence of the Peerless Safety Device Company, the rule is the same. 29 Cyc. 545, 546. The defendant cites and relies on the doctrine stated in 2 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) 269, § 1268. It is not in point. This is not an action by the corporation or one of its stockholders against an officer of the corporation. The trial court did not err in the instructions which it gave or those which it refused on this issue.

3. Shorn of all features claimed to have arisen by reason of negligence imputed to the plaintiff, the court fully instructed the jury on the subject of contributory negligence. By its verdict the jury has made the implied finding that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence. We are not at liberty to disturb the verdict in view of the evidence which was introduced at the trial.

4. The defendant claims it was not negligent and it quotes the record to sustain its contention. As hereinabove set forth, the plaintiff has given us no help in his brief. At the trial the parties used a diagram on which the witnesses drew lines, etc., with colored crayons. That diagram has been brought up. From the record it appears that before either party had reached Fifth street each vehicle was on its side of the street, and if each vehicle had continued forward on straight lines there would have been a space of 25 feet between them. The witness Knight testified that as he turned on Townsend street to go northwesterly on Fifth street, the defendant's car was a short distance back of the north-easterly line of Fifth street. He marked both points. He testified further that he then proceeded at about 5 to 8 miles per hour. Measuring the distance between where his car was at that time and the point of the impact, and making the same measurement between where the defendant's car was and the point of the impact, the distances are approximately the same. The witness Hancock, who was driving the Mack truck, testified that when he saw the Ford car start to pass in front of his truck, the truck was at the curb line or 15 feet out into Fifth street. "At that time I had a clear view of the Ford; an unobstructed view. The driver of the Ford gave me absolutely no signal—absolutely no signal of his intention to turn. He did not put his left hand out. I did not hear any horn at all. It was going at a very high rate of speed. I would estimate it to be about 25 miles an hour. When I saw the Ford commencing to make that turn I blew my whistle and swung to the right and put on my emergency brake and my foot brake and pulled over." The plaintiff in argument claimed that the defendant was negligent because it did not stop. The answer is that the evidence shows the driver tried to stop and the evidence does not show that he negligently did or omitted any act in that attempt. As we have shown by the testimony of the witness Knight, the truck was not going any faster than the Ford car was going, which was estimated by the same witness at 5 to 8 miles. The witnesses for the defendant gave similar testimony regarding the speed of the truck. Moreover, they testified that the Ford car ran into the truck and that the occupants of the Ford car were thrown forward and out. Plaintiff produced a photograph of the Ford car which shows the right-hand fender to be bent and torn up until it is nearly as high as the top of the radiator. If, as contended by the plaintiff, the big Mack truck ran into the Ford from behind, striking it on the right-hand side, that fender would have been bent down and not up. If, as testified to by the witnesses for the defendant, the Ford ran into the Mack truck from behind, striking it on the left-hand side, the result might have been to press the fender upwards as shown in the photograph and to throw the occupants forward. The record contains little, if anything, that can be claimed to be in conflict with what we have quoted and which tends in the least to show negligence on the part of the defendant.

[2] 5. The court instructed the jury on the doctrine of the last clear chance. The defendant claims this was error. The plaintiff asserts that the witness Hancock stated that when his truck was at the northeasterly line of Fifth street it was traveling 17 to 18 miles an hour. Traveling at 17 or 18 miles an hour, the witness testified that he could stop the truck in 20 feet. At the northeasterly line of Fifth street there was no occasion for stopping. After crossing the northeasterly line of Fifth street the truck proceeded 50 feet or thereabouts. The plaintiff argues that these facts justified the instruction on the last clear chance. But several factors were wanting to support the argument. When the truck was at the northeasterly line of Fifth street, the evidence does not disclose any fact which showed to the driver of the truck that the Ford car was in a position of danger from which it could not extricate itself. Under the facts contained in the record, the defendant had as much right to claim that the Ford car should have stopped. We think the trial court erred in giving an instruction on the doctrine of the last clear chance, and that under the facts of this case the error was prejudicial.

The judgment is reversed.

NYLUND v. MADSEN. (Civ. 3516.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District,
California. Oct. 23, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 1048(3)—That court permitted leading questions does not require reversal, where form of questions did not prejudice appellant.

That trial court permitted asking of leading questions does not require reversal, where transcript does not disclose that appellant was prejudiced by the form of the questions asked.

2. Executors and administrators $\S$ 221(5)—Plaintiff's statement, during deceased's lifetime, that deceased had paid her \$2 a day, held not to prevent recovery against estate of reasonable value of services rendered as nurse on deceased's last illness.

In action against estate for services as nurse during last illness of deceased, previous statement of plaintiff, during lifetime of deceased, that deceased had paid her $2 a day, did not prevent recovery for reasonable services rendered.

3. Work and labor $\S$ 30(2)—Value of services rendered is for jury in actions based on quantum meruit.

In actions based on quantum meruit for value of services, the question as to the value of the services rendered is for the jury, and jury may fix value from their common knowledge of the value of similar services.

4. Executors and administrators $\S$ 449—Failure of plaintiff, suing estate for services rendered deceased, to introduce testimony as to their reasonable value, held not to prevent recovery based on trial court's opinion as to value.

In action against estate for services rendered deceased as nurse during his last illness, in which evidence disclosed nature and extent of services rendered, recovery held not precluded by failure of plaintiff to introduce testimony as to reasonable value of services, since trial court sitting as jury could form his own opinion as to value from the testimony concerning the services rendered.

5. Evidence $\S$ 570—Testimony of experts is not conclusive on trier of fact.

Testimony of experts is not conclusive and does not bind jury or trial court sitting without a jury.

6. Work and labor $\S$ 28(4)—Trial court sitting as jury in action for services rendered may determine their reasonable value within limits of common knowledge, without aid of expert testimony.

In action on quantum meruit for services rendered, trial court sitting as jury may fix value of services without aid of expert testimony, where value of services is within common knowledge.

7. Work and labor $\S$ 4(2)—Promise to pay reasonable value of services of character usually charged for, rendered promisor with his consent, is implied.

Performance for another of useful services of character usually charged for, with other's consent, raises implied promise of the person served to pay the reasonable value of the services.

8. Executors and administrators $\S$ 221(5)—Promise of deceased to pay reasonable value of services rendered by nurse during his last illness was implied under evidence showing their extraordinary character.

In action against estate to recover reasonable value of services rendered deceased as nurse during his last illness, in which evidence showed that deceased was suffering from loathsome disease, and that services rendered by plaintiff were of extraordinary character, promise of deceased to pay their reasonable value was implied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; T. H. Selvage, Judge.

Action by Sadie E. Nylund against Henry F. Madsen, executor of the last will and testament of Carl Miller, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

W. F. Clyborne and Frank McGowan, both of Eureka, for appellant.

J. T. Fraser, of Eureka, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff had judgment against the defendant as the executor of the last will and testament of Carl Miller, deceased, for the sum of $600. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The complaint in the action sets forth that for a considerable period prior to the death of Carl Miller the plaintiff attended him as a nurse and performed services, at his instance and request, and upon his promise to pay therefor, of the reasonable value of $1,000; that the plaintiff has not been paid for said services. The death of Carl Miller is then set forth, the admission of his last will and testament to probate, and the appointment of the defendant as executor are alleged and judgment demanded in the sum of $1,000. The filing of the claim against the estate of said deceased is alleged, and its rejection by the executor also pleaded. The answer of the defendant put in question the fact of the services, the promise to pay therefor, and also the value thereof.

[1, 2] Upon this appeal, while other objections are alleged, the only real ground upon which it is insisted that a reversal of the judgment should be ordered is in the fact that no witness testified that the services performed by the plaintiff were of the reasonable value of $600, or any other sum. Complaint is made that the trial court permitted the asking of leading questions, but an examination of the transcript does not disclose that any prejudice was suffered by the defendant by reason of the form of the questions permitted to be asked by the trial court. Attention is also called to the fact that a certain witness testified that the plaintiff told her at one time that the deceased paid her $2 a day for taking care of him while he was sick, and that this should have been considered a bar to any recovery by the plaintiff. An examination of the transcript fails to support the contention made by the appellant in relation to this testimony.

The question and answer upon which the objection is based are as follows:

"Q. While you were there at the Nylund residence during that week just before Mr. Miller went down to San Francisco did you hear Mrs. Nylund say anything about being paid? A. Well, she told me at one time that he had paid her $2.00 a day."

This may all be true, but it does not show that the plaintiff was paid for her services during the last illness of the deceased; all it does show, if anything, is that at one time the deceased considered the plaintiff's services worth at least $2 per day, or at least that he had at one time paid that much for plaintiff's services.

[3, 4] While the answer of the defendant denies the services, the record shows that there was practically no denial thereof upon the trial, and the only testimony introduced was in relation to the extent of the same. The testimony of Dr. Gross alone is sufficient to show the extent of the services. He testified that the services consisted in dressing one of the hands of the deceased for several months; that the deceased was suffering from several running sores; that there was mucous coming from all of them; that he had a sore hand and sore throat, and that eruptions were breaking out over his body; that he also had a sore foot; that the plaintiff treated one of the hands of the deceased twice a day; the hand was suffering from cancer and had to be dressed at least twice a day; that the plaintiff took care of him pretty nearly all the time; that she did this for a period of five or six months; that the plaintiff had to rub liniment on one of the patient's legs; had to put applications on his neck several times a day; that the infections which broke out had to be dressed several times a day; that in addition to the sore on his hand, one of his arms had a sore that required dressing; that the plaintiff would dress the sore hand and then bring him to the witness' office for him to dress; that when the patient coughed the plaintiff had to assist him in removing the saliva and mucous from his mouth; that the services performed by the plaintiff were extraordinary; that the services included more than that of a nurse; it included that of an attendant and housekeeper; that the plaintiff attended to business for the decedent, nursed him, and treated his very loathsome disease with which he was afflicted. Other witnesses testified as to the services, but the simple outline taken from the attending physician's testimony is amply sufficient to show the extent of the services. We may here state that the different witnesses, who testified in relation to the services, described in detail the offensive condition of the patient or of the ailments with which he was afflicted, and the record contains sufficient to show that the testimony introduced fully advised the court as to the extent of the services performed, and their character. We may further state the record shows that the plaintiff took care of the deceased for the period of time mentioned and until, as stated by the attending physician, the burden of taking care of the deceased caused her to break down, and then two nurses had to be employed to look after the deceased. No question is made by appellant that the amount allowed by the trial court was or is excessive. As we have stated, the only point urged for reversal in this particular is that no witness went on the stand and stated his opinion as to the value of the services. It is urged upon the authority of Cowdery v. McChesney, 124 Cal. 363, 57 P. 221; Crusoe v. Clark, 127 Cal. 341, 59 P. 700; Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., 60 Cal. App. 516, 213 P. 529, that such testimony is necessary. The cited cases, however, do not so hold. The rule stated in all of them is substantially the same as the following quotation from Laiblin v. San Joaquin Agricultural Corp., supra:

"The action being upon a quantum meruit, it was proper, of course, to allow evidence as to the reasonable value of the labor performed and it was competent to prove what was the reasonable value of such labor by the opinions of experts fully qualified to give such testimony."

It is not held in any of the cases relied upon by appellant that such testimony is absolutely necessary. In actions based on quantum meruit for the value of services, the value of the services rendered is for the jury. In this case, for the trial court, and while opinion evidence is admissible, where the facts constituting the service and all the circumstances relating thereto are placed before the trial court, the court or the jury, as the case may be, has before it sufficient upon which to determine the fact of value. The rule is thus stated in 40 Cyc. 2855:

"In an action for services rendered the questions whether they were rendered, and if so, what is their value, are for the jury; and in the absence of evidence of the value of such services, or where the evidence leaves uncertain the amount plaintiff is entitled to recover, the jury may estimate their value from their own judgment and knowledge on the subject."

This does not mean that the jury is entitled to fix the value, irrespective of testimony, nor upon their knowledge of the services performed, but their common knowledge of the value of services which have been described under all the circumstances and conditions disclosed by the testimony. In the case of Hossler v. Trump, 62 Ohio St. 139, 56 N. E. 656, this identical question was before the Supreme Court of the state of Ohio. It was there held (we are quoting from the syllabus):

"When, upon the trial of the general issue in an action upon a quantum meruit for services of a domestic character, the plaintiff offers evidence showing the facts from which the promise to pay may properly be inferred, and also showing the nature and extent of the services rendered, the case should be submitted to the jury, although no witness expresses an opinion as to the value of the services."

The services involved in that action were for nursing, bathing, and caring for Mr. Trump, washing his clothing and bedding, mending, etc., setting forth the period of time, and the claimed value thereof, at $3 per day. The trial court in that action instructed the jury that as no evidence was offered tending to show the value of the services, that is, no witness had stated to the jury his opinion of their value, their verdict should be for the defendant. In the circuit court the judgment of the common pleas court was reversed, and upon appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed. In the course of the opinion in that case the Ohio Supreme Court said:

"The jury in such a case may reject the opinions of witnesses, if they deem them unreasonable, because the facts touching the character and extent of the services which the plaintiff is required to prove, and which, in the case before us, were proved, are themselves the subject of consideration by the jurors with a view to the exercise of their own knowledge and the formation of their own opinions as to their value."

The court then goes on to cite the case of Head v. Hargrave, 105 U. S. 45, 26 L. Ed. 1028, where the Supreme Court, speaking through Justice Field, holds that a trial court may disregard the testimony of witnesses who give their opinions as to the value of attorney's fees, and act upon its own knowledge and information of such matters. Again, in the case of Craig v. Durrett, 1 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 365, 19 Am. Dec. 103, in an action for the value of services the same rule is promulgated. It is there said (quoting from the syllabus):

"The jury may from their knowledge of the business of society and the value of the labor, in assumpsit for work and labor, find a verdict for the price of the work done notwithstanding there is no evidence of the worth of labor at the time and place the work was performed."

See, also, Wetzel v. Kellar, 12 Ind. App. 75, 39 N. E. 895.

[5] That the testimony of experts is not conclusive, and that a jury is not bound by opinion testimony, which, of course, applies to the trial court when sitting without a jury, see 3 Cal. Jur. p. 714, § 111; also, Ehlers v. Wannack Bros., 118 Cal. 310, 50 P. 433, in an action involving work performed by an architect. Opinion evidence was first introduced. The defendant sought to show the extent and character of the work, for the purpose of laying the foundation for fixing the value of the same. This testimony was excluded by the trial court, and for this reason the judgment was reversed. While it is now held in practically all jurisdictions that opinion evidence is admissible as to value, where the witness has knowledge of the same, it is likewise held in practically all of the jurisdictions that such opinion evidence may be disregarded.

In Estate of Iser, 52 Cal. App. 405, 198 P. 1014, this court had occasion, speaking through Mr. Justice Hart, to collate a large number of authorities bearing upon this question. On page 408 of the opinion in that case (198 P. 1015), this court said:

"The position of these appellants is, apparently, that before a court can find the value of professional services it must have before it the testimony of experts to the effect that certain services are of certain value. But this is not the law. The testimony of experts is, of course, admissible to prove the value of attorneys' services" (citing a number of authorities).

And, further:

"But the opinions of experts in such cases are not binding upon the jury, who may apply to the testimony 'their own experience and knowledge of such services' " (citing a number of authorities).

Again:

"If the jury may form a judgment as to the value of services in opposition to the opinions of experts, it necessarily follows that the testimony of experts is not essential" (citing further authorities).

Again, the rule is further elaborated in 27 California Jurisprudence, p. 230, § 39, where it is said:

"In an action upon a quantum meruit it is proper to allow evidence as to the reasonable value of the labor performed. The character and amount of work done by the plaintiff may be proved for the purpose of showing the value of the services, and so it is competent, as bearing upon the value of legal services, to prove the nature of the litigation and the amount involved."

[6] It is also further said in the same section from which we are quoting that opinion testimony of experts, qualified, may be introduced. In other words, the cases all distinguish between the kind of testimony that may be introduced and what testimony it is absolutely necessary to introduce in order to support a judgment. The authorities which we have cited make this distinction and show clearly that when all the facts and circumstances are placed either before the court when sitting with a jury, or when the case is being tried before the court without a jury, the court or the jury, as the case may be, may fix the value without the aid of expert testimony. The rule, of course, is limited to matters which are within common knowledge. As said, in substance, in one of the cases, there is no reason for assuming that a trial court has no knowledge of the facts and circumstances of which all other persons have common knowledge. In other words, if a jury possesses sufficient common knowledge to find a verdict as to value for work and labor, where the extended character of the work fully appears in the testimony, there is no reason for concluding that a trial court does not possess the same knowledge.

[7, 8] As to the promise to pay, it is sufficient to state that the testimony in this case shows that the services were performed under such conditions as the law would imply a promise. Just as stated in the case of Young v. Bruere, 78 Cal. App. 127, 248 P. 301:

"Where one performs for another, with the other's knowledge, a useful service of a character usually charged for, and the latter expresses no dissent, or avails himself of the service, a promise to pay the reasonable value of the services is implied."

We do not need to add to the authorities cited in this case.

The judgment in this case, however, is irregular and should be amended by adding thereto: "Payable out of the Estate of Carl Miller, deceased, in due course of administration." And it is hereby ordered that the above words be added to the judgment in this case, and as so amended the judgment is affirmed, respondent to recover costs.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. UNIVERSAL ELECTRIC & GAS CO.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 17, 1928.

1. Assignments ⇐68—Purchaser of electrical energy, accepting deliveries from seller's assignee without objection, except as to rate, waived objections to assignment.

Where contract for sale by power company of electrical energy for fixed rates provided that it should bind successors in interests of both parties, contained no stipulation against assignment, and there was nothing under it to show that skill or other quality peculiar to power company or nature of service was a material inducement to contract, it appearing that purchaser, with knowledge of facts and without objection, except as to rate charged, accepted deliveries from assignee of seller and made monthly payments on account, such circumstances held to sufficiently indicate waiver of objections to the assignment.

2. Electricity ⇐11—Copies of contract to furnish electric energy and of proposed lease and assignment, filed with Public Utilities Commission, became part of assignee's rate schedule (Public Utilities Act, §§ 14(b), 17, subd. 4(b); Civ. Code, § 3532).

Where copy of contract to furnish electrical energy was filed in accordance with Public Utilities Act (St. 1915, p. 115), §§ 14(b), 17, subd. 4(b), and a copy of proposed lease of seller and assignment was also filed and its execution authorized, under Civ. Code, § 3532, requiring no idle acts, held, that the contract became part of assignee's filed schedule of rates, making it unnecessary to file originals, so as to allow assignee to sue purchaser for difference between contract price fixed before Public Securities Commission acquired control of rates, and as fixed after commission acquired control under Public Utilities Act.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company against the Universal Electric & Gas Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

William Kehoe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas H. Breeze and Leo H. Susman, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An appeal from a judgment entered against the defendant in an action on a contract for the sale of electrical energy.

The contract, which was entered into between Sierra & San Francisco Power Company (hereinafter referred to as the power company) and the defendant on July 9, 1915, provided for the sale by the power company and the purchase by the defendant for a period of eight years of all the electrical energy required by the latter in the regular course of its business in excess of that generated by its own plant. The rates agreed to be paid were fixed in accordance with a sliding scale based upon the amount of energy used, and it was further provided that the contract should bind the successors in interest of both parties. The complaint alleged that between the months of January, 1920, and April, 1922, inclusive, energy was furnished, for which under the contract defendant agreed to pay the sum of $812,613.97, and of which $774,598.36 had been paid. The prayer was for the difference of $38,015.61, and for which, with interest, the judgment was entered. The contract also provided that for the energy delivered during any month payment should be made within 30 days thereafter, and, in case the defendant should dispute any bill rendered within the period fixed for payment, then it should pay the amount which it admitted to be due, and forewith offer to submit to arbitration in the manner provided the question respecting the balance unpaid.

When the contract was entered into the Railroad Commission of the state of California had no jurisdiction over the rates, charges, and contracts of the parties, for the reason that they were not operating within a municipality which had surrendered its power of control in such matters. After the amendment of section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution in 1914, the present Public Utilities Act was adopted (Stats. 1915, p. 115), and took effect on August 8, 1915. By this legislation the commission acquired jurisdiction over the parties respecting their contracts and rates (section 14(b) of the act, and in compliance with an order of the commission the power company on October 6, 1915, filed a list of deviations from its regularly filed electric rates then in force. Reference therein was made to the above contract, but whether the list set forth the rate agreed to be paid thereunder cannot now be ascertained, as the list has been lost from the files of the commission. Subsequently the commission requested that a copy of the contract be filed, and this was done on February 15, 1916.

Thereafter on March 26, 1919, the power company and Pacific Gas & Electric Company, plaintiff and respondent here, filed with the commission their joint application for an order authorizing the power company to execute a lease of all its generating and distributing plants and properties to the plaintiff, this being followed by a supplemental application referring to the proposed lease, the terms of which were contained in an exhibit attached, and by which, in addition to leasing its properties and business, the lessor assigned to the lessee for the term of the lease or until their earlier expiration all of the lessor's existing contracts for the sale of electrical energy. Thereafter a notice of hearing was given by the commission, stating the nature of the application, and on January 17, 1920, its order, referring to the form of the lease filed with the application and authorizing its execution, was made. Pursuant to the authorization the lease, containing substantially the provisions, terms, and conditions shown in the exhibit, was executed, but a copy of the executed instrument was not filed with the commission. As stated, the lease by its terms assigned all existing contracts for the sale of electrical energy, and these the lessee assumed and agreed to perform, subject, however, to such changes and modifications as should from time to time be lawfully made by agreement between the lessee, as successor in interest of the lessor, and the other party or parties thereto, or otherwise in conformity with law. At all times since August 9, 1915, plaintiff has been engaged in selling and distributing electrical energy in San Francisco, and during that period has had on file with the commission schedules of its rates and charges which were in full force and effect. None of those schedules, however, prescribed the same rates as those specified in the above contract, but, as stated, a copy of the contract has at all times since February 15, 1916, been on file with the commission.

It is admitted that during the period alleged in the complaint the amount of energy as claimed by the plaintiff was delivered to the defendant, and that statements therefor were rendered monthly; the rates charged being those provided by the contract. Some months before the making of the lease and assignments mentioned the original parties to the contract agreed that the rates fixed therein should be lowered, this agreement being evidenced by certain letters which passed between them. Subsequently the power company, under date of July 31, 1918, gave notice of the termination of this agreement, and thereafter until the month of December, 1919, bills were rendered monthly at the rates provided by the contract, but the defendant continued to make payment thereon at the reduced rate. On January 17, 1921, an action was commenced by the power company against the defendant to recover the difference, and a judgment therefor was entered, which was subsequently affirmed on appeal. Sierra & San Francisco Power Co. v. Universal Electric & Gas Co., 197 Cal. 376, 241 P. 76. It was held in that case that, the letters mentioned not having been filed with the commission, the purported modification of the original agreement never became effective, and that the power company had the right to revert to the original rate without the sanction of the commission.

After the plaintiff commenced delivery under the contract the defendant continued to make monthly payments based upon the reduced rate, and, so far as shown, no offer was made by it to submit the question regarding the unpaid balances to arbitration.

[1] Appellant claims that the contract was not assignable, and, further, that neither the original contract nor the lease purporting to assign the same having been filed with the commission, as parts of plaintiff's schedule of rates, no recovery can be had in the action. The contract, so far as shown, contained no stipulation against assignment, nor any provision which expressly or impliedly forbade performance by another. Furthermore, there was nothing to show that the skill or other quality peculiar to the power company, or the nature of the service, was a material inducement to the contract. Similar contracts have been held to be assignable (La Rue v. Groezinger, 84 Cal. 281, 24 P. 42, 18 Am. St. Rep. 179; Leader Co. v. Little Rock, etc., Co., 120 Ark. 221, 179 S. W. 358); and it appears that appellant, with knowledge of the facts and without objection, except as to the rate charged, accepted deliveries from the plaintiff and made monthly payments on account. Such circumstances sufficiently indicate a waiver of objections to the assignment. Staples v. Somerville, 176 Mass. 237, 57 N. E. 380; Kinser v. McMurray, 190 Iowa, 1329, 181 N. W. 691, 694; Brewster v. Hornellsville, 35 App. Div. 161, 54 N. Y. S. 904; Wyatt Lumber Co. v. Colley Hardwood Mfg. Co. (C. C. A.) 3 F.(2d) 1023.

It is provided by subdivision (b) of section 14 of the Public Utilities Act that:

"Under such rules and regulations as the commission may prescribe, every public utility other than a common carrier shall file with the commission within such time and in such form as the commission may designate, and shall print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing all rates," etc., "together with all rules, * * * contracts," etc., "which in any manner affect or relate to rates, tolls, rentals, classifications, or service."

And subdivision 4b of section 17 of the act provides:

"Except as in this section otherwise provided, no public utility shall charge, demand, collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for any product or commodity furnished or to be furnished, or for any service rendered or to be rendered, than the rates, tolls, rentals and charges applicable to such product or commodity or service as specified in its schedules on file and in effect at the time.

* * *

[2] As stated, a copy of the contract was filed at the request of the commission, and a copy of the proposed lease and assignment was also filed and its execution authorized. The act does not require the filing of original contracts relating to rates unless the commission shall so direct, and, the form in which such document shall be filed being left to its discretion, copies will suffice if the commission makes no further requirement. The law requires no idle acts (Civ Code, § 3532), and when by authority of the commission the power company assigned its interest in the contract to the plaintiff, copies of both the assignment and contract being then on file, the contract, as the effect of the transaction, became a part of plaintiff's filed schedule of rates, and it was unnecessary to file the original instruments, unless required by the commission, which is not contended to have been the case.

We find no merit in the appeal, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

JOHNSON v. KVALE. (Civ. 3518.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 22, 1928.

1. Pleading $\S$ 345(1)—Judgment on pleadings held erroneous, where defendant's answer alleged facts sufficient to overcome plaintiff's prima facie evidence.

Judgment on pleading in action to recover selling price of lambs and interest thereon in favor of plaintiff held erroneous, where defendant's answer alleged facts sufficient to overcome prima facie evidence that public weighmaster's certificate, upon which action was based, was correct.

2. Weights and measures $\S$ 8—Public weighmaster's certificate, relied on for correct weight of lambs sold, may be attacked for fraud or mistake (St. 1915, p. 1288, § 6, as amended by St. 1919, p. 724, § 3).

Public weighmaster's certificate of weight of lambs may be attacked on ground of fraud or mistake, in action to recover selling price of lambs based on certificate, St. 1915, p. 1288, § 6, as amended by St. 1919, p. 724, § 3, providing for reweighing of commodity, when doubt or difference arises, and that when product is sold subject to public weighmaster's certificate, weight should be true net weight of product, not showing intention that method provided was to be exclusive remedy for correcting error.

3. Appeal and error $\Rightarrow$ 1171(2)—Judgment on pleadings for \$666.60, defendant's answer admitting liability of \$594.10, will not be affirmed on ground that difference was trifle which law disregards.

Judgment on the pleadings for plaintiff in action to recover for selling price of lambs based on public weighmaster's certificate of weight, where defendant's answer alleged discrepancy in true weight, and weight as stated in certificate which would make correct selling price $594.10 instead of $666.60, will not be affirmed on ground that difference was trifle which law would disregard.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; H. L. Preston, Judge.

Action by Glen Johnson against N. J. Kvale. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lilburn Gibson, of Ukiah, for appellant.
W. D. L. Held, of Ukiah, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was given judgment on the pleadings for the sum of $666.60 and interest thereon, the amount demanded in the complaint, and the defendant has appealed. The answer admits an indebtedness of $594.10, but denies any greater indebtedness. Respondent's brief correctly states the following facts:

"On June 16, 1927, plaintiff sold defendant several lots of sheep, among them 123 lambs at the agreed price of ten cents per pound. The 123 lambs were weighed by a public weighmaster, and under his seal he issued a certificate showing these lambs to weigh 6305 lbs. Thereupon the parties settled on that basis; the defendant took delivery of the sheep and gave plaintiff his check for $666.60 in payment of the several lots of sheep he then received from plaintiff, including the 123 lambs. Defendant shipped a portion of said sheep and mingled the remainder with others he had elsewhere purchased. Some time thereafter, defendant claims to have discovered that said 123 lambs did not weigh 6305 lbs. as the public weighmaster's certificate showed but that they weighed only 5580 lbs. Defendant thereupon stopped payment on the check he had delivered to plaintiff. This action was then instituted."

[1] The answer, among other averments, alleges that the 123 lambs weighed in the aggregate only 5,580 pounds, but that, "by reason of the fact that one of the peas on the scales had been moved without the knowledge of this defendant, or of the public weighmaster in charge thereof, * * * all 123 lambs appeared to weigh 6,305 pounds instead of their actual weight of 5,580 pounds; that said public weighmaster thereupon delivered his certificate to these parties, which certificate showed said lambs to have weighed 6,305 pounds, and, acting solely upon said weights as described by said certificate, said defendant drew his check in favor of said plaintiff in the sum of $666.60 instead of the correct sum of $594.10; * * * that said check was immediately delivered to the plaintiff; that the making, executing and delivery of said check in the sum of $666.60 by defendant was done and performed by defendant through inadvertence and by mistake and through entire ignorance of the fact that the said lambs weighed 5,580 pounds only and * * * solely by reason of his said mistaken belief, * * * and had he known that said lambs weighed only 5,580 pounds, he would have drawn his check in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $594.10 only."

The allegations of the answer show that the check was given under a mistake of fact. Respondent contends that the weighmaster's certificate is prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein. This may be conceded, but this prima facie evidence is overcome by the facts alleged in the answer. It may be that the defendant will experience difficulty at the trial in proving the alleged facts, but that has nothing to do with the sufficiency of the answer as a pleading. It cannot be said as a matter of law that, because of the impossibility of again weighing the lambs, their weight may not be susceptible of proof by other evidence. If the shipment of a part of the lambs and the mingling of some of them with others have made it impossible to determine their true weight with reasonable accuracy, the defendant must pay in accordance with the weighmaster's certificate, however innocent his acts, but, if such proof is available, no reason appears for penalizing him by requiring him to pay the plaintiff a greater sum than that to which he is entitled. Even if the defendant had paid the plaintiff in cash the full amount of the check, under the allegations of the answer he would be entitled to recover the alleged excess. 20 Cal. Jur. 972; 21 R. C. L. 164.

[2] Section 6 of the Act of 1915, providing for rules and regulations governing the performance of the duties of public weighmasters (Stats. 1915, p. 1288), as amended in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 724), provides for the reweighing of any commodity "when doubt or differences arise as to the correctness of the net or gross weight" thereof as shown by the certificate of a public weighmaster. Section 7 of the act, as amended in 1919, provides: "When any product is sold subject to public weighmaster weights, such weight shall be the true net weight of the product."

There is nothing in the act, however, to indicate that it was the intention to make the certificate of a public weighmaster conclusive evidence of the weight of a commodity, and it has been held that the Legislature has not the power to make such certificate conclusive. 28 R. C. L. 7. Neither does it appear that it was the intention to make the method provided by section 6 the exclusive remedy for correcting an error in weight, when the party seeking a correction had no reason to doubt the correctness of the certificate in time to avail himself of such method. In such a case, it is more reasonable to hold that, like other instruments, the certificate may be attacked on the ground of fraud or mistake.

[3] Respondent further contends that the amount of the excess, $72.50, is so small that the judgment should be affirmed on the ground that "the law disregards trifles." It requires no argument to show that the doctrine is not applicable to the facts of this case.

The judgment is reversed.

HARTSOCK et al. v. MERRITT. (Civ. 6462.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 23, 1928.

As Modified Nov. 22, 1928.

1. Mandamus ⇨63—Mandamus lies to compel public official to perform his specific duty, where he refuses to act or where refusal is clear abuse of discretion.

Where the law imposes upon a public official specific duties and he either whimsically or arbitrarily refuses to perform them, or where his refusal to perform is based upon an erroneous conclusion of his legal duties, or where the right of an individual is so fixed that the refusal of the official to act is a clear abuse of discretion, mandamus is the proper remedy to compel him to do his duty.

2. Mandamus ⇨74(1)—Mandamus lies to compel city clerk to certify sufficiency of recall petition, where refusal was clear abuse of discretion.

Where city clerk wrongfully and arbitrarily refused to certify as sufficient a petition for recall of a city commissioner, and in doing so clearly abused his discretion, mandamus is the proper remedy to compel him to certify.

Application by A. R. Hartsock and others for mandamus against Frank C. Merritt to compel respondent, as Clerk of the City of Oakland, to certify as sufficient a recall petition of a City Commissioner. Writ granted.

Frederick Dubovsky, of Oakland, for petitioners.

Preston Higgins, City Atty., C. Stanley Wood, Asst. City Atty., Alfin N. Nelson, Chief Deputy City Atty., and John W. Collier, Deputy City Atty., all of Oakland, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. The petitioner moved for a peremptory writ of mandate to require the respondent, the city clerk of the city of Oakland, to certify as sufficient a petition filed with him asking for an election to vote upon the recall of C. C. Young, one of the commissioners of said city, and purporting to have been signed by the required number of qualified voters of said city. The respondent filed a demurrer and answer to the petition. The demurrer was overruled, and the legal questions involved in the proceedings were disposed of at that time (Hartsock v. Merritt [Cal. App.] 269 P. 757), but the allegations of the answer raised issues of fact upon which findings were necessary to be had before the proceeding could be finally determined. Those issues of fact were referred to Hon. J. T. B. Warne, a judge of the superior court, for trial and determination, and following the trial, pursuant to said reference, written findings thereon have been made and filed herein. The petitioner now moves that these findings of fact be adopted by this court, that a peremptory writ issue, and that the exhibits consisting of individual certificates of electors asking for the recall election be withdrawn.

The said referee, after a painstaking and impartial trial of all the issues referred to him, running from September 17 to October 1 of this year, has found that a large number of individual certificates were wrongfully and arbitrarily rejected by the respondent; that such certificates conform to all the requirements of the provisions of the charter of the city of Oakland; and that there were filed with the respondent 8,769 valid and sufficient individual certificates, a number in excess of that required by the charter for the purpose of calling the election.

The referee was further directed to transmit to this court all the evidence offered upon the issue pleaded, that respondent's rejection of any of the said certificates was wrongful, arbitrary, or fraudulent. This evidence has been transmitted with the referee's report, and in addition thereto he has found that the action of the respondent was not fraudulent, but that his rejection of 1,400 individual certificates was wrongful and arbitrary. The purpose of bringing the evidence upon this issue before us was to enable this court to determine whether the case presented was one warranting the exercise of the extraordinary writ of mandamus to control the action of a public official in whom discretionary powers are vested.

[1] The general rule is that mandamus does not lie to compel a public official to exercise his discretion in any particular manner, but where the law imposes upon him specific duties and he either whimsically or arbitrarily refuses to perform those duties, or where his refusal to perform is based upon an erroneous conclusion of his legal duties, or where the right of the individual is so fixed that the refusal of the official to act is a clear abuse of discretion, mandamus is the proper remedy. [2] Such is the case presented here. Upon the written findings on file herein, and upon the evidence transmitted therewith from which we find that the action of the respondent was wrongful and arbitrary and a clear abuse of discretion, and upon the matters heretofore decided on demurrer, we conclude that a peremptory writ of mandate should issue as prayed for in the petition herein filed.

The motion of the petitioner is therefore granted, and the writ will issue as prayed.

PER CURIAM. It appearing that in the judgment heretofore entered herein the court inadvertently failed to include therein costs to the petitioner, and it appearing upon agreement of the parties that the respondent is a public officer of the city of Oakland, a municipal corporation, and that as such he defended the petition herein in good faith, and that the cost should, therefore, be awarded against said municipal corporation. It is therefore ordered that the judgment heretofore entered herein be and the same is hereby amended, by adding thereto the following: The petitioners are to recover their costs herein from the city of Oakland, a municipal corporation.

Action by J. J. Davis against William G. Wansleben and others. Judgment against one of the defendants only, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James M. Thomas, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Fitzgerald & Johnson, of Gilroy, for respondents.

CASHIN, J. An action to recover for goods sold and delivered.

The complaint alleged that the goods were sold to Ogalalla Tribe, Improved Order of Redmen No. 142, an unincorporated association (which will be hereinafter referred to as the association), and other defendants, including one Jack Donnelly, who were alleged to have been doing business under the name of Redmen's Circus and Pow Wow. The trial court entered judgment against Donnelly alone, and it is claimed by the plaintiff, who has appealed therefrom, that judgment should also have been entered against the association.

In support of the contention it is urged that the findings of the court are unsupported, and that the decision is against law.

The testimony shows the defendant Donnelly to have been a promoter of public entertainments, which were usually given under the auspices of some social organization, the profits being divided between him and the organization. Defendants Wansleben, Fabri, Ralph and Harry Eustice were members of the association, and with them negotiations were commenced by Donnelly which led to the giving of an entertainment which was called a Redmen's Circus and Pow Wow. The affair was held at Gilroy, Cal., on consecutive evenings, and the goods for which plaintiff sought to recover were sold in connection therewith. The defendant Wansleben, in addition to being a member, was also the sacheem or head officer of the association. On March 19, 1926, he, with defendant Fabri, both assuming to act for the association, signed a written agreement with Donnelly, which provided for the giving of the entertainment and for a division of the profits between him and the association. This was followed on April 14, 1926, by a letter, addressed to the plaintiff by Wansleben, who described himself as the sacheem of the association, and which by its terms authorized Donnelly to order the goods for the association. It was testified that Donnelly talked to various members of the association at its meeting place on one or more occasions when meetings were being held, urging them to co-operate in the sale of tickets, and to render other services in connection with the affair, which several of them did. It also appears that the entertainment was held on vacant real property owned by the association; that a municipal license therefor was procured in its name, and that advertising matter, over the name of Wansleben as sachem, was inserted in local newspapers and sent to the members in the form of circulars, stating that the affair would be held under the auspices of the association for the purpose of raising funds for its new building, and urging them to purchase and sell tickets of admission. This testimony tended to show that the association was a party to the transaction; and it was testified in effect by Fabri that it approved the acts of the individual defendants.

As against the foregoing, it was testified by defendants Wansleben, Ralph and Harry Eustice that the whole transaction was arranged by Fabri and themselves with Donnelly, and that the association had no connection therewith; that Donnelly first approached Fabri on the subject, and it was suggested that the entertainment be given under the auspices of the association, which proposal they declined, giving as their reason that the by-laws of the association would not permit. It was then agreed that the affair would be conducted on their own responsibility, it being understood between all the parties that Donnelly should furnish the merchandise and other things needed, and be responsible for any losses; and that, if the result showed a profit, this should be divided with Donnelly, and the balance, after deducting the costs of a banquet for themselves, should be presented to the association for the benefit of its building fund. The Eustices also testified that the contract and letter mentioned were signed by Wansleben without their knowledge and consent, and, according to the latter, without authority of the association; his testimony in this respect being corroborated by the secretary of the association. It was also testified that the advertising mentioned was caused to be done by Donnelly; and it appears that all the funds derived from the enterprise (which finally resulted in a loss) were received and disbursed by the individual defendants through a bank account opened by them and not by the association. There was also evidence that neither the contract nor the letter was called to the attention of any officer or member of the association, with the exception of Wansleben and Fabri, until after the entertainment had closed. No evidence of authority to sign the contract or letter on behalf of the association was adduced, and it is not contended that the sachem of the organization had implied power to bind it by contract. Appellant claims, however, that the facts support no conclusion other than that the purchase of the goods was approved by the association: and, further, were such as to estop the latter from denying liability.

[1, 2] We are unable to agree with these contentions. The burden of proof rested upon the plaintiff; and, although the court might from the evidence have fairly found against the association, nevertheless the testimony of these witnesses—which the court believed, and which was not inherently improbable—tended to support the findings, and we cannot say that the conclusions reached were unreasonable. Furthermore, no benefit from the transaction was received by the association, nor was any act done or omitted which, in view of the testimony of its witnesses, would estop it from denying liability to the plaintiff.

Appellant, as stated by his counsel, is not seeking to recover a personal judgment against any of the individuals joined as defendants except Donnelly, but to enforce a claim against the association. After a reading of the whole record, including the evidence, we are satisfied that no sufficient ground has been shown for the reversal of the judgment in favor of the association, or a direction, as asked by appellant, that a judgment be entered against it.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Suit by Eric Lyders against Earl P. Wilsey and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henshaw, Black & Lyders, of San Francisco, and J. J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for appellant.

J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, and John D. Willard and Gilbert D. Ferrell, both of San Francisco, for respondent Wilsey.

Daniel A. Ryan, of San Francisco, for respondent Kneese.

NOURSE, J. This is a special proceeding arising out of a contest between two applicants for the purchase of swamp or overflowed lands of the state and referred to the superior court of San Mateo county for trial and decision by the surveyor general of the state under the provisions of sections 3414 et seq. of the Political Code.

The plaintiff, who is last in time in filing his application, charges in his complaint that he was delayed in receiving a survey from the county surveyor of San Mateo county, and charges, upon information and belief, that this delay was the result of a conspiracy on the part of the county surveyor and defendant Wilsey, who is the other applicant for the right to purchase the lands in controversy. For the purpose of raising this issue the complaint alleges that the defendant Kneese, who at all times was the county surveyor of San Mateo county, had employed Wilsey as a deputy county surveyor in his office, and that the county surveyor, having learned through the plaintiff that the lands in controversy were open to purchase from the state, conveyed this information to his codefendant, and that he and his codefendant then conspired to so delay action upon plaintiff's application for a survey as to permit the defendant Wilsey to procure a survey of the same lands and file his application with the state surveyor general for leave to purchase prior to the time when the plaintiff made similar application.

The material facts of the case are all undisputed and fully sustain the findings of the trial court adverse to the plaintiff. The uncontradicted evidence discloses that on March 20, 1924, the defendant Wilsey, assuming that under the law his application should be made directly to the state, wrote to the registrar of the state land office at Sacramento, Cal., for information leading to the purchase of the lands in controversy. This letter was delivered to the registrar of the federal land office in Sacramento, and by him forwarded to the federal land office in San Francisco, and by that office returned to the state surveyor general in Sacramento, in which office it was received on March 25, 1924. On March 22 of the same year the defendant Wilsey filed with the county surveyor of San Mateo county a written application for a survey of the land in question. On March 24 the surveyor with an assistant made a preliminary survey of the land and instructed his assistant to proceed with the work. On March 26 the plaintiff made an oral application to the county surveyor for a survey of the same land. He was notified that an application of this character should be in writing, and he filed with the county surveyor a written application for that purpose on March 28. Prior to this, however, the defendant Wilsey personally appeared in the office of the surveyor general at Sacramento to apply for leave to purchase the land and was informed by the surveyor general that such an application could not be accepted until accompanied by a survey certified by the county surveyor. Such a survey was delivered to Wilsey on April 17, 1924, and on the same day he filed with the surveyor general his application to purchase, accompanied by the certified survey of the county surveyor. In response to plaintiff's request the county surveyor delivered to him a survey of the land on April 23, 1924, and on May 5 plaintiff filed with the surveyor general his application to purchase the land, accompanied by the certified survey and his protest against the granting of the application of defendant Wilsey. The surveyor general then referred the whole matter to the superior court as herein stated.

The trial court found all these facts to be true, and also found that it was not true that the defendant Wilsey was a deputy county surveyor, either de jure or de facto, but that he had been employed by the county surveyor to assist him in his private practice. It was also found that it was not true that the defendants entered into any conspiracy to defraud the plaintiff, or that any false representations were made to the plaintiff regarding the survey, or that the application of the defendant Wilsey was made for the benefit of his codefendant Kneese, and that the latter has not at any time been interested in the application of Wilsey to purchase the land or any portion thereof, and has not at any time had any interest in the land sought to be purchased. Upon these findings the trial court drew the conclusions of law that the defendant Wilsey was entitled to purchase the land; that he made application to the county surveyor for a survey before the plaintiff applied to the county surveyor for the same purpose, and that he duly filed his application with the state surveyor general to purchase the land before plaintiff filed his application with the same official. Judgment followed in favor of the defendants, and from this the plaintiff has appealed on a typewritten transcript.

upon two grounds, neither of which is based upon the claim that the evidence in the record does not support the findings of the trial court, but both of which are based solely upon the bare statement of the appellant that the facts as he conceives them to be, and the inferences which he draws, support his theory of the case. The first ground is that the two respondents conspired to defraud him out of his right to purchase the land and that we should find this to be true by disregarding all the sworn testimony upon which the trial court found the facts to be and by taking in lieu of that evidence the suspicions which the appellant entertains regarding the conduct of the respondents. Though it should be sufficient to say that this court will not set its judgment above that of the trial court upon the simple question of the facts in issue where the finding of fact depends upon the truth of the testimony of the witnesses appearing before the trial court, there is another answer to the argument of appellant and it is this: His only claim of a conspiracy rests in the suspicions and in the inferences which he insists must be drawn adverse to the positive evidence in the record. But an inference is a deduction to be drawn from the facts proved and not a conclusion based upon suspicion alone. To the point that because Wilsey was employed in and about the office of his correspondent we must presume that they conspired to defraud appellant, the answer is that the presumption is always against fraud. This presumption approximates in strength that of innocence of crime. Truett v. Onderdonk, 120 Cal. 581, 588, 53 P. 26; Everett v. Standard Acc. Ins. Co., 45 Cal. App. 332, 338, 187 P. 996.

[4] The second ground urged by the appellant is that the respondent Wilsey had been continuously acting as deputy county surveyor in the office of defendant Kneese and was, therefore, as a matter of public policy, disqualified from purchasing the land from the state. Here again the appellant does not contend that the evidence does not support the finding of the trial court adverse to him, and does not complain of any error in the admission of testimony or in the rulings of the court at any period of the trial. His contention is, like that on the first point raised, that he believes in his own theory and that we should act upon that belief. The evidence is plain and undisputed that the respondent Wilsey was never at any time alleged in the complaint appointed or designated as a deputy county surveyor; did not occupy that position either de jure or de facto; was never known or recognized as deputy by the county surveyor or by the county of San Mateo or by any of those dealing in an official capacity with the office of the county surveyor. The law regarding the appointment of deputies of county officers is found in section 4024, Political Code. It is plain and unmistakable and requires no interpretation. It provides that certain county officers may appoint such deputies as may be necessary, but that such appointment must be in writing and filed in the office of the county clerk and until such deputy shall have taken the oath of office "no one shall be or act as such deputy."

Though the briefs argue to some length as to whether the law in force at the time these transactions occurred required the original application to purchase land from the state to be filed with the county surveyor or with the state surveyor general, and whether the initiation of the right of the applicant comes from the filing of the application with the surveyor general or with the filing of a request with the county surveyor to make a survey, and whether such request should be oral or in writing, we do not deem it necessary to discuss any of these questions, because, as we have seen, the undisputed facts are, as found by the trial court, that the respondent Wilsey was prior in time in his filing in both offices.

majority of the court. I adhere to that position.

In substance my view is that the escrow agreement between the buyer and seller had been fully performed by the buyer, Carlsen, and that, inasmuch as he waived the condition respecting certificate of title to be furnished by the seller (a provision made for his own exclusive benefit), he thereby became entitled to delivery of the deed and other documents constituting the conveyance. If this position is sound, it necessarily follows that the escrow party was in law under the specific duty and obligation to make said delivery to said buyer. This obligation may not be cast upon the shoulders of another, not even the other party to the escrow. It is no concern of the other party. The conflict is between the purchaser and the escrow depository.

Section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure clearly does not apply to this situation. An escrow has been defined as follows:

"A grant may be deposited by the grantor with a third person, to be delivered on performance of a condition, and, on delivery by the depository, it will take effect. While in the possession of the third person, and subject to condition, it is called an escrow." Section 1057, Civil Code.

When the purchaser fully performed upon his part, according to the terms of the document, the depository became a trustee for him. This principle was well expressed in the recent case of Law v. Title Guarantee & Trust Co. (Cal. App.) 267 P. 565, 568, as follows:

"It will be observed that it is only while the instrument is subject to the conditions imposed that the deposit will be deemed to be an escrow. When the conditions upon which the deposit of the instrument have been fully performed, the relationship of the interested parties automatically changes and the depository is then deemed to hold the instrument as a trustee for the party entitled thereto."

The same principle is announced in Feisthamel v. Campbell, 55 Cal. App. 774, 205 P. 25; also in Shreeves v. Pearson, 194 Cal. 699, 230 P. 448. In 10 R. O. L. p. 640, it is said:

"* * * Upon the happening of the event or the performance of the condition upon which manual delivery should be made by the depository to the grantee, although not in fact physically delivered to him, a deed theretofore in escrow becomes ipso facto the deed of the grantee in whom the title vests, and that thenceforth the depository or holder is regarded as the mere agent or trustee of the grantee."

See, also, Wilson v. Coffey (Cal. App.) 268 P. 408.

It requires no extended citation of authority to show that the seller lost control of the documents by the deposit of them in escrow. A redelivery could not be compelled except upon failure of the purchaser to pay the purchase price specified, which is not and could not be claimed. Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 133, 139, 13 P. 315; McDonald v. Huff, 77 Cal. 279, 282, 19 P. 499; Bradbury v. Davenport, 120 Cal. 152, 154, 52 P. 301; Trask v. Garza, 51 Cal. App. 739, 743, 197 P. 807; Law v. Title Guar. & Trust Co., supra.

SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK v. CARLSEN et al. (L. A. 8044.)

Clearly the complaint in Carlsen v. Security Trust & Savings Bank, supra, stated a cause of action against the depository for an alleged breach of duty to the plaintiff. Law v. Title Guar. & Trust Co., supra; Vinson, Jones, etc., v. Pugh, 172 N. C. 843, 90 S. E. 122; Collins v. Kares, 46 S. D. 385, 193 N. W. 130; Johnston Realty v. Nat. City Bank (Fla.) 116 So. 229. Under these facts, upon what ground can it be contended that a bill of interpleader is allowable? Does there exist a defendant who would not want to shed his troubles on another by this method if it could be done? The case of Johnston Realty v. Nat. City Bank, supra, is similar in facts and identical in principle with the case before us, and the court there said:

"The bank seeking an interpleader has no ground for the relief. It cannot cast upon the parties defendant the burden of settling the question of whether it had obligated itself to one of them. By declining to comply with its duty a situation afterwards arose which the bank now makes the occasion for its bill, but the bank had nothing to do with that controversy, even assuming that the question had been properly raised."

The other members of the court seem to base their holding almost entirely upon the wording of the escrow agreement appended to the original agreement of the parties, as follows.

"No rescission of this escrow or modification of its terms or any notice or demand shall be of any effect without joint consent in writing, subscribed by the undersigned, and assented to by the bank."

It is said that the seller wrote into that provision indemnity against his own failure to perform. I cannot attribute this weakness to it. Extended discussion would weaken and not clarify the answer to such a contention. Did the parties contract or was the seller guilty of a sham? In the first place, he only agreed to transfer all of his right, title, and interest, the legal equivalent of a quitclaim deed. Shall it be held that he did even less than this by ruling that he was always protected against any covenant on his own part? It seems self-evident that the contract should not be held to have been merely an idle act.

Importance also may have been attached to the provision that the bank should assent to any modification of the terms of the escrow. It seems too clear for argument that under said clause it is not a change or modification of the escrow for one party to waive a provision expressly intended for his sole benefit. In 13 C. J. p. 672, the law in this respect is stated as follows:

"In general proof of the waiver of performance by the party who is entitled to insist on performance is tantamount to a performance. * * * A mere waiver of a condition in the contract does not amount to the substitution of a new contract. On the contrary, waiver of performance of a contract or extension of the time therefor, in the case of a condition precedent, is equivalent to the performance thereof at the stipulated time and leaves the original contract intact."

See, also, Barton v. Gray, 57 Mich. 622, 24 N. W. 638; Leahy v. Engineering Co., 186 App. Div. 354, 174 N. Y. S. 310.

It is my view that the petition for rehearing in this case should have been granted.

NEWPORT et al. v. HATTON et al.*
(Sac. 4047.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 29, 1928.
Rehearing Granted Nov. 28, 1928.

1. Judgment $\S$ 486(1)—Judgment will be sustained on collateral attack, unless absolutely void.

Judgment will be sustained on collateral attack, unless the judgment is absolutely void.

2. Judgment $\S$ 21—Judgment will not be pronounced void for uncertainty of description unless court can see that nothing is described.

Judgment affecting property will not be pronounced a nullity for uncertainty of description, unless the court can see from the judgment that nothing is described.

3. Quietting title $\S$ 52—Judgment quieting title, describing land as "fractional northwest quarter of section," held not void on its face.

Description of land in judgment quieting title as "fractional northwest quarter of section, * * * the said land being the land which is described in the complaint and in the answer in this action," held not to render judgment void on its face for want of adequate description.

4. Quietting title $\S$ 52—Description of land in judgment need not be such that mere inspection of description will show lands intended.

It is not essential to validity of judgment that court should from mere inspection of the description be enabled to know what lands are intended.

5. Evidence $\S$ 460(4)—Extrinsic evidence held admissible to explain location of property described in judgment as "fractional northwest quarter of section," though judgment was not void on its face.

Where judgment quieted title to "fractional northwest quarter of section," extrinsic evidence was properly admitted to explain any uncertainties as to the exact parcel of real property covered, though judgment was not void on its face.

6. Deeds $\hookrightarrow$ 138—Intention of parties determines whether withdrawal, from land conveyed, of property for railroad right of way, constitutes reservation of easement or exception of land affected.

Intention of parties determines whether clause withdrawing property from deed, for right of way of railroad, constitutes reservation of easement or exception of the land affected; mere use of word "excepting" or "reserving" not being controlling.

7. Deeds $\hookrightarrow$ 138—Clause "excepting and reserving" land for railroad purposes held exception and not reservation.

Where main line of railroad had been constructed across property and actually existed prior to execution of deed, trial court's construction of clause in deed excepting and reserving strip of land for railroad purposes as exception of the parcel, rather than reservation of an easement, held not error.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Exception (In Deed).]

8. Deeds $\hookrightarrow$ 138—Abortive attempt to except land along railroad tracks to be constructed held not to prevent construction of clause in deed as exception and not reservation; "excepting and reserving."

Clause excepting and reserving property for right of way of railroad passing through property at the time of the deed could be construed as exception of land, and not mere reservation of easement, notwithstanding abortive attempt to except strip of land on either side of other railroad tracks to be subsequently constructed.

Hoover, all of Modesto, J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, and Brown & Chamberlain and Griffin & Boone, all of Modesto, for respondents.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, amici curiae.

WASTE, C. J. Claiming to be the owners in remainder, subject only to a life estate in their mother, of a quarter section of land situate in Stanislaus county, the plaintiffs instituted this action to establish such ownership, to remove an alleged cloud upon their title, and to recover the proceeds derived from sales of the land. The facts and circumstances giving rise to this litigation are very fully set forth in an opinion of this court, heretofore handed down, reversing the judgment entered on an order sustaining demurrers to the complaint without leave to amend. Newport v. Hatton, 195 Cal. 132, 231 P. 987. The plaintiffs' present appeal is from the judgment entered after a trial on the merits. Preliminarily, it may be said that plaintiffs, upon this appeal, have abandoned their pursuit of the proceeds of the sales of the land in controversy because of their confessed inability to trace the same into the hands or possession of the defendants charged in the complaint with the receipt thereof. In support of their claim of ownership of the land in remainder, the plaintiffs set forth at length in their complaint certain events which transpired during their minority, and which culminated in a tax sale of the premises and the entry of a fraudulent and collusive judgment in an action entitled Plato v. Newport, and having for its purpose the quieting of the title of the purchaser at a tax sale as against a life tenant and the plaintiff remaindermen. As certain of the defendants herein deraign title under the Plato judgment, the plaintiffs upon the trial urged that by reason of the fraud practiced in its procurement that judgment was and is void. The court below so found, but further found that the defendants claiming thereunder were bona fide purchasers for value without notice, and therefore entitled to protection in the assertion of their respective claims to the land. This latter finding is not assailed by the plaintiffs upon this appeal. Both upon the prior appeal and herein the plaintiffs concede, as stated in the opinion heretofore filed, that—

"Any person acquiring title to any part of the property in good faith, and without knowledge of the fraud, is fully protected, notwithstanding the interests of the plaintiffs. Their rights cannot prevail over those of innocent purchasers in good faith and for value."

As to this, there can be no dispute. Stern v. Judson, 163 Cal. 726, 735, 127 P. 38; Doyle v. Hampton, 159 Cal. 729, 734, 116 P. 39.

The only attack the plaintiffs now make upon the judgment entered by the court below in favor of the defendants claiming under the Plato judgment is that the latter judgment is void for its asserted uncertain and inadequate description of the property involved. The land in controversy was described in the Plato judgment as:

"The fractional northwest quarter of section twenty-nine (29), township three (3) south, range nine (9) east, Mount Diablo Base and Meridian, in the County of Stanislaus, State of California, the said land being the land which is described in the complaint and in the answer in this action."

Despite plaintiffs' assault upon the Plato judgment, the court below found it not to be void for indefiniteness of description, declaring in its findings that—

"The land described in the judgment in the action of Plato v. Newport et al., is all of the northwest quarter of section 29, excepting therefrom that part of the said quarter section assessed by the Modesto Irrigation District for the year 1894 to Charles Maze, and excepting that portion of the quarter section which in the year 1894 was owned by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and this court concludes that the said description in said judgment is not void for indefiniteness or uncertainty, and that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a judgment against the defendants herein claiming title to that part of the land described in the complaint in the instant case which is included in the judgment in the case of Plato v. Newport et al., as hereinabove defined, who are bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice as elsewhere in these findings set out, but on the contrary, the said defendants who are such bona fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice are entitled to a judgment herein as against the plaintiffs declaring that they, the said defendants, are the owners of said lands as described in their respective answers, and in support of the foregoing conclusion of law that the said description in the judgment in the case of Plato v. Newport et al., is not void for uncertainty, and in explanation of the said conclusion, this court finds as follows:

"That the attempted description of the property sought to be affected by the judgment in the case of Plato v. Newport et al. is insufficient and void so far as any description is set forth in any of the pleadings in said case, or in the judgment or decree or in the judgment roll in said action. That by reference to the transcript of the reporter's notes of the proceedings of the trial of said action filed therein as set forth in Finding 107, and not otherwise can it be ascertained from any paper or record in said action of Plato v. Newport, that the claim of title of the plaintiff in said action was based on the tax certificate and tax deed attached as exhibits to the complaint in the instant case. That in said tax certificate and tax deed reference is made to the assessment rolls of the Modesto Irrigation District for the year 1894 as a basis for the tax sale proceedings; that said assessment rolls were not introduced in evidence at the trial of said case of Plato v. Newport et al., but were introduced at the trial of the instant case; that by an examination of said assessment rolls, and not otherwise, it is the conclusion of this court that the judgment in said action of Plato v. Newport et al. was designed and intended to affect and describe all of the northwest quarter of said section 29, excepting and eliminating therefrom those parts or portions of said quarter section which were assessed for the year 1894 to Charles Maze, and further excepting and eliminating therefrom the interest or right in the said quarter section retained or owned by the Central Pacific Railroad Company as shown by the terms and limitations contained in said deed set out in Finding 1, subdivision (g)."

It is the contention of the plaintiffs and appellants herein that the description of the property as given in the Plato judgment is fatally defective, that recourse can be had to the judgment roll alone in an effort or attempt to supply any deficiency in such description, and that the court below erred in calling to its assistance evidence extrinsic to the judgment roll in the action of Plato v. Newport to bolster up the description contained in the judgment therein entered. Appellants go further and assert that such extrinsic evidence, even if admissible to assist in the identification of the property, falls short of accomplishing that result. In support of these contentions it is urged that a description which "simply refers to the land sought to be affected as part of a larger tract without any reference to its boundaries or to the extent of its acreage or in some way to indicate with certainty to which part the reference is made is bad. * * *

The contention as to the inadequacy of the description in the Plato judgment was also advanced by the appellants upon the former hearing herein, and in the decision then handed down (supra) this court said:

"Applied to judgments, the rule is that the description in a judgment affecting real property should be certain and specific, and that an impossible, wrong, or uncertain description, or no description at all, renders the judgment erroneous and void. (33 Cor. Jur. p. 1209, par. 147.) The same work is authority for the declaration that the judgment may be aided by indentments and additional data drawn from the pleadings and other parts of the records, or even, in some cases, by extrinsic documentary evidence. We do not see how a judgment can be pronounced a nullity for uncertainty of description unless the court can see that nothing is described. Those claiming under it must rely on the description, it is true, but whether or not the description is defective must be tested by rules of evidence ordinarily applied to the subject. * * * The plaintiffs in this case have not made it clear that the land described in the judgment quieting title is so uncertain that the property cannot be identified and established with sufficient certainty, by the application of the ordinary rules of evidence, to define the rights of the parties."

[1, 2] It must be borne in mind that the attack now made by the appellants upon the Plato judgment is a collateral attack, and for that reason must fall unless said judgment is an absolute nullity. In De Sepulveda v. Baugh, 74 Cal. 468, 474, 16 P. 223, 226 (5 Am. St. Rep. 455), it is declared:

"I cannot see how a judgment can be pronounced a nullity for uncertainty of description, unless the court can see that nothing is described. But here the description is not even uncertain or doubtful. It simply does not come up to some ideal standard laid down by the courts as more convenient for them and their officers. The true rule would seem to be that the judgment is not void. That the purchaser must, however, rely upon the description, and if it be found so defective when tested by rules of evidence ordinarily applied to the subject that nothing can be found, he will fail, otherwise he should recover."

[3, 4] As intimated by the quotation from our former opinion in this case, we are of the view, despite the trial court's finding to the contrary, that the Plato judgment is not void on its face for want of an adequate description of the property in controversy. For all that appears on the face of the judgment, it may have described the property in a manner best known to persons familiar therewith. It is by no means essential that, from a mere inspection of the description, the court should be enabled to know what lands are intended. In 15 R. C. L. 595, § 33, it is stated:

"While in the description of real estate, as in other particulars, a judgment must be reasonably certain in its terms, the tract may be designated by some name not understood by the court, but perfectly familiar to all persons acquainted with the neighborhood in which the land is situated. Evidence may be received to show the signification of such a name, or to show that any other descriptive words, though apparently meaningless or uncertain, do in fact designate a particular tract in such manner that its identity would be apparent to persons with whom it is familiar. Thus it has been held that a judgment in ejectment describing the land as 'fraction No. 12, a part of the south-east quarter and northeast quarter of section 16, township 4, range 4, containing 34.75 acres,' is not void on its face for uncertainty in description."

Along this same line see, also, 1 Freeman on Judgments, 167, § 96; Threlkeld v. Allen, 133 Ind. 429, 32 N. E. 576, 577; Carlisle v. Killebrew, 91 Ala. 351, 8 So. 355, 24 Am. St. Rep. 915, 917. The court, in the case of Little Rock, etc., Co. v. Evins, 76 Ark. 261, 88 S. W. 992, held the following description appearing in a deed to be sufficient: "N. E. fr. quarter of the N. E. fr. quarter section 22—8—22 W." Again, in Key v. Ostrander, 29 Ind. 1, 6, a mortgage instrument described the property covered thereby as "the north-east quarter of section 36, in township 13 north, of range 9 west, north of Otter Creek, containing forty acres, lying in Vigo County, Indiana." This description was held adequate, the court declaring:

"A practical difficulty might possibly arise in the actual location of the land by the description, but the existence of any such difficulty is not patent on the face of the deed. * * *"

In answer to a contention that "a deed is evidentiary, and may be helped out by other evidence, while a decree is final and determinative," it was held in De Sepulveda v. Baugh, supra, that "the distinction is illusory."

[5] Aside from our conclusion that the Plato judgment is not void on its face so as to permit of the collateral attack herein directed at it, we are of the opinion that the court below properly permitted the introduction of extrinsic evidence to explain away any uncertainties as to the exact parcel of real property intended to be covered thereby. The case of De Sepulveda v. Baugh, supra, permitted the introduction in evidence of public records referred to in the judgment there assailed in order to identify the property intended to be affected. As we read the opinion in that case, it contains nothing prohibiting, as the appellants would have us hold, the introduction of extrinsic evidence to explain away any possible uncertainty in a description of property appearing in a judgment. The case of Smith v. Biscailuz, 83 Cal. 344, 360, 21 P. 15, 23 P. 314, is authority for the introduction of such evidence. There, in an action to quiet title, a probate decree was attacked because of its asserted inadequate description of a portion of the property. This court said:

"Is the decree to be pronounced 'a nullity for uncertainty of description,' 'because' the court can see that 'nothing is described'? Is it one where the description is so defective that 'the purchaser,' relying 'upon the description,' and applying the ordinary rules of evidence to such a matter, can find nothing? If not, then the decree on a collateral attack, such as this, is not void. (De Sepulveda v. Baugh, 74 Cal. 468 [16 P. 223, 5 Am. St. Rep. 455].)"

"It is conceded here, upon all sides, that Jordan purchased the property for a valuable consideration. And the description in the decree, under the test of the application of the ordinary rules of evidence to the subject, can readily be shown to represent a specific and certain piece of land, the property of the decedent at the date of his death.

"The decree of distribution is not, therefore, void upon this attack for want of a description of the land in which Gay claims an interest."

In an action in this state to recover possession of certain described real property, the trial court entered judgment for plaintiff, describing the property in its judgment as it was described in the complaint, but excepting therefrom such parts of the land "as were sown to grain by the defendant during the fall of 1890 and the winter of 1891." Upon appeal from the judgment, the defendant contended that the judgment was void because of inadequate description of the premises intended to be affected. This court held that—

"Prima facie the description appears to be sufficient, and no reason why it cannot be applied so as to identify the excepted land is suggested. The boundary lines of the land sown to grain by defendant during the fall of 1890 and the following winter must have been distinctly apparent on the ground from the time the grain was sown until some time after it was harvested; and if the marks by which such boundary lines were designated were subsequently removed or destroyed, their original location may be proved by extraneous evidence, as in cases of the removal or destruction of stakes or other monuments called for in deeds and patents. * * * Rosenthal v. Matthews, 100 Cal. 81, 83, 34 P. 624.

"Any description adopted in a deed by which the premises intended to be conveyed may be established and identified, is sufficient; and it is the settled doctrine, for the purpose of sustaining a grant, extrinsic evidence may always be used to identify and establish the objects of the call in the deed." Colcord v. Alexander, 67 Ill. 581, 583.

We perceive no good reason why the rule should be different as regards descriptions of real property contained in judgments.

[6-8] There is also presented herein an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment entered in favor of the defendants Central Pacific Railway Company and Southern Pacific Company, adjudging the former to be the owner in fee, and the latter, as lessee, to be entitled to the exclusive possession of a certain parcel of the quarter section already described, and paralleling their railroad tracks. The title or right of these particular defendants in and to this strip of land is founded upon the following clause appearing in a deed of conveyance from the patentee railroad companies to James M. Conley, executed in the year 1874:

"Excepting and reserving, however, for railroad purposes a strip of land four hundred feet wide lying equally on each side of the track of the railroad of said company, or any branch railroad now or hereafter constructed on said lands, and the right to use all water needed for the operating and repairing of said railroad."

It has been the contention of plaintiffs throughout that this clause created and gave rise to a mere easement or right of way, while the defendants have insisted that it constitutes an exception of the land affected thereby. In determining whether a clause, such as that here involved, constitutes a reservation or an exception, the intention of the parties employing the same is, if possible, to be ascertained. 9 Cal Jur. 324, § 188. The mere use of the word "excepting" or "reserving" is not alone determinative of the question. Coon v. Sonoma Magnesite Co., 182 Cal. 597, 600, 189 P. 271. In view of the fact that the main railroad line had been constructed across the quarter section and actually existed at a time prior to the execution of the deed containing the clause now in dispute, thus giving definite location and identification to the strip to be affected thereby, we are not prepared to say that the court below erred in construing such clause to be an exception of the parcel rather than the reservation of an easement over the same. Butler v. Gosling, 130 Cal. 422, 425, 62 P. 596; Los Angeles, etc., R. R. Co. v. New Liverpool Salt Co., 150 Cal. 21, 24, 25, 87 P. 1029; Pritchard v. Lewis, 125 Wis. 604, 104 N. W. 989, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 565, 110 Am. St. Rep. 873. The cases of Coon v. Sonoma Magnesite Co., supra, and Biles v. Tacoma R. R. Co., 5 Wash. 509, 32 P. 211, cited by the appellants, tend to warrant the assumption that had the roads therein referred to been in existence at the time of the execution of the instrument there presented for interpretation, the conclusions announced would have been different. That the deed here in question abortively attempted to except a strip of land on either side of other railroad tracks to be thereafter constructed over the quarter section does not, in our opinion, alter the situation as regards the main line then in existence. We find no merit in appellants' further contention that, by adverse possession, they acquired title to the strip of land excepted in the deed of 1874. Aside from other considerations, this particular contention lacks in persuasive force because of the fact that, since the entry of the Plato judgment in 1902, no part or parcel of the quarter section has been in the possession of the appellants or their predecessors in interest, but, on the contrary, has been in the occupancy and possession of persons claiming title thereto as against them. In view of what has been said, it becomes unnecessary to pass upon the merits of respondents' motion to dismiss, upon technical grounds, the appeal from the judgment entered for the defendant railroad companies.

For the foregoing reasons, the judgments appealed from are, and each is, affirmed.

LA CUMBRE GOLF AND COUNTRY CLUB
v. SANTA BARBARA HOTEL CO.
(L. A. 9658.)★

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Contracts $\S$ 309(2)—Contract to extend country club privileges to hotel guests held not to bind hotel company to pay amount specified after destruction of hotel.

Country club's contract to extend membership privileges to guests in certain hotel held not to bind hotel company to pay amount specified, regardless of whether hotel and guests existed; there being implied condition that it should be excused from such payments if hotel were destroyed, as by fire, without such company's fault.

2. Contracts $\S$ 309(2)—Perishing of person or thing or cessation of condition, on basis of continued existence of which parties contracted, excuses performance.

Where it is evident from nature of contract that parties contracted on basis of continued existence of person or thing, condition or state of things to which it relates, subsequent perishing of such person or thing or cessation of existence of condition will excuse performance, though promise was unqualified.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by the La Cumbre Golf and Country Club against the Santa Barbara Hotel Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Curran and W. G. Griffith, both of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Heaney, Price & Postel, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment against it in an action to recover $7,200, the sum of installment payments alleged to be due under a contract entered into between the parties. In 1920, the contract, which forms the subject of this action, was entered into. It recited that the defendant was engaged in the general hotel business in the county of Santa Barbara, state of California, and desired to furnish to its guests the privileges of golfing and all of the privileges appurtenant to a country club; that the defendant was operating a hotel called "The Ambassador" in the city of Santa Barbara and had previously entered into a contract with the plaintiff golf and country club for the extension of golfing privileges to the guests of the hotel company, and now desired to further promote the interests of its guests by increasing their means of transportation to and from the grounds of said golf club by purchasing and operating a bus between said hotel and club house, but was unwilling to engage in such undertaking unless the privileges accorded its guests under the previous contract be extended to cover an additional period of time. Following the foregoing recital of conditions and purposes, it was agreed between the parties that for a period ending December 31, 1923, the golf and country club should extend all the privileges of a membership in said club, except the privilege of voting or holding office, to any guest of the hotel company in said Ambassador Hotel. The contract continues:

"Such privileges shall include the right on the part of said guest or guests of signing the usual cards of said club for green fees, supplies and all other purposes for which such cards of said club may be signed by a member of said club, and shall also include all the other privileges of a member of said second party. * * * Said cards when so signed shall be a valid charge in favor of second party, against first party which in turn shall look to the guest of first party so signing said card or cards for reimbursement from those to whom it shall have issued cards of request for the privileges of said club."

The hotel company agreed to pay to the golf and country club $300 for each and every month of the term of the contract. It was further provided that in the event that the golf and country club be compelled to discontinue its service to the guests of the first party by reason of lack of water or for any other cause, for a period of six months, the contract should terminate at the option of either party, and in the event the discontinuance of service be for a shorter period than six months, the monthly compensation should abate for the period of discontinuance.

[1] The trial court found:

That at the time the contract between the parties was entered into, it was the understanding of the parties that said contract covered and referred to the use and enjoyment of said golf course and golf club by the guests of said hotel. "That said contract was by the parties contemplated to continue during the period of time covered thereby for the use of said course and club by said guests, and said parties each contemplated the continued existence of said hotel having guests using said golf course and that said golf club and golf course should be so patronized by the guests of said hotel and that thereby a mutual advantage would accrue to both parties—to said plaintiff in having guests using said club house, in receiving the monthly payments plus expenditures made by said hotel guests at said club house, green fees, etc., and that the defendant would receive an advantage in having facilities at its disposal in the nature of a golf course and golf club for its guests which would lead to a patronage of said hotel by parties seeking and enjoying such privileges.

"That it was contemplated and intended by said parties to said contract, at the time of the execution thereof and subsequently, that there should be guests at the said The Ambassador Hotel during the continuance of said contract; that it was contemplated and intended by said parties that said club house and golf course should at all times be open to the use and enjoyment of said guests of said hotel; that the said parties to said contract contemplated and intended at the time of the execution thereof and subsequently, that the said The Ambassador Hotel should continue to exist during the life of said contract and that the operation of said contract should be limited to the particular building known as The Ambassador Hotel; that it was contemplated and intended by said parties at the time of the execution of said contract and subsequently, as being of the essence of the said contract, and essential and vital and requisite and necessary to its performance by said defendant or plaintiff, that said building should continue to exist during the life of said contract.

"That at the date of the execution of said written agreement, and at all times thereafter, the only hotel owned by said defendant in the county of Santa Barbara, and in fact the only hotel owned at all by said defendant, was said The Ambassador Hotel; that the sole consideration received by said defendant upon the execution of said agreement, and in return for the payment of $300 a month, as set forth in said agreement, was the right and privilege extended by plaintiff to guests of said The Ambassador Hotel to use said golf club and golf course; that said plaintiff at the time of the execution of said contract knew that said defendant was the owner and operator of said The Ambassador Hotel, and that the rights and privileges provided for in said agreement and to be furnished and provided by said plaintiff were to be the use and enjoyment by the guests of said The Ambassador Hotel only and the rights and privileges so to be extended by plaintiff to said guests of The Ambassador Hotel were the sole consideration of said agreement on the part of defendant.

"That on or about the 13th day of April, 1921, without fault on the part of defendant, said The Ambassador Hotel was entirely destroyed by fire; that by reason of the destruction of said hotel by fire, defendant became unable to and has ever since continued to be unable to care for or accommodate hotel guests in said city of Santa Barbara in any manner, and that there were after said 13th day of April, 1921, no persons who might or could enjoy the rights and privileges set forth and provided for in said agreement; that said defendant did not thereafter ever build, construct, operate or maintain any hotel whatsoever, and subsequently thereto sold and disposed of its real property on which said hotel was located."

From the foregoing findings the court concluded that there was an implied condition in the contract between the parties that there should be guests in said The Ambassador Hotel, and that if through no fault of the hotel company the hotel was destroyed and there were no longer guests, the hotel company should be excused from paying for guest privileges.

The appellant argues for a construction of the contract, which would bind the defendant to pay the amount specified for club privileges for guests of a hotel, regardless of whether the hotel and guests were in existence or not. We think such a construction unwarranted and unreasonable and contrary to the intent of persons situated as were the plaintiff and defendant at the time this contract was entered into.

[2] In the case of Hackfeld & Co., Ltd., v. Castle, 186 Cal. 53, 198 P. 1041, it was said, quoting from Williston on Contracts, § 1948:

"Not only where a specific thing is itself to be sold or transferred, but wherever a contract requires for its performance the existence of a specific thing, the fortuitous destruction of that thing, or such impairment of it as makes it unavailable, excuses the promisor unless he has clearly assumed the risk of its continued existence. A contract to manufacture goods in a particular factory is discharged by the destruction of the factory. * * *"

In the case last cited appear other quotations from leading cases in support of the doctrine applied by the trial court in the instant case. It is unnecessary to set forth these statements again herein. The rule is concisely stated in 13 Corpus Juris, 642, § 717d, as follows:

"Where from the nature of the contract it is evident that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of a person or thing, condition or state of things, to which it relates, the subsequent perishing of the person or thing, or cessation of the existence of the condition will excuse the performance, a condition to such effect being implied in spite of the fact that the promise may have been unqualified."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

BARSTOW-SAN ANTONIO OIL CO. v.
WHITNEY et al. (L. A. 9398.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Nov. 26, 1928.

1. Judgment ⇨538—Judgment without date, but duly signed by judge, took effect from time of entry.

Judgment duly signed by trial judge took effect from time of its entry, though judgment was undated.

2. Quieting title ⇨52—Judgment quieting title, which decreed that plaintiff had no right in certain portions of property, and that plaintiff was owner of other parts, held not void on its face.

Judgment quieting title to certain portions of property, decreeing that plaintiff had no right, title, or interest therein, and that defendant was rightfully in possession as tenant of codefendant, and decreeing that plaintiff was owner of certain other portions of the property, held not void on its face, and therefore not subject to motion to vacate on that ground.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by the Barstow-San Antonio Oil Company against L. P. Whitney, Harvey S. Mourning, and another. From an order denying plaintiff's motion to set aside a judgment previously rendered in the case in defendant Mourning's favor, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

May F. Hogan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court, state of California, in and for the county of San Bernardino, denying plaintiff's motion to set aside a judgment rendered in said cause in 1920, in favor of defendants, quieting their title to certain mining land, and enjoining plaintiff from interfering therewith. The motion also sought to set aside certain contempt proceedings against the attorney representing the plaintiff herein, in which said attorney was adjudged guilty of contempt for disobeying the former judgment and decree in the quiet title suit.

The ground of the motion and amended motion to vacate the former judgment and the subsequent proceedings founded thereon is that said judgment is void upon its face. It is contended that this patent invalidity appears from the following facts: (1) That the court lacked jurisdiction of the parties defendant; (2) that the judgment fails to state that the issues are determined therein as between the parties defendant, and that, as a matter of fact, they were not so determined; (3) that the recitals in the judgment regarding the defendant Fuller's Earth Company of America dispute the records of the superior court in another action, and are a fraud upon the plaintiff and upon the court.

The judgment under attack was rendered and entered on January 19, 1920. It is in form a judgment quieting the title of the defendant H. S. Mourning to certain described portions of the property in question, and decreeing that the plaintiff corporation herein has no right, title, or interest therein, and that as to the defendant the Fuller's Earth Company of America it is rightfully in possession of said property and of the whole thereof as the tenant of the said defendant Mourning, and further decreeing that as to certain other portions of said property set forth in the complaint the plaintiff is the owner, and entitled to the possession thereof, and that none of the defendants has any right, title, or interest therein.

[1, 2] The foregoing judgment, while undated, was duly signed by the trial judge, and takes effect from the time the same was entered, to wit, January 19, 1920. The judgment is not void upon its face, and hence was not subject to motion to vacate the same upon that ground. Much of the material relied upon by appellant upon its motion to vacate was irrelevant upon the issue presented by the motion, i. e., the invalidity of the judgment upon its face, although it might possibly have value in a direct attack upon the judgment in a proceeding in equity to set the same aside.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KEMPLEY et al. (Cr. 3124.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1928.

1. Grand jury ⇨34—Special counsel, appointed by Attorney General, had power to appear before and assist grand jury to same extent district attorney might have done had he not been disqualified (Pol. Code, § 472).

Where Attorney General appointed special counsel under Pol. Code, § 472, to assist in investigation and prosecution of charges against district attorney and his assistant, special counsel had authority to appear before and assist grand jury to same extent that district attorney might have done had he not been disqualified.

2. District and prosecuting attorneys ⇨2(4)—Special counsel for state, in prosecution of district attorney and assistant, who assumed and exercised duties of public officer under authorized appointment, was officer de facto, though not taking oath of office (Pol. Code, §§ 472, 904).

Where Attorney General appointed special counsel to assist in investigation and prosecution of charges against district attorney and assistant, under Pol. Code, § 472, but special counsel did not take oath of office following appointment, as required by section 904, but he did actually assume and exercise duties of public officer under authorized appointment, he was at least an officer de facto.

3. Indictment and Information ⇨137(2)—Bias of grand juror is not ground for setting aside an indictment (Pen. Code, §§ 894, 895, as amended in 1911).

Under Pen. Code, §§ 894, 895, as amended in 1911, and section 995, relating to grand juries, bias of grand juror is not ground for setting aside an indictment.

4. Criminal law ⇨511(1)—More is required by way of corroboration of accomplice's testimony than mere suspicion (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Under Pen. Code, § 1111, more is required by way of corroboration of testimony of accomplice than mere suspicion.

5. Criminal law ⚡510—Statute relating to corroborating evidence is mandatory, and conviction cannot stand unless accomplice's testimony is properly corroborated (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Pen. Code, § 1111, relating to evidence corroborating testimony of accomplice, is mandatory, and conviction cannot stand unless testimony of accomplice is corroborated in accordance with standards laid down by courts in interpretation of statute.

6. Criminal law ⚡511(1)—Accomplice's testimony must be eliminated from case in determining sufficiency of corroborating evidence.

Testimony of accomplice must be eliminated from case for purpose of determining sufficiency of corroborating evidence.

7. Criminal law ⚡511(3)—Where circumstances are consistent with innocence of accused, there is no corroboration (Pen. Code, § 1111).

Where circumstances, when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with innocence of accused, there is no corroboration of accomplice's testimony required by Pen. Code, § 1111.

8. Criminal law ⚡511(2)—Corroborating evidence held insufficient to connect district attorney and assistant with commission of offense of accepting bribe (Pen. Code, § 1111).

In prosecution of district attorney and his assistant for accepting bribe, corroborating evidence held insufficient to connect defendants with commission of offense, as required by Pen. Code, § 1111.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Edwin F. Hahn and S. M. Marsh, Judges.

Chester C. Kempley and another were convicted of soliciting and accepting a bribe, and they appeal. Reversed.

Superseding opinion in 265 P. 310.

Dempster McKee, Adam Thompson, Edgar A. Luce, and Gordon Thompson, all of San Diego, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and W. A. Sloane, E. J. Kelly, and Fred A. Steiner, all of San Diego, for the People.

SHENK, J. The defendants, Chester C. Kempley and Guy Selleck, district attorney and assistant district attorney, respectively, of the county of San Diego, were charged and convicted of the crime of soliciting and accepting a bribe. They appeal from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

On October 7, 1926, the grand jury of said county returned an indictment charging the defendants in two counts. The first count charged that on or about the 20th day of March, 1925, in said county of San Diego, the defendants, executive officers of the county, did "wilfully, unlawfully, feloniously and corruptly ask for and offer to receive of one William R. Johnson," a bribe in the sum of $40,000; that at said time and place the defendants represented to said William R. Johnson that if he would pay to them the sum of $40,000 they "would withhold true evidence from the trial jury during the trial of the case of the People of the State of California against Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern, Mrs. Mae Johnson and Dan McGory, then and there pending" in the superior court in and for said San Diego county; that the defendants "would withhold said true evidence and prevent the same from being presented to said trial jury during the trial" of said cause, in the following particulars: (1) That they would get possession of two certain suits of clothes belonging to said Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern, found in the attic of the house of said defendants at 2735 San Marcos street, and would alter and cause to be made smaller said two suits of clothes so that when said Johnson and McGovern should try them on during the trial they would not fit said defendants; (2) that the defendants, as further reason for being paid said sum of $40,000, represented that they would obtain possession of a certain knife found stuck in the breast of the deceased, George McMahon, and prevent said knife from being introduced in evidence at the trial of said Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern; (3) that for the same consideration the defendants herein would not introduce in evidence an admission made by Thomas A. Johnson to the San Diego police department that he was the owner of the gun used to crack the skull of said George McMahon; (4) that the defendants herein, as a further reason why they should be paid the sum of $40,000, stated and represented to William R. Johnson that they would cause the court to make an order directing that all the exhibits introduced in evidence during the trial be delivered to the attorneys for Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern, and that Mrs. Mae Johnson and Dan McGory, co-defendants with said Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern, would never be convicted in the event that Mrs. Mae Johnson and Dan McGory were apprehended and placed upon trial; (5) that when the defendants herein were asking said William R. Johnson for said $40,000 they represented to him that they had evidence in their possession sufficient to hang the said Thomas A. Johnson, Hugh McGovern, Mrs. Mae Johnson, and Dan McGory and that unless the $40,000 were paid those four persons would certainly be hanged for the murder of George McMahon.

In the second count it was charged that the defendants Kempley and Selleck carried out the alleged corrupt agreement in all respects, except that it is not charged in the second count that the knife found in the breast of the deceased was not introduced in evidence at the trial. It was further charged in the second count that upon their trial the defendants Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern were acquitted and that the defendants herein received said sum of $40,000 in consideration of the carrying out of their alleged corrupt agreement; that the defendants herein represented the people at said trial and that after the verdict of acquittal and in order to prevent the trial and conviction of Mrs. Mae Johnson and Dan McGory, they made written application to said court for an order releasing the exhibits in said cause to the attorneys for the defendants Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern.

The defendants herein were arraigned on October 11, 1926, and at that time moved to quash the indictment on the grounds: (1) That said indictment was not found, indorsed, nor presented as prescribed by the Penal Code, in that it was not voted, passed upon, nor concurred in by 12 grand jurors; (2) that names of witnesses examined by, or whose depositions were read before, the grand jury were not inserted at the foot of the indictment nor indorsed thereon; and (3) that certain persons were permitted to be present during sessions of the grand jury when the charges embraced in the indictment were under consideration other than the persons permitted to be present under the provisions of section 925 of the Penal Code, and particularly that one Richard Kittrelle, one Mrs. Firman, and one Fleming were permitted so unlawfully to be present. Testimony respecting grounds (2) and (3) was taken by the court. Upon such evidence the court concluded that the motion was unsupported on those two grounds.

[1] Only one point need be commented upon in this connection. When it appeared that the conduct of the district attorney and his assistant under the criminal laws of the state was to be under investigation by the grand jury, the Attorney General was requested to appoint special counsel to assist in the investigation and prosecution of the charges made against those public officials. Under date of August 19, 1926, the Attorney General in writing appointed Richard Kittrelle as special counsel to conduct the investigation and prosecution in the place and stead of the district attorney. This appointment was made under the authority of section 472 of the Political Code, which provides that—

"Whenever a district attorney in any county of this state shall, for any reason, become disqualified from conducting any criminal prosecution within such county, the attorney-general may employ special counsel to conduct such prosecution."

It has not been and is not now contended by the defendants that they were not disqualified in the matter of the investigation of their own conduct. Beyond question the Political

Code, § 472, vested in the Attorney General the power to appoint special counsel, and when appointed the authority of the special counsel would be coextensive with that of the district attorney had the latter not been disqualified (see Sloane v. Hammond, 81 Cal. App. 590, 254 P. 648), including the authority to appear before and assist the grand jury to the same extent that the district attorney might have done had he not been disqualified (see State ex rel. Nolan v. District Court, 22 Mont. 25, 55 P. 916; State ex rel. Miller v. District Court, 19 N. D. 819, 124 N. W. 417, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 935).

[2] Mr. Kittrelle did not take an oath of office following his appointment as special counsel. It is contended that his appointment was therefore a nullity for failure to comply with the requirements of section 904 of the Political Code, which provides that "before any officer enters on the duties of his office, he must take and subscribe" to the oath of office. But he actually assumed and exercised the duties of a public officer under an authorized appointment, and as such was at least an officer de facto. People v. Turner, 85 Cal. 432, 24 P. 857; People v. Sehorn, 116 Cal. 503, 48 P. 495; People v. Cradlebaugh, 24 Cal. App. 489, 141 P. 943.

[3] To sustain their first ground of the motion to quash the indictment, viz., that it was not found, indorsed, and presented by the concurrence of 12 grand jurors, the defendants offered to prove that prior to the return of the indictment members of the grand jury who subsequently voted to return the indictment personally interviewed persons apart from regular sessions of the grand jury concerning the charges under investigation; that certain of the grand jurors from their private funds employed detectives to obtain evidence; that with the sanction and approval of certain members of the grand jury offers of aid were extended to Agnes Keller, a convicted felon, to assist her in being released on parole or otherwise if she would testify before the grand jury; and that two grand jurors, before they had heard any evidence, stated that they were going to indict the district attorney. The court sustained an objection to such offer, and it is argued that if proved such facts would serve to disqualify a sufficient number of grand jurors, so that the indictment was not found "with the concurrence of at least twelve grand jurors," as required by section 940 of the Penal Code.

It was in evidence that at least 14 grand jurors voted to return the indictment. It also appears that the grand jury was properly formed in the first instance. The offer of proof can, therefore, be taken in no other light than as a challenge to the individual members of the grand jury on the ground of bias or prejudice.

Prior to 1911, section 896, of the Penal Code provided for a challenge to an individual grand juror on the ground that "a state of mind exists on his part in reference to the case, or to either party, which will prevent him from acting impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the party challenging." In 1911 that section and the succeeding sections (sections 897-901), relating to challenges to the panel and to the individual grand jurors, were repealed, and section 895, which previously provided for a challenge to the panel, was amended to read:

"No challenge shall be made or allowed to the panel from which the grand jury is drawn, nor to an individual grand juror, unless when made by the court for want of qualification, as presented in the next preceding section."

The preceding section, 894, as amended in 1911, provides:

"Before accepting a person drawn as a grand juror, the court must be satisfied that such person is duly qualified to act as such juror, but when drawn and found qualified he must be accepted unless the court, on the application of the juror and before he is sworn, shall excuse him from such service for any of the reasons prescribed in Chapter 1, Title 3, Part I (secs. 190-254), of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The reasons for excusing persons from grand jury service as prescribed by sections 190-254 of the Code of Civil Procedure have no pertinency here. Section 907 of the Penal Code, which, with the three succeeding sections, had provided for a special grand jury, was re-enacted in 1911 so as to provide:

"Before considering a charge against any person, the foreman of the grand jury shall state to those present the matter to be considered and the person to be charged with an offense in connection therewith, and direct any member of the grand jury who has a state of mind in reference to the case or to either party which will prevent him from acting impartially and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the party to retire. Any violation of this section by the foreman or any member of the grand jury is punishable by the court as a contempt."

The provisions of the foregoing section were not complied with; but the neglect or failure of the foreman to comply therewith is not made a ground for setting aside the indictment by section 995 of the Penal Code, and section 907 contains within itself the penalty for the violation of its provisions. The first subdivision of said section 995 provides that the indictment must be set aside on the motion of the defendant if "it is not found, indorsed, and presented as prescribed in this Code." It is under this subdivision that the point now under discussion was made by the defendants. By its terms this subdivision refers to the portions of the Code which prescribe the mode of finding, indorsing, and presenting an indictment. People v. Colby, 54 Cal. 37. Prior to 1911 an indictment could be set aside upon any ground which would have been good ground for challenge either to the panel or to an individual grand juror on account of disqualification for bias. See People v. Bright, 157 Cal. 662, 109 P. 33; People v. Landis, 139 Cal. 426, 73 P. 153; 14 Cal. Jur. 76. But in that year the provision of the Code for the setting aside of the indictment on the ground of the bias of the grand juror was abolished. People v. Schmidt, 33 Cal. App. 426, 165 P. 555. In view of the change in the law in 1911, it must be held that since that time the bias of a grand juror has not been a ground for setting aside an indictment. It may be noted that at the same session of the Legislature at which the Code rules were so radically changed, a constitutional amendment was submitted to the people of the state to add section 4½ to article 6 of our fundamental law and which was ratified on October 10, 1911. The theory of the change in the law in that year would appear to have been that the return of an indictment should be the means of bringing a person accused of crime before the court for a trial of the issues more nearly as an alternative to the method of holding a defendant to answer after a preliminary examination, and that irregularities attending the procedural steps should not void the proceeding provided the defendant was accorded a fair and impartial trial on the merits. We conclude that the trial court was not in error in refusing to set aside the indictment herein on any of the grounds of the defendants' motion.

The remaining contentions in support of the appeal are that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and that the court committed prejudicial error in admitting and rejecting certain evidence and in giving and refusing certain instructions. As to the insufficiency of the evidence, it is pointed out that the evidence, aside from that of Agnes Keller, the chief witness for the prosecution and an admitted accomplice, was as consistent with innocence as with guilt and that the evidence of the accomplice was not corroborated sufficiently to connect the defendants with the commission of the crime as required by section 1111 of the Penal Code. These contentions seem to require a brief review of the evidence.

On or about the 1st day of February, 1925, Thomas A. Johnson, with his wife, Mae Johnson, and their child, Hugh McGovern, George McMahon, and Dan McGory, Mrs. Johnson's father, moved from Chicago to San Diego to reside. They lived about in hotels for a time and until Johnson purchased a house on San Marcos avenue in San Diego, which the six persons thereafter occupied as their home. On the evening of March 1, 1925, the body of a man was found on a hillside in a new subdivision north of the San Diego river. The man had been shot, his skull had been crushed, and the blade of a pocket knife, about 2½ inches long, was imbedded in his chest in the region of the heart. A rag and some towels were found on or near the body identical in marking with similar articles later found in the San Marcos avenue house. Upon going to that house the police officers found two suits of clothes in the attic with human blood spots thereon. The bathroom was bespotted with blood and bloody rags and towels were found in and around the premises. The body was identified as that of George McMahon. As a result of the police investigation, Johnson and his wife, Hugh McGovern, and Dan McGory were charged with murder. Johnson and McGovern were apprehended. Mrs. Johnson and Dan McGory left San Diego with the child about 11 o'clock on the night of February 28th, proceeded by automobile to Los Angeles, and from there disappeared to parts unknown. They were never apprehended. Johnson and McGovern were arraigned and entered pleas of not guilty. They were at first represented by attorney Arthur Dorn. Later on a brother of Thomas A. Johnson, W. R. Johnson by name, appeared in San Diego, having come from Chicago in his brother's interest. The law firm of Sample & Hardin was substituted in the place and stead of Arthur Dorn as the attorneys for the defendants in said action through an arrangement made by W. R. Johnson at Sacramento with E. P. Sample, a member of the firm of Sample & Hardin, and while Sample, as a state senator, was in attendance upon a session of the Legislature. After the adjournment of the Legislature, and at the instance of Sample & Hardin, the court made an order for the taking, at Chicago, of depositions on oral interrogatories of witnesses on behalf of the defendants Johnson and McGovern. The time for the taking of such depositions was agreed upon between the district attorney and the attorneys for the defendants, and Mr. Kempley arranged to be present at the taking thereof. Accordingly, he left San Diego about June 2d. He had with him his wife and his small son. He arrived in Chicago on Friday, June 5th, and the depositions were taken on Monday, June 8th. On Sunday afternoon, June 7th, Kempley and his wife and boy attended a baseball game at Chicago as the guests of Senator Sample. W. R. Johnson was also a member of the party as a guest of Senator Sample. After the depositions were taken, Mr. Kempley and his wife and boy departed for Wisconsin to visit Mr. Kempley's parents and other relatives. Thereafter the Kempleys visited eastern cities and returned to California, going directly to Santa Cruz to attend the state convention of the District Attorneys' Association. At this convention Mr. Kempley was elected president of the association. At the conclusion of the convention, he left for San Diego, arriving there on Sunday, June 28th. The Johnson-McGovern murder case was on for trial and went to trial on the following day. Mr. Kempley and Mr. Selleck participated in that trial, each engaging in the examination and cross-examination of witnesses and in the argument to the jury. Messrs. Sample & Hardin represented the defendants. The trial extended over a period of several days, and resulted in a verdict of acquittal of both defendants on July 3d.

On June 11, 1925, Agnes Keller was arrested on a charge of grand larceny issued out of Mr. Kempley's office. Shortly after the conclusion of the Johnson-McGovern murder case, these defendants caused the case against Agnes Keller to be brought on for trial. At the first trial the jury disagreed but on a retrial she was found guilty as charged, sentenced to the state prison at San Quentin, and in due time was delivered to the warden. Just when the investigation of the charges against these defendants herein was commenced does not clearly appear. Prominent in the investigation was Mrs. M. E. Firman, a detective of the Firman Detective Service of Los Angeles, and her assistant, Mr. Freeman. Mrs. Firman interviewed Agnes Keller in the penitentiary, and as a result of this interview Agnes Keller appeared before the grand jury of San Diego county. Richard Kittrelle was appointed special counsel by the Attorney General on August 19, 1926. At that time the defendant Kempley was a candidate to succeed himself at the primary election held later in the same month. The indictment herein was returned on October 7, 1926. After preliminary motions had been disposed of the cause came on for trial on November 29th, resulting in a verdict of guilty as to both defendants on both counts on December 16, 1926.

Agnes Keller was taken from San Quentin to San Diego and was the principal witness for the prosecution at the trial. She testified that she had been the owner of the Sonora Bar at Tijuana, Mexico, and had been the proprietress of a house of assignation in San Diego; that prior to January, 1923, in which month Mr. Kempley assumed his duties as district attorney, she had appeared before Mr. Kempley for preliminary examination and was held to answer on a felony charge at a time when Mr. Kempley was justice of the peace and that she had known him since that time; that in 1923 she was the proprietress of the Dearborn Hotel in San Diego, which she conducted as a hotel, a house of assignation, and a gambling house; that during that time the defendants herein, as district attorney and assistant district attorney, threatened her with red light abatement proceedings; that she then employed Mr. Kempley to assist her in obtaining a transfer of the lease of the premises to a party satisfactory to the public authorities and paid him for his services. The record shows that the red light abatement proceedings were actually brought by the defendants herein; that subsequently Agnes Keller vacated the Dearborn Hotel; and that in the immediately subsequent years she was interested in horse racing and was a prominent figure in the San Diego and Tijuana underworld.

She further testified that in the year 1924 she employed Mr. Selleck as her attorney in connection with some legal difficulties she was having with her ten year old son at Oakland, and that prior to the murder of George McMahon she and the defendants had been "very friendly"; that early in March, 1925, the defendant Selleck called her to his office and asked her if she wanted to make some money, to which she replied that she did; that the defendant Selleck, in the presence of defendant Kempley, told her to go to Coroner Kelley and make inquiry about a diamond stud and a ring and $3,000 that was supposed to have belonged to George McMahon; that she should also go to the office of Arthur Dorn, try to get in touch with W. R. Johnson, and tell the latter that the charges against the four defendants in the murder case were very serious and that it would take $10,000 or $20,000 apiece for the two defendants herein to save the defendants in the murder case from the gallows; that she met W. R. Johnson at Mr. Dorn's office and had a talk with him, and also with Mr. Dorn, after which she related the conversation she had had with them to Selleck; that she told Selleck that Johnson said he first wanted to get possession of the knife that was found stuck in McMahon's chest, as it belonged to his brother and had been involved in a Chicago murder case that had just been "fixed"; that Johnson wanted other evidence, and particularly a gun that had been found in the San Marcos avenue house; that Johnson stated that he was willing to spend any amount of money, but that when $20,000 apiece was named he said such a sum was too much and that the murder case in Chicago that "had just been squared up didn't cost one-half that much money"; that the defendant Selleck instructed her to tell Johnson that it would not do to have Dorn in the case and that the only man who should handle the case was Sample; that she later introduced W. R. Johnson to Kempley and Selleck in the latter's office; that at that time W. R. Johnson agreed to put up $40,000 if Kempley would go to Chicago with him and receive it after the defendants Johnson and McGovern had been acquitted of the murder charge and if the exhibits in the case should be released and turned over to him; that a few days later she told Kempley that W. R. Johnson had given her $500 as expense money and that she thereupon gave Kempley $200 or $300 out of it; that about the 6th or 7th of March she handed to the defendant Kempley an additional $500 in the defendant Selleck's office; that in her presence W. R. Johnson handed to Selleck a $1,000 bill in the latter's office, saying: "You better take this for expense money"; that about the latter part of March the defendant Kempley told her that he was intending to go to Chicago and arrange to have the money put up there and for her not to worry, that he would take care of her; that after the defendant Kempley returned from Chicago, she talked with him in Selleck's office, Selleck being present, and that at that time Kempley said to her "that he had received the money all right"; that she then asked Kempley if he had delivered the $3,000 to McMahon's sister in Chicago, and he said "No," that Selleck had it; that before Kempley went to Chicago she talked to Selleck about the bloody suits of clothes that had been found in the attic of the San Marcos avenue house, and that Selleck said he thought it would be best to have them cleaned up a little, have some of the blood taken off and have them shortened or shrunk; that he could not have them exhibited to the jury in their then condition unless Ivan Rice, a friend of his, could get on the jury; that Selleck said that if Ivan Rice was on the jury the jury could be tampered with in some way; that nothing was done with reference to cleaning or altering the suits of clothes until after the return of Kempley from Chicago, when, in Selleck's office, Kempley told her it would help a whole lot "if they were fixed, some"; that thereafter Selleck called her up and told her to meet him at a drug store at Fifth and B streets, which she did; that she then told Selleck in effect that she would not have the clothes fixed until she was sure that W. R. Johnson had put up the money; that she later called Johnson at the Biltmore Hotel in Los Angeles; that Johnson came to San Diego and went with her to the district attorney's office, where they met and talked to Kempley and Selleck; that when all of said four persons were present she asked Johnson how much money had been put up, and that Johnson had replied that $40,000 had been put up in Chicago for Kempley, and $10,000 for Sample in the First National Bank of San Diego, and that $1,500 had been given to Arthur Dorn; that she then said that the suits of clothes would have to be tampered with, and, "of course, it falls to me to do it"; that Johnson then said to Selleck, "When you sign over in the court all the evidence to me there will never be any come-back on the wife and the father"; that this conversation took place a couple of days after the return of Kempley from Chicago; that the next day after said conversation Selleck called her and asked her to meet him at Sixth and C streets in front of Marstons, which she did, and at this meeting Selleck handed to her a bundle containing the suits of clothes, wrapped in a newspaper; that she took the clothes to her house, sent one suit "to be scoured and kind of gone over"; that this suit was returned to her by the cleaner but it did not look as if it had been cleaned and pressed, "just kind of scoured, some of the blood taken out of it"; that she shrank the other suit herself by soaking it in gasoline over night; that she returned the two suits to Selleck at his office, at which time he said he did not want the suits to fit the defendants Johnson and McGovern, like they did when they were tried on at the police station, but as they were returned to him they did not appear to be in a satisfactory condition.

The defendants took the stand in their own defense and denied in toto that they had said or done any of the things attributed to them by Agnes Keller, except that Selleck admitted having transacted some legal business for her at Oakland and Kempley admitted having made the trip to Chicago.

On cross-examination, and otherwise, Agnes Keller was impeached in every way known to the law. On her direct examination she announced her own infamy as the keeper of a house of prostitution and gambling in San Diego, and as the proprietress of a bar at Tijuana. She had been twice convicted of a felony, once in Kansas City for larceny of the person and again in San Diego for grand larceny. Numerous witnesses testified that her reputation in San Diego for truth, veracity, and integrity was extremely bad. The prosecution concedes that the defendant Kempley left San Diego about the first of June and did not return until Sunday, the day before the commencement of the trial of the murder case. Yet Agnes Keller testified that she talked with Selleck in the presence of Kempley a few days before the commencement of the trial about the alteration of the two suits of clothes. By reason of her criminal record, her bad character, and her conceded inconsistent statements on the stand, the law, in its "solicitation for the protection of the citizen, watches with scrutiny" her testimony. People v. Williams, 18 Cal. 187, 191. Bearing upon the corrupt motive which she might entertain against these defendants, it appears from the testimony of the chief matron and an assistant matron at San Quentin that Agnes Keller stated just prior to her departure for San Diego to appear before the grand jury that if she went to San Diego to testify against some county officials she would not have to come back to prison, and that Mrs. Firman had promised her that if she would testify against them she would get a new trial. Witness Fossler also testified that Agnes Keller had stated to him in September, 1926, in San Diego, that she had been double-crossed and that "something very big" was about to transpire. It will be remembered that these defendants had prosecuted her and had brought about her conviction on October 6, 1925, on the grand larceny charge. Abundant reasons for her hope of reward, if she should testify against these defendants, and for her resentment against them, are manifest from the record.

The foregoing testimony of Agnes Keller, her impeachment, and her motive have been adverted to, not for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion that her story might not be believed by the jury, but for the purpose of indicating that it is our duty to focus the spotlight on other evidence in the record which the prosecution claims measures up to the standard of corroborative evidence demanded by our law. In pursuance of this purpose, and having in mind the rules governing the functions of the trial court and jury and the powers of a reviewing court, it will be assumed that the testimony of Agnes Keller, if so corroborated, was sufficient to sustain the verdict. It is earnestly contended by the defendants that the story of Agnes Keller is inherently improbable and unworthy of belief as a matter of law. Considered in all of its dips, spurs and angles, there is much force in the contention. But we are disposed to resolve this point against the defendants for the purpose of the disposition of this appeal and proceed to a consideration of the question of the corroboration of the testimony of Agnes Keller, who, by her own testimony, the proper ruling of the trial court with reference thereto, and the concessions of the prosecution, was in the position of an accomplice.

[4, 5] The law of this state on the question of corroboration is now well settled. The statutory rule is found in section 1111 of the Penal Code, which provides:

"A conviction cannot be had upon the testimony of an accomplice unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offence: and the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offence or the circumstances thereof."

This Code rule has been the same since its adoption as a part of the Criminal Practice Act in 1851. In the early case of People v. Ames, 39 Cal. 403, it was said that the purpose of the statute "was to prohibit a conviction, unless there was some evidence, entirely exclusive of that of the accomplice, which, of itself, and without the aid of the accomplice, tended to raise at least a suspicion of the guilt of the accused." In the later case of People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480, this court was at pains to point out that the language of People v. Ames, supra, should not be taken as a correct statement of the rule, and that it was not intended to lay down a rule "that if the corroborating evidence sufficed to raise merely a suspicion of the defendant's guilt, and nothing more, that it would be a sufficient corroboration within the meaning of section 1111." People v. Thompson, supra, page 482. In People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 480, 24 P. 32, it was said:

"But although more is required by way of corroboration than to raise a mere suspicion (see People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480), yet the corroborating evidence is sufficient if it, of itself, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense, although it is slight, and entitled, when standing by itself, to but little consideration."

That more is required by way of corroboration than mere suspicion is firmly imbedded in our law. People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 473, 229 P. 40; People v. Kelly, 69 Cal. App. 558, 570, 231 P. 767; People v. Taylor, 70 Cal. App. 239, 244, 232 P. 998; People v. Jones (Cal. App.) 262 P. 361; 8 Cal. Jur. 178, 180.

The question of how much more than a mere suspicion is required in order to constitute corroboration has been answered by many cases in declaring further that—

"Corroborative evidence is insufficient where it merely casts a grave suspicion upon the accused." People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, 470, 154 P. 317; People v. Woodcock, 52 Cal. App. 412, 417, 199 P. 565; People v. Janssen, 74 Cal. App. 402, 407, 240 P. 799.

The Code section is mandatory (People v. Allison, 200 Cal. 404, 253 P. 318), and a conviction cannot stand unless the testimony of the accomplice is corroborated in accordance with the standards laid down by the courts in the interpretation of the statute. "The court has no discretion in the matter, but is bound to apply the statute indiscriminately to all cases wherever an accomplice appears as a witness, and the State's case depends solely upon his uncorroborated testimony." People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, 469, 154 P. 317, 318. If the testimony of the accomplice is not sufficiently corroborated, the conviction of the accused is wholly wanting in a legal foundation to support it. People v. Viets, 79 Cal. App. 576, 587, 250 P. 588.

With the foregoing principles of law in mind, we now turn to the record to discover in what respects, if at all, the testimony of Agnes Keller was sufficiently corroborated. By the testimony of other witnesses numerous facts were proved. It was in evidence that in company with Arthur Dorn, W. R. Johnson went to the office of the district attorney shortly after the return of the indictments against Johnson and McGovern and there met Mr. Kempley; that the purpose of his going to interview the district attorney was to find out if the trial of his brother could not be avoided because of the effect even of a trial on the mother of the two Johnsons. It was also shown that Arthur Dorn had been substituted out of the murder case and that Sample & Hardin had become attorneys of record for the defendants in that case. Senator Sample, as a witness for the people, testified that at his invitation Kempley and his family had attended a ball game in Chicago at which W. R. Johnson also was present as one of Sample's guests. Kempley also testified that he was present on that occasion. Kempley also testified that he made an ineffectual attempt while in Chicago to interview a sister of McMahon who had theretofore indicated a desire to see him. It also appeared by undisputed evidence that Kempley was absent from San Diego during the month of June; that he attended the district attorneys' convention at Santa Cruz during the latter part of that month; and that he did not return to San Diego until the day before the trial of the murder case. The record in the murder case was introduced in evidence. The trial resulted in an acquittal of the defendants therein after a five days' trial. It also appeared that Ivan Rice was a member of the jury in that case and was the foreman who signed the verdict of acquittal. It also appeared that a few days after the return of the verdict the defendant Selleck consented in writing to the release of the exhibits in that case at a time when Mae Johnson and Dan McGory were still at large.

[6-8] On the foregoing independent proof in the main the prosecution contends that the defendants have been sufficiently connected with the crimes of soliciting and receiving a bribe to satisfy the requirements of the law. The entire voluminous record in the case has been read with care, and the extended briefs and arguments presented by able counsel on both sides have been carefully considered to the end that it may properly be declared whether the judgment of conviction may stand. Upon a consideration of the entire record we are compelled to state that when the testimony of the accomplice is eliminated from the case, as it must be, for the purpose of determining the question of corroboration (People v. Robbins, supra; 8 Cal. Jur. 178, and cases cited), the other evidence in the case has no substantial connection with any crime, is as consistent with innocence as with guilt, and that it is questionable whether it raises even a suspicion of guilt. It is significant that neither Kempley, nor Selleck, nor the district attorney's office were ever mentioned in any conversation which Agnes Keller had with any outside witness. So that the corroboration must rest alone on circumstantial evidence. No essential element of bribery may be adduced from the fact that W. R. Johnson with his attorney called on Kempley at the latter's office soon after the return of the indictment in the murder case in an endeavor to ascertain if the trial of the murder case might be avoided. If a district attorney is to be subjected even to the suspicion of bribery every time an attorney or others interested in the defense interviews him, he is indeed in a precarious situation. Nor does a suspicion of bribery arise by reason of the substitution of Sample & Hardin for Arthur Dorn as counsel for the defendants. The record shows without conflict that Dorn was in poor health, verging on a nervous breakdown, at the time of the substitution, and that thereafter he was unable to attend to his business for a considerable length of time. A circumstance much stressed by the prosecution as tending to connect the defendant Kempley with the crime of bribery is the fact that he attended the baseball game in Chicago in company with Senator Sample and W. R. Johnson. It is undoubtedly true that social intercourse between opposing counsel during pending litigation is often viewed as a suspicious circumstance, especially by those interested in the litigation. Proper regard for the proprieties may well prompt the recognition of the precept to avoid the "appearance of evil," yet such social intercourse, within proper bounds, is not inconsistent with innocence and may not rise to the dignity of evidence of corruption. The presence of W. R. Johnson at the baseball party has seemed to accentuate the claim of the prosecution; but the entire incident falls short of proof that the defendant Kempley was engaged with Senator Sample and W. R. Johnson in the nefarious scheme of "throwing" the murder case by the soliciting and the acceptance of a bribe of $40,000 or any other sum. The record shows that a sister of the murdered man was in Chicago at the time of the homicide; that she communicated with the police department of the city of San Diego, offering assistance in the prosecution of the guilty parties; that before he left San Diego Kempley examined the police file and took the address of the sister; that when in Chicago at the time of the taking of the depositions he endeavored to locate her but was misdirected as to the location of her address; and that upon his return to Chicago he telegraphed her to meet him at his hotel, but that she failed to appear before the departure of his train. There was no showing that the sister knew anything whatsoever of the circumstances attending the commission of the crime of murder or had any other information that would be helpful to the prosecution. Stress is laid upon the fact that Kempley did not return to San Diego until the day before the commencement of the murder trial, and the inference is attempted to be drawn that he was neglectful of his duties as a prosecuting officer to the extent of suggesting that he was corruptly caused to remain away. That he was interested in the affairs of the District Attorneys' Association of the state and had good reason to attend the convention at Santa Cruz in so far as his official duties would permit is evidenced by the fact that while in Santa Cruz he was elected president of the association. He testified that before he left San Diego he placed the preparation for trial of the murder case in the hands of his assistant, Selleck, who, it is conceded by all, was competent to discharge that important duty. The record in the murder case has been read. The evidence presented and the arguments of both Kempley and Selleck to the jury disclose that the case was presented with reasonable diligence. There was abundant evidence to convict the defendants then on trial and more directly pointing to the guilt of Thomas A. Johnson and Hugh McGovern than to the guilt of Mae Johnson and Dan McGory. The judge who presided at the trial testified in the present case that in his opinion, based wholly on the evidence produced at the former trial, the acquittal of said defendants resulted in a miscarriage of justice. From a reading of the evidence in that case we are in accord with the conclusion of the trial judge. It is true that if the defendants in that case had been convicted the defendants herein might nevertheless be guilty of bribery, but the fact that the jury in that case failed to perform its duty does not rise to the dignity of a suspicion that Kempley and Selleck were bribed to thwart the prosecution. The unsatisfactory state of the record with reference to the alleged alteration of the two suits of clothes renders it unnecessary to dwell further upon that phase of the case.

The point mainly relied upon by the prosecution to connect the defendant Selleck with the commission of the alleged crime is the fact that said defendant signed a consent that the exhibits in the murder case be released at a time when the cause was still pending against Mae Johnson and Dan McGory. The clerk in the department of the judge who tried that case testified that a few days after the verdict of acquittal Senator Sample appeared before the court and made a motion that the exhibits be released; that the judge instructed him (the clerk) to prepare the order of release and secure the consent of the district attorney's office; that he prepared the order in his own handwriting designating the exhibits as Nos. 1 to 34, inclusive, without further describing them, and that he then took the document to Selleck's office and there secured the latter's signature thereto. The defendant Selleck's testimony is in accord with that of the clerk. The trial judge testified that, according to his recollection, Senator Sample made the motion for the release of the exhibits; that he requested Sample to secure the consent of the district attorney's office; and that thereupon Selleck appeared in his courtroom and consented to the release. This discrepancy in the testimony is deemed of no great significance. The trial judge further testified that he attached no importance to the release of the exhibits; that he believed that the two persons who were guilty had been prosecuted; and that if a motion to dismiss the case as to the other two defendants had been made he would have granted the same and would have thought the motion not at all unusual under the circumstances. The exhibits consisted of a wardrobe trunk containing men's clothing, chairs and rugs from the house on San Marcos avenue, two guns, and numerous other exhibits, all of which were claimed by the defendants in the murder case. A few exhibits were also released to them which were not claimed by them, but this is deemed of no importance. The knife and the gun which, according to Agnes Keller's testimony, were of such controlling importance to W. R. Johnson, were turned over to others, the knife to a deputy district attorney and the gun to a member of the police department. The fact that Ivan Rice served on the jury in the murder case cannot of itself be considered a suspicious circumstance tending to connect the defendants herein with the commission of the alleged crime of bribery. There was no evidence at all concerning any alleged confession of the defendants in the murder case at the time of their arrest. Consequently there is nothing in the record to support the allegations of the indictment that the defendants herein agreed to suppress such alleged confession. Other minor points on the question of corroboration are made by the prosecution, but they are not deemed of sufficient importance to merit further notice.

As to all of the claimed corroborative evidence the prosecution must fail, for it does not even show "the commission of the offence or the circumstances thereof" within the rule laid down in section 1111 of the Penal Code, and must further fail under the well-established rule approved in People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, where, at page 470 (154 P. 317, 319), it is said that—

"Where the circumstances when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with the innocence of the accused, there is no corroboration, and a verdict of conviction thereon will be set aside."

Therefore, eliminating, as we must, the evidence of the accomplice in order to determine whether the other evidence is sufficient to connect the defendants with the crime of bribery, we conclude that such other evidence falls far short of the legal requirements to constitute corroboration.

There is much merit in the further contention of the defendants that the corpus delicti was not established. This is especially true with reference to the alleged crime of accepting the bribe of $40,000. The evidence, other than that of the accomplice, is entirely insufficient to establish it. The only testimony of Agnes Keller tending to prove the receipt of the $40,000 is her uncorroborated statement that the defendant Kempley admitted after his return from Chicago that the money had been put up. In People v. Vertrees, 169 Cal. 404, at page 408 (146 P. 890, 892) it is said:

"It is the settled law that no conviction may be had upon the extra-judicial confession of a defendant unless such confession be corroborated by proof aliunde of the corpus delicti, and while slight proof of the corpus delicti has in many cases been properly held a sufficient basis for the admission of such confessions, it is nevertheless true that the confessions and admissions of the defendant cannot be used to establish any necessary element for the commission of the crime."

In the present case there is no evidence of the receipt of the money by Kempley except his alleged admission that it was put up in Chicago. However, for the purpose of this appeal it has been assumed that the corpus delicti had been established as to both counts of the indictment.

Numerous other contentions are advanced by the defendants. It would unduly further prolong this opinion to discuss them. What has been said sufficiently disposes of the appeal.

The judgment and order as to each defendant are reversed.

BROUGHER et al. v. BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 12800.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 31, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations ☞621—Application for building permit may be denied on amendment of ordinance after filing application prohibiting permit.

Application for permit to construct building may be denied on amendment of ordinance after filing such application making it illegal to issue such permit, there being no opportunity for privilege to ripen into vested right, where no permit has been issued.

2. Municipal corporations ☞621—Application for permit to build hotel, filed when ordinances permitted hotel, held properly denied, where new ordinance enacted before final action on application prohibited permit.

Where applicant for permit to erect hotel filed application at time when ordinances of city permitted erection of hotel, but before final action was taken on application board of supervisors enacted ordinance limiting buildings in locality to 40 feet in height, applicants were not entitled to have permit applied for granted merely because they had complied with all laws effective at time application was filed.

3. Municipal corporations ☞60—Board of supervisors of San Francisco have plenary power to legislate in purely municipal matters subject to charter restrictions (Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8).

Under Const. art. 11, § 8, under which San Francisco adopted charter, and section 6, amended to permit cities and towns heretofore organized to enforce all laws respecting municipal affairs, subject to restrictions in charters, and amendment to charter in compliance with Constitution, board of supervisors of city of San Francisco were given plenary power to legislate in all purely municipal affairs, subject only to restrictions in its charter.

4. Municipal corporations ⇨65—Act requiring public hearing and publication before enactment of zoning ordinance merely prescribes procedure which was municipal affair (Enabling Act 1917, § 4).

Enabling Act 1917, § 4 (St. 1917, p. 1419; Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, Act 994), providing for hearing on report of planning commission recommending zoning districts, and providing for publication of ordinances before final action thereon, merely prescribes procedure to be followed by council in enactment of zoning ordinances, which procedure is municipal affair.

5. Municipal corporations ⇨79—Enabling Act prescribing method for enacting zoning ordinance held not applicable to city and county of San Francisco, and zoning ordinance complying with charter provisions, though not with enabling act, was not illegal (Enabling Act 1917; Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8).

Enabling Act of 1917, prescribing steps necessary to be taken by municipality in enacting zoning ordinance, has no application to city and county of San Francisco, which has availed itself of Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 8, by amending charter to authorize city to enforce all laws respecting municipal affairs subject only to restrictions in charter, and hence zoning ordinance complying with provisions of charter for enactment of ordinances was not illegal on ground that provisions of Enabling Act were not observed.

6. Municipal corporations ⇨601—San Francisco charter providing for beautification of public properties did not prohibit zoning ordinance affecting private property only (San Francisco City Charter, c. 2, art. 2, § 42).

San Francisco City Charter, c. 2, art. 2, § 42, providing for improvement and beautification of public properties of city, held not to prohibit enactment of zoning ordinances affecting private property only.

7. Municipal corporations ⇨591—San Francisco charter conferred on board of supervisors police power authorizing zoning ordinances.

City charter of San Francisco held to confer on board of supervisors all police power invested in said municipality by Constitution of state, under which city was authorized to enact zoning ordinances.

8. Mandamus ⇨172—Issues of fact necessary to determine reasonableness of building ordinance should be first determined in superior court, and not by Supreme Court on application for mandamus to compel issuance of building permit.

Where pleadings, in mandamus to compel board of public works to issue permit for construction of hotel, raised issues of fact to be determined by referee or court in determining validity of zoning ordinance limiting height of buildings to 40 feet, Supreme Court will not assume jurisdiction to settle issues on application for mandamus, but such issues should be first determined in superior court.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by E. B. Brougher and others, doing business under the firm name and style of the Moana Hotel Company, an unincorporated company, to compel the Board of Public Works of the City and County of San Francisco and others to issue a building permit. Motion to file amended petition and order to show cause dismissed without prejudice.

Joseph J. McShane and David K. Watkins, both of San Francisco, for petitioners.

John J. O'Toole and Walter A. Dold, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

Charles A. Christin, Otto K. Grau, and Alan C. Van Fleet, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

CURTIS, J. The petitioners are asking for a writ of mandamus against the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, requiring said board to grant the application of petitioners for a permit to construct upon certain real property belonging to petitioners, described in said application and situated in said city and county, a building to be used as a hotel. The original petition was filed herein on the 23d day of December, 1927, and was denied by this court. Thereupon petitioners asked for a rehearing of said matter. On January 26, 1928, the order denying said petition was vacated and set aside, and the matter was taken under advisement for further consideration. On February 2, 1928, this court made an order for the respondents to show cause before this court on April 3, 1928, why an alternative writ of mandate should not issue as prayed for in petitioners' original petition. On March 23, 1928, the respondents filed an answer to said petition. In the meantime the petitioners had filed an amendment to said petition, and the answer of respondents covered said amendment, as well as said original petition. The matter then came on for hearing on April 3, 1928, and by the agreement of the parties was continued to May 8, 1928. On this last-named date the matter was argued, and in addition thereto petitioners moved the court for leave to file an amended petition setting up more fully the grounds upon which they base their claim that ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), which will be hereafter more particularly referred to, is void by reason of its provisions being unreasonable, oppressive, arbitrary, and confiscatory. This motion was also argued and taken under consideration by the court. At that time it was announced by the court that the questions of law presented by the pleadings would be first considered and decided, and that at the time of their determination the court would further indicate its views as to the time and manner of disposing of the questions of fact made by the pleadings in their present form, and those that might arise in case the court granted petitioners' motion to file their amended petition. It was evident then, as it is now, that should the court in passing on these questions of law decide them in favor of the petitioners, then there would be no necessity of petitioners pressing their motion to file an amended petition. On the other hand, should the court's decision be adverse to petitioners upon these questions of law, then the court would pass upon their motion to file an amended petition, and make such other and additional order regarding the further consideration of this proceeding as to the court might appear proper.

The facts brought out by the pleadings herein are briefly stated as follows: Petitioners are the owners of certain real property in the city and county of San Francisco located within the second residential district of said municipality, as shown by its general zoning ordinance (Ordinance No. 5464). This ordinance permits the erection of hotels and apartment houses in said residential district. Petitioners made application to the board of public works of said municipality for a permit to erect in said district and upon their said real property a ten-story class A concrete hotel. Their application was in legal form, and in all other respects petitioners had complied with the ordinances of said municipality then in force prescribing the steps necessary to be taken in order to secure a permit to erect a building in said city and county. Their application was presented on the 18th day of April, 1927. The board of public works took no final action thereon until after the 9th day of May, 1927, on which day the mayor of said city and county approved ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), passed by the board of supervisors of said city and county on the 2d day of May, 1927. This ordinance provided that no building, with certain exceptions not necessary to mention here, exceeding 40 feet in height should be erected within a certain territory, described in said ordinance, and in which territory the real property of petitioners is located. By reason of the passage and enactment of this ordinance, the board of public works refused to grant said application of petitioners for a permit to erect a ten-story building upon their real property, and thereafter denied the same. In the adoption of Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), the board of supervisors followed the procedure provided by the charter of said city and county relative to the passage and enactment of ordinances generally, and failed to comply with the provisions of that certain act of the Legislature, entitled "An act to provide for the establishment within municipalities of districts or zones within which the use of property, height of improvements and requisite open spaces for light and ventilation of such buildings, may be regulated by ordinance," adopted May 31, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1419; Deering's General Laws of 1923, p. 369). This act is frequently referred to by the parties hereto as the "Enabling Act of 1917," and in our own reference to said act we will use the designation thereof adopted by said parties. Section 4 of said act is as follows:

"In municipalities having a city planning commission the council shall require such commission to recommend the boundaries of such districts and appropriate regulations and restrictions to be enforced therein. Such commission shall make a tentative report and hold public hearings thereon at such times and places as said council shall require before submitting its final report. Said council shall not hereafter determine the boundaries of any district or impose any regulations until after the final report of the city planning commission is filed with the city clerk. Upon receiving such final report said council shall afford persons particularly interested, and the general public, an opportunity to be heard, at a time and place to be specified in a notice of hearing to be published in a newspaper to be designated for that purpose. Said newspaper to be a local newspaper, if there be one, otherwise a newspaper of general circulation within the municipality, and to be published not less than three times in any daily, or not less than once in any other newspaper of general circulation within the municipality, and, within the week within which said meeting is to be held."

The charter of the city and county of San Francisco provides for a planning commission, and it is admitted that said municipality had such a planning commission at all the times mentioned in the petition, and that it was at all of said times performing its duties as prescribed by said charter, but that said Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) was not adopted as a result of any hearing had before said commission, or in pursuance of any report from it. The provision of the charter of said municipality prescribing the notice to be given of proposed ordinances before their final passage is that—

"Every ordinance * * * shall after its introduction, be published in the official newspaper * * * for at least five consecutive days (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) before the final action upon the same."

There is no contention but that this provision of the charter was followed and that all of its requirements were complied with in the adoption of Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series).

We will now proceed to a consideration of the questions of law appearing upon the face of the pleadings already referred to, and which may be stated as follows:

First. Having complied with every requirement of the ordinances of said city and county in effect at the time of the presentation of their application for such permit, are petitioners entitled as a matter of right to have granted to them the permit therein prayed for?

Second. Is Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), enacted by the board of supervisors of said city and county of San Francisco, invalid and void by reason of the failure of said board of supervisors to conform to the procedure provided by the "Enabling Act of 1917," in its enactment and adoption, or, in other words, is the "Enabling Act of 1917" applicable to the city and county of San Francisco?

As we have already seen, at the time petitioners filed with the board of public works their application to erect a ten-story hotel upon their said real property, the ordinances of said city and county of San Francisco permitted the erection thereon of a building of that character, but before final action had been taken upon petitioners' said application, the board of supervisors had enacted, or had attempted to enact, Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), which limited all buildings in the locality in said city and county where petitioners' said real property was located to 40 feet in height. A similar situation was shown in Miller v. Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479, except that in that case the board of public works had actually issued a permit to erect the building applied for by the plaintiffs therein, when it learned that the city council of Los Angeles contemplated the passage of a general zoning ordinance which might affect the right of said plaintiffs to erect the style of building described in their application in that part of the city wherein their property was located. The board of public works thereupon canceled and revoked said permit, and after said city council had enacted a general zoning ordinance, said board denied plaintiffs' application for the reason that to issue the same would be in violation of said general zoning ordinance. The point raised by petitioners herein was not raised by the plaintiffs in that action, and the opinion of the court expressly states:

"No point is made that the board has not the power to revoke a permit once it has been duly issued nor that the ordinance, if valid, may not operate retroactively to nullify a permit previously issued."

In view of this express statement of the court the case of Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra, may not be said to be a direct authority adverse to the contention of petitioners, yet it is hardly probable that this court would have denied the plaintiffs any relief in said action had it entertained any serious doubt of the board's power to revoke the permit previously issued by it. No authority has been called to our attention directly bearing upon the question of the power of the board of public works to refuse a permit to petitioners under the circumstances set out in the pleadings. It is held, however, in a number of well-considered cases, that a board of public works, or a body exercising similar powers to those exercised by the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco, may cancel or revoke a permit issued by it when the ordinance under which the permit was issued had been amended in such a manner as to render the erection of the building covered by the permit objectionable and contrary to the terms of the ordinance as amended. This precise question was considered and decided in the very recent case of Brett v. Building Commissioner of Brookline, 250 Mass. 73, 145 N. E. 269, wherein the court, on page 271 of the opinion (250 Mass. 79), says:

"The petitioners have no special and peculiar immunity arising from the fact that permits had been issued to them. They had begun work pursuant to those permits, although such work had not progressed very far. Commonwealth v. Atlas, 244 Mass. 78, 138 N. E. 243. Permits of the nature here in question do not constitute a pure personal privilege. When acted upon by the landowner, they cannot commonly be revoked by the licensing board in the absence of special power to that end or a change in legislation. General Baking Co. v. Street Commissioners of Boston, 242 Mass. 194, 197, 136 N. E. 245, and cases collected. The revocation of the permits in the case at bar rests exclusively upon the change in the by-law and not upon a change of mind in the licensing officer. We have already decided that that by-law was a valid exercise of the power conferred upon the town by a constitutional statute. Since the petitioners had only barely begun work pursuant to their permits, they had acquired no vested rights against a change in the by-law by the exercise of the law-making power."

See, also, Salem v. Maynes, 123 Mass. 372; City of Des Moines v. Manhattan Oil Co., 193 Iowa, 1096, 184 N. W. 823, 188 N. W. 921, 23 A. L. R. 1322, and Southern Leasing Co. v. Ludwig, 168 App. Div. 233, 153 N. Y. S. 545, 547. In this last-named case the building superintendent had issued to a building company a permit to construct an 80-foot sky sign so as to carry it to a height of 135 feet, but thereafter, and before the company had done any work under said permit, an ordinance was passed making it unlawful to erect a sky sign of that height. In an action to restrain the building superintendent from permitting the erection of said sign, it was held that the erection of said sign at the height designated in the permit was unlawful after the enactment of said ordinance, and an injunction was granted enjoining the erection of said sign, the court holding that—

"As a general rule a permit or license is revocable, except where the licensee had done something under the license from which the mere privilege would ripen into a vested right. This exception, it may be noted, does not apply where the act which operates as a revocation lies within the police power of the state."

[1, 2] If a permit already issued may be revoked upon the subsequent amendment of the ordinance under which it was issued, undoubtedly an application for a permit may be denied upon the amendment of the ordinance after the filing of such application, making it illegal to issue such a permit. The exception noted in the foregoing authorities, that a permit would not be revoked in those cases where the licensee "had done something under the license from which the mere privilege would ripen into a vested right," does not exist in those cases like the one before us, where no permit has ever been issued. In such cases there is no opportunity for any privilege to ripen into a vested right, for the reason that no privilege, in the sense used in the authorities cited, is acquired until a permit has been issued. The case of City of Buffalo v. Kellner, 90 Misc. Rep. 407, 153 N. Y. S. 472, cited by petitioners, is not applicable to the facts in the present proceeding. In that case it was held that—

"So long as the applicant complies with the valid building laws of the state or ordinances of a city, he is entitled to his permit as matter of right, and, if refused, may enforce the right by mandamus."

But the statement of facts in that case does not show that there had been any change either in the laws of the state or the ordinances of the city, under which the application for a permit had been made, after the filing of the application, which in any way affected or changed the applicant's right to a permit as it existed at the time said application was made. There can be no question, had the board of supervisors not amended the ordinances of the city and county of San Francisco after petitioners had filed their application for a permit, but that upon the refusal of the board of public works to issue such permit to petitioners, it could have been forced to do so by mandamus. But as we have already seen, the board of supervisors, before the board of public works had acted upon said application, enacted, or attempted to enact, Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), which, if valid, made it illegal for petitioners to erect a ten-story building upon their said real property. These facts bring the case clearly within the principles enunciated in the authorities above cited, and justified the board of public works in denying petitioners' application for a permit, provided Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) is a valid ordinance of said municipality. It follows, therefore, from what we have said, that the petitioners were not entitled to have granted to them the permit applied for by merely showing that they had complied with all the laws and ordinances effective in said municipality at the time of the filing of the application with said board of public works when the further fact appeared that before final action had been taken on their application the ordinances under which said application had been made had been amended by the board of supervisors.

This brings us to a consideration of the second question of law presented by the pleadings herein, and that is: Is Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) of the city and county of San Francisco invalid by reason of the failure of the board of supervisors in its enactment and adoption to follow the procedure prescribed by the Zoning Act of 1917? Or, as we have also stated the question in a different form: Is the "Enabling Act of 1917" applicable to the city and county of San Francisco? It is confidently asserted by petitioners that in this state it has been held on many occasions that the zoning power of freeholder chartered cities of this state is derived from the Zoning Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1419), and, in support of that assertion they cite the following cases: Miller v. Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles, 195 Cal. 477, 234 P. 381, 38 A. L. R. 1479; Zahn v. Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles, 195 Cal. 497, 234 P. 388; Fourcade v. City and County of San Francisco, 196 Cal. 655, 238 P. 934; In re White, 195 Cal. 516, 234 P. 396; Dwyer v. City Council of the City of Berkeley, 200 Cal. 505, 253 P. 932; A. C. Blumenthal & Co., Inc., v. Cryer, Mayor, 71 Cal. App. 668, 236 P. 216. It is true that there are to be found in these decisions a number of instances where this court has referred to said act as one of the sources of power from which chartered cities in this state derive their right and authority to enact zoning ordinances. In every instance, we find, in which such reference has been made, it has also been stated that such power is also derived from the Constitution of the state. In none of these cases was the direct question presented to this court which is now before us; that is, whether the "Enabling Act of 1917" is applicable to chartered cities which have availed themselves of the power granted to them by the amendment of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution of this state, effective November 3, 1914, to amend their charters so as to become empowered "to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." The decision of this question was not necessary to the decision of any question which arose in any of the cases relied upon by petitioners and which have been cited by them in support of their contention that said "Enabling Act of 1917" is applicable to the city and county of San Francisco in the enactment of Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series). We are therefore not able to agree with petitioners that this court, by reason of any pronouncement appearing in its former decisions, is foreclosed from the decision upon its merits of the question presented in the present proceeding and which has just been stated.

[3] In compliance with the provisions of section 8, article 11, of the Constitution of this state, the city and county of San Francisco adopted a freeholders' charter, which charter become effective January 8, 1900, and is still in full force and effect in said municipality. On November 3, 1914, section 6 of article 11 of the state Constitution was amended so as to include the following provision:

"Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this Constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this Constitution so as to become likewise empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

In pursuance of the power granted to chartered municipalities by the above provision of the Constitution the city and county of San Francisco amended its charter, and by said amendment conferred upon its board of supervisors, in addition to those already exercised by it, the power "to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in this charter." This amendment became effective January 17, 1925, and is still in full force and effect. By virtue of the Constitution and this charter amendment, the board of supervisors of said city and county is given plenary power to legislate in all purely municipal matters, subject only to such restrictions as are found in its charter. Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 166 P. 351; Heilbron v. Sumner, 186 Cal. 648, 200 P. 409.

[4] It is contended, however, by petitioners that the matter of regulating the height of buildings in a municipality is not a municipal affair, and in support of this contention petitioners rely upon the case of May v. Craig, 13 Cal. App. 368, 109 P. 842, wherein that court held that--

"The construction of improvements upon private property within a charter city is not a municipal affair."

Assuming that the regulation of private buildings in a municipality is not a municipal affair, it is not shown that the requirements as to the height of buildings, provided by Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series), contravenes any general law of the state upon the subject. It is, however, claimed that the board of supervisors in the enactment of said ordinance failed to follow the procedure provided by the general laws of the state, and particularly that contained in section 4 of the "Enabling Act of 1917," quoted above. This section, as we have seen, provides that in cities having a planning commission, the council shall require said commission to recommend the boundaries of any proposed zoning district, and the regulations and restrictions to be enforced therein; that the commission shall make a tentative report and hold public meetings thereon before submitting its final report to the council; that the council shall not determine the boundaries of any district or approve any regulation until after the report of said planning commission is filed with the city clerk; upon receiving the final report the council shall afford interested persons and the public an opportunity to be heard at a time and place to be specified in a notice to be published in a newspaper of general circulation. These requirements of section 4 of said act simply prescribe the steps to be taken and the acts to be done by the council before and at the time of the passage of a zoning ordinance, or, in other words, they simply supply the procedure to be followed by the council in the enactment of an ordinance of this character. It has repeatedly been held by this court that the manner of enacting municipal ordinances is a municipal affair. Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 474, 50 P. 644; In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 88 P. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911, and O. T. Johnson Corp. v. City of Los Angeles, 198 Cal. 308, 245 P. 164. In the first of these cases the act of 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 190), requiring ordinances and resolutions passed by the city council, or other legislative body of any municipality, to be presented to the mayor or other executive officer of such municipality for his approval, was under consideration by the court, and it was there said:

"The act of 1897 unquestionably deals with a municipal affair, the mode and manner of the passage of ordinances and resolutions provided for in the charter. Under this constitutional amendment [sec. 6, article XI, as amended Nov. 3, 1896], such acts now apply only to cities and to their charters which have organized under the general scheme embraced in the municipal corporation act. (Stats. 1883, p. 93.) San Francisco is not one of such cities, and the act of 1897 has, therefore, no application to it." Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 474, 487, 50 P. 644, 648.

In re Pfahler, supra, this court, at page 82 of 150 Cal. (88 P. 275), affirms this doctrine in the following language:

"Our Constitution declares that when a freeholders' charter is finally approved by the Legislature it 'shall become the organic law of the city' (sec. 8, art. XI), and such a charter has elsewhere been aptly termed the local constitution of the city. As such, provisions as to the distribution of the governmental functions, and the manner of their exercise, obtain, so far as the same are consistent with the Constitution of the state. It has already been held by this court that the manner of enacting municipal ordinances and resolutions is unquestionably a municipal affair (Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal.

474, 487 [56 P. 644]), and, therefore, under section 6 of article XI of the Constitution, as amended in 1896, the provisions of a city charter in regard thereto are paramount to general laws of the state."

[5] The pleadings show, not only that the charter of the city of San Francisco has prescribed the mode and manner of enacting ordinances in said municipality, but that the board of supervisors in the adoption of said Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) complied with all these requirements of said charter in reference to the passage and enactment of ordinances. Its legality, therefore, cannot be successfully assailed upon the ground that in its adoption the board of supervisors failed to observe the requirements of the "Enabling Act of 1917," as said act, in so far as it prescribes the steps necessary to be taken by a legislative body of a municipality in the enactment of a zoning ordinance, has no application to the city and county of San Francisco.

Petitioners contend, however, that even assuming the "Enabling Act" does not apply, yet the board of supervisors of said municipality have no power to enact said Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) by reason of restrictions contained in subsection 42 of section 1, chapter 2 of article 2 of its charter. The provision of the charter reads as follows:

"To provide by ordinance for the establishment of a City Planning Commission, which shall devise plans for the improvement and beautification of San Francisco. Members of said Planning Commission shall receive no compensation and shall not be subject to any prohibition forbidding officials from holding more than one office or position. The Board of Supervisors shall prescribe the duties of said Commission, the number and qualifications of the members thereof, and in general shall enact all legislation not expressly forbidden by this Charter or by general law necessary or incident to carrying into execution the propositions for which said City Planning Commission is instituted."

[6, 7] Petitioners claim that under this subsection of the charter the board of supervisors is confined to the enactment of ordinances which have for their object and purpose the "improvement and beautification" of public streets, parks, buildings, and other public properties, and that it is without authority or jurisdiction to legislate regarding private property. In other words, petitioners claim that the board of supervisors has no power whatever to enact a zoning ordinance, as such an ordinance affects private property only. We see nothing in this subsection of the charter which would warrant our holding that the board of supervisors is so limited. But even if this provision contains the limitation upon the powers of the board of supervisors as contended for by petitioners, there are other provisions of the charter which by their terms confer upon the board of supervisors of said city and county all the police power invested in said municipality by the Constitution of the state, and it is by virtue of the police power possessed by municipalities that they are authorized to enact zoning ordinances. Miller v. Board of Public Works, supra.

This disposes of the questions of law made by the pleadings, and the result of our decision of them is that in the enactment of Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) the board of supervisors complied with all legal requirements applicable to said board in the enactment of said ordinance, and therefore that said ordinance furnished a sufficient and legal justification for the denial by the board of public works of petitioners' application for a permit, provided said ordinance is otherwise legal and valid.

[8] Petitioners are also contending that said Ordinance No. 7519 (New Series) is invalid for the reason that its provisions are unreasonable, oppressive, and otherwise legally objectionable. The allegations of their petition and the amendment thereto setting forth the grounds upon which the petitioners base this last-mentioned contention are denied by the answer filed by the respondents. From the nature of the issues thus made and from statements of counsel at the hearing of this proceeding, it will be necessary before the validity of said ordinance can be finally determined to have the issues of fact settled either by a referee or some competent court. Petitioners have advanced no sufficient reason why this court should assume jurisdiction of the proceedings to determine and settle in the first instance the facts involved in this controversy. The matter is now before us simply upon an order to show cause why the alternative writ of mandate prayed for by petitioners should not issue. It has never been the policy of this court to encourage the institution of proceedings herein, particularly where there is a dispute as to the facts involved, when such proceedings could as well have been instituted in the first instance in the superior court of the county where the controversy arose. No good reason appears to us why we should depart from this policy in the present proceeding. The motion of petitioners to file an amended petition, therefore, is hereby denied, and the order to show cause dismissed.

These orders are made, however, without prejudice to the right of petitioners to seek in the proper tribunal such relief, not inconsistent with the views herein expressed, as they may be advised they are entitled to.

USHER v. HENKEL. (L. A. 9513.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 30, 1928.

1. Corporations $\S$ 605—Suspension of corporation's business for nonpayment of taxes rendered conveyance by corporation void (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3669c, subd. 2).

Corporation, after suspension of its right to transact business by operation of law for nonpayment of taxes under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3669c, subd. 2, had no power to convey property, and deed executed by corporation during period of its suspension was void.

2. Corporations $\S$ 605—Judgment against persons described as trustees of corporation held void and subject to collateral attack as to corporation whose business suspended (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3669c, subd. 2).

Where right of corporation to transact business was suspended by operation of law for nonpayment of taxes under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3669c, subd. 2, there was no forfeiture of charter, and corporation had no trustees, and therefore judgment against persons described as trustees in action to quiet title was void as to corporation, and subject to collateral attack when corporation was revived.

3. Taxation $\S$ 734(10)—Tax sale held pursuant to continuance held valid, where sale was first held within time (Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 3764, 3771a).

Where deed recited that sale for taxes was continuation of original sale, and that the sale had been continued from day to day in accordance with Pol. Code, $\S$ 3771a, and where the first day of the sale was within 28 days after the first publication of notice as required by section 3764, it was no objection to the tax deed that the sale actually took place more than 28 days after publication.

4. Taxation $\S$ 788(5)—Court must presume, in support of judgment upholding tax deed, that person to whom notice of tax sale was sent and address to which it was sent appeared on assessment rolls, concerning which no testimony was introduced (Pol. Code, $\S\S$ 3771a, 3786).

Where there was evidence that property sold for taxes was assessed to particular person for certain years with no address appearing on assessment roll, but there was no testimony as to person assessed during intermediate years, court must presume in support of judgment upholding tax deed and in accordance with presumption of its validity under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3786, making deed prima facie evidence that sale was lawful, that such person's name appeared on assessment roll with address to which notice of sale was directed under section 3771, during one of intermediate years.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 179(2)—Sufficiency of affidavits to delinquent assessment roll could not be considered on appeal, where assessment roll was not in evidence.

Sufficiency of affidavit of tax collector and auditor to delinquent assessment roll was not presented on appeal in suit involving validity of tax deed, where neither original delinquent assessment roll, nor authenticated copy thereof, was introduced in evidence.

6. Taxation $\S$ 730—Purchaser under tax deed acquired any outstanding rights of corporation, whose powers were suspended, by judgment quieting title after revival of corporation's powers (Pol. Code, $\S$ 3669c, subd. 2).

If rights of corporation whose powers were suspended for nonpayment of taxes under Pol. Code, $\S$ 3669c, subd. 2, were not acquired by purchaser under tax deed, purchaser acquired them in subsequent action to quiet title against corporation, commenced after corporation's license tax had been paid and corporate powers revived.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by W. A. Usher against G. V. Henkel. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Catherine A. McKenna and J. Irving McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hugh L. Dickson, Emmet H. Wilson, and Randall J. Hood, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. Appeal by defendant from a judgment against him in an action to quiet title to a certain parcel of land in Los Angeles county. It was stipulated at the trial that the Southern Land Company, a corporation, became the owner of the property by deed dated July 10, 1916. In 1922, the plaintiff received a tax deed from the tax collector of Los Angeles county for the property involved in the action, and subsequently commenced an action against the said Southern Land Company and procured a decree against the said company quieting his title to said property.

The defendant claims title to the property by virtue of a purported deed from Southern Land Company to Josephine Blanchard and a deed from Blanchard to the defendant; also, by virtue of a decree purporting to quiet title in the defendant herein as substituted plaintiff in an action entitled Josephine Blanchard v. W. A. Usher et al.

In July, 1916, a corporation entitled the Southern Land Company was organized under the laws of the state of California, with its principal place of business at Los Angeles, Cal. It acquired the property in controversy by deed. Thereafter, in 1921, this corporation failed to pay its license tax, and a declaration to that effect was duly filed in the office of the county clerk by the state controller on March 29, 1921, as provided by law. By reason of said failure of said Southern Land Company to pay its tax, its corporate powers, rights, and privileges were suspended March 5, 1921, as appears from the certificate of the state controller. These corporate powers, rights, and privileges were revived on December 6, 1924, by appropriate proceedings.

In September, 1922, the Southern Land Company, by Brush, its secretary, and Raum, its vice president, executed and delivered to Josephine Blanchard, as grantee, a deed to the property under consideration. While this deed is dated September, 1920, it was not executed or delivered until two years later, according to the testimony in the record, and at the time of its execution and delivery the corporation was without powers and continued so until its revival in 1924.

In July, 1922, the plaintiff purchased the land at a tax sale for delinquent taxes of 1916. The proceedings incident to this purchase will be discussed hereinafter.

In October, 1922, Josephine Blanchard commenced an action to quiet title against the plaintiff here and alleged trustees of the Southern Land Company, reciting the fact that said corporation had failed to pay its license tax and had forfeited its charter thereby, and that Raum and Brush were members of the board of directors at the time of the failure to pay the tax and still were such and were resulting trustees of said corporation. Service was had upon these parties and their defaults taken. The action was dismissed before trial as to the defendant Usher, the present plaintiff, and he was not a party to the decree purporting to quiet the title of the plaintiff in that action against the defendants therein. Before the decree was entered Josephine Blanchard conveyed her rights to one G. V. Henkel, and the judgment was taken in his name.

[1, 2] Since it is obvious from the facts herein recited that Josephine Blanchard could receive nothing under the deed from Southern Land Company, since that company had no powers at the time said deed was executed and delivered, it remains to be considered whether or not the decree in the action just mentioned has any force and effect. The present plaintiff was not a party to said decree, and is not estopped thereby. Did said decree operate to vest plaintiff in said action with all the right, title, and interest of the Southern Land Company in said land? It is maintained by respondent that said decree is void upon its face because the judgment roll discloses that the Southern Land Company was not sued and there were no trustees of the said company who could be sued. The complaint is entitled:

"Josephine Blanchard, plaintiff, v. W. A. Usher and W. S. Brush, Geo. B. Raum and One Doe, as trustees of Southern Land Company, a corporation, whose charter is forfeited; Two Doe and One Doe Company, a corporation, defendants."

The complaint alleges:

"That defendant, One Doe Company, is now and at all times herein mentioned was a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California; that defendants W. S. Brush, Geo. B. Raum and One Doe are now and at all times since the 5th day of March, 1921, have been trustees of the Southern Land Company; that on March 5th, 1921, the charter of the said corporation was forfeited for nonpayment of taxes due to the state of California, and on said date said defendants were the directors of said corporation."

Under the law then existing there was no provision for the forfeiture of the charter of the corporation because of its nonpayment of taxes, but its right to transact business was suspended by operation of law. Stats. 1917, pp. 371, 377; Pol. Code, § 3669c, subd. 2; Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court, 188 Cal. 393, 205 P. 446; Rossi v. Caire, 186 Cal. 544, 549, 199 P. 1042. The decree in the action brought by Josephine Blanchard to quiet title contains the following recital:

"That it further appearing to the court that the action has been dismissed as to the defendant W. A. Usher and that Geo. B. Raum and W. S. Brush, as trustees for the Southern Land Company were duly and regularly served with summons and complaint in this action, and that the Southern Land Company is a defunct corporation, whose charter is forfeited for nonpayment of the state corporation tax, and that the said Geo. B. Raum and W. S. Brush are the surviving members of the last board of directors of the said Southern Land Company."

As we have shown, the Southern Land Company was not a party to the said action; it was never served with process; its default was never entered, and the decree does not purport to be against the said company, but is against certain persons described as trustees. We think the contentions of the respondent are correct that, under the existing facts and law, there were no trustees for the corporation and that the decree is a nullity in so far as it attempts to bar any rights of the Southern Land Company. In the case of Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Superior Court, supra, it is pointed out that by the Statutes of 1917, page 377, "the corporate rights, privileges and powers of every * * * corporation which has failed to pay the [license] tax * * * shall * * * be suspended, and * * * that all corporate powers, rights and privileges so suspended" might be "revived and restored to full force and effect" as provided by the statute. It is also pointed out in the said decision that under subdivision 2 of section 3669c of the Political Code it is likewise provided that "the corporate rights, privileges and powers of every domestic corporation which has failed to pay said tax" shall be suspended and incapable of being exercised for any purpose, except to defend any action brought in court against such corporation. The court further points out that before the enactment of the above mentioned statute the penalty imposed upon a corporation for failure to pay its license and franchise taxes was a forfeiture of its charter, and that after such forfeiture the corporation was governed by the rules relating to dissolved corporations. The court then said:

"Under the terms of the present statutes, the penalty for nonpayment of license and franchise taxes has been changed, and the result of such nonpayment is no longer a forfeiture of its charter and consequent dissolution of the corporation, but only a suspension of its rights, powers, and privileges, with a provision for revivor. Furthermore, the statutes above quoted expressly provide that there shall be no dissolution of a corporation until all license and other taxes have been paid."

Under the former law, when the charter was forfeited, the directors then in office became the trustees of the creditors and of the stockholders of the corporation. Under the present law, however, the charter is not forfeited, the corporation does not become defunct, and there are no trustees. It appearing, therefore, on the face of the judgment roll, that the court did not acquire jurisdiction of the corporation and that there were no trustees for said corporation, the judgment purporting to quiet title in the defendant as against such corporation is a nullity and is subject to collateral attack.

[3] It appears, therefore, that the defendant and appellant has established no title to the property in question. But he attacks the title of the plaintiff upon numerous grounds. It is objected first that the tax deed shows on its face that the sale took place more than 28 days after the first publication of notice of sale. Section 3764, Pol. Code. The sale was had on July 7, 1922, and the deed recited that the sale was a continuation of the sale of the 3d day of July, 1922, and that said sale was continued from day to day in accordance with section 3771a, Political Code. In the case at bar, the tax collector published his notice of sale on June 8, 1922, and gave notice that the sale would take place on July 3, 1922, and would be "continued from day to day thereafter if additional time is required to complete the sale." It is obvious that it might be impossible for the tax collector to sell all the property advertised in one day, and this being true, he would have power to continue the sale from day to day, as was done. Some of the property was sold on July 3 and the sale was continued to July 5 and then to July 6, etc., up to the 11th day of July, property being sold on each day.

It is contended by appellant that the property was sold for an excess of one cent over the sum of taxes assessed against the property. A reference to the portions of the transcript printed in the brief of respondent shows this contention to be without merit.

[4] It is further contended that the tax deed was void because the tax collector did not mail the notice of sale, as provided in section 3771a, Political Code, to the last-known address of the party to whom the property was assessed. The property was assessed to George E. Hart, and the notice was mailed to 1010 West Washington street, Los Angeles, on June 10, 1922, and returned to the tax collector on July 12 of that year. Section 3786, Political Code, makes the deed prima facie evidence that the property was "sold as prescribed by law," including the proper notice properly given. To overcome this presumption defendant introduced evidence that in 1916 and in 1921 the property was assessed to George E. Hart, no address appearing on the assessment roll. There is no testimony as to the person to whom it was assessed during the intermediate years, or the address of such person. We must presume, therefore, in aid of the judgment and in accordance with the presumptions of the deed, that the name of Hart appeared as the person to whom the property was assessed, with the address to which the notice was directed, during one of these intermediate years, and that the notice was mailed, therefore, to the last address appearing in the assessment roll.

[5] It is also claimed that the affidavit required by law of the tax collector and auditor to the delinquent roll was not in proper form. Neither the original delinquent assessment roll nor a properly authenticated copy thereof was introduced in evidence, so the point is not presented by the record.

[6] However, we shall consider no further the objections urged by appellant with reference to the tax deed to plaintiff. We think they are all without merit, but, be that as it may, the conclusion which we have reached with reference to the invalidity of the attempted transfer of title to Josephine Blanchard, and of the attempt on her part to quiet title against the Southern Land Company, would leave outstanding in that company any rights which were not transferred to plaintiff by said tax deed, and these were successfully acquired by plaintiff in the subsequent action to quiet title against the Southern Land Company, after he had paid the license tax and secured the revival of the corporate powers of said company.

Judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LAPIERRE. (Cr. 3121.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1928.

1. Homicide §166(1)—Evidence of other crimes held admissible to show motive for killing policeman.

In murder trial, testimony as to forgeries, burglaries, robberies, and kindred crimes committed by defendant, held admissible to prove motive actuating him to kill police officer seeking to arrest him.

2. Homicide §166(1)—Evidence of other crimes held admissible, in trial for murdering policeman, to show general conspiracy contemplating resistance of arrest by taking human life if necessary.

Evidence of other crimes committed by defendants held admissible, in trial for murdering policeman, under exception to general rule that evidence of separate and independent crimes will not be heard on trial for separate and distinct felony, on theory that general conspiracy contemplating resistance of attempts to arrest conspirators to extent of taking human life, if necessary, existed at time of homicide.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

Edgar Lapierre was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. O'Leary, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PRESTON, J. This appeal is by Edgar Lapierre from judgment of conviction and order denying his motion for a new trial.

Appellant and one Leo Archambault are brothers-in-law; Gabrielle Lapierre, the wife of appellant, being the sister of Archambault. These three persons were jointly charged on the 13th day of January, 1928, in the superior court of Alameda county by the district attorney with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed on January 3, 1928, in the unlawful taking of the life of William J. Davis, a police officer of the city of Oakland. All three defendants were tried together and expeditiously, and on February 15, 1928, convicted, the two men of murder in the first degree, and the woman of manslaughter. Appellant was sentenced to death, Archambault to life imprisonment, and the wife of appellant to San Quentin for the term prescribed by law for manslaughter. Archambault did not appeal, but the other two defendants did, and we are to consider first the appeal of this defendant, Edgar Lapierre.

The facts are that on January 3, 1928, two police officers, in civilian clothes, deceased, and one Jules Sternitsky, having knowledge of the commission of felonies by these parties and of the existence of a warrant for the arrest of appellant and his wife issued from the county of Los Angeles, went to the residence at 1712 Sixty-Eighth avenue, Oakland, about 3:15 p. m. of said day, to arrest the defendants above named. Sternitsky was admitted to the house through the front door by the wife, Gabrielle Lapierre, who gave as her name Mrs. Warner, and denied her identity as Mrs. Lapierre. The officer told her that he had information that her name was Lapierre and that her husband and brother were home. To this she replied:

"No, they are working, they won't be home until 5 p. m."

Sternitsky displayed his badge of office, told her he was an officer and that he was going to make a search of the house for the men. The movements of the woman were peculiar, and the officer watched her glances toward the door leading to the kitchen, which was slightly ajar. He saw the face of a man peering out from the kitchen through this door. Officer Davis meanwhile had gone to the back of the house. At this juncture, Sternitsky called out to him:

"They are in the kitchen, Bill * * * break in. Be careful."

Following this a pistol duel ensued between the defendant and Davis, in which Davis was mortally wounded by bullets from the revolver of defendant, who used two guns in the battle. Following the shooting of Davis, the alarm was turned in and uniformed police officers arrived. After an exchange of shots between appellant and some of these officers, appellant, upon the advice of his wife, surrendered, coming out with the two guns in his hand held by the barrels thereof. After the shooting of Davis and before and while the officers were arriving, Mrs. Lapierre moved around the house from one window to another, looking out, evidently acting as a lookout and informing the two men as to the number of officers who were surrounding the house. After the surrender, appellant made the statement, given as a reason for the shooting:

"Because I was caught, and I wanted to shoot my way out, and my wife spoke up to me in the house and asked me to quit shooting and give myself up."

As showing that these defendants had given themselves over wholly to a career of crime of all types, the following résumé of part of the evidence, as briefed by respondent, is here given:

On July 1, 1927, the office of the Mother's Cookie Company of Oakland was burglarized and 75 pay roll checks were stolen; those checks were made out in the names of various payees, the amounts were filled in but the checks were not signed. On July 3d or 9th

(a Saturday) Edgar Lapierre and his wife passed one of those checks in the store of Edward Frustman in Los Angeles, the check being indorsed "M. J. Boyle" by Edgar Lapierre, in the presence of Frustman. A pair of shoes was purchased and $46 was given in change.

On July 7th Gabrielle Lapierre passed another one of the checks in the Morris Shirt Shop in Los Angeles, getting a shirt and a tie and $14.35 in change. Gabrielle Lapierre signed the name "Mrs. Nichols" in the presence of M. T. Greenberg.

On July 8th Mr. and Mrs. Lapierre rented a house in Los Angeles, paying one month's rent in advance, and giving their name as Mr. and Mrs. Roberts. They stayed in the house but 10 days, left it unlocked, and did not return. At that time Gabrielle Lapierre's hair was dark, although it was evidently either blond or red at the time of the trial.

During the month of July, Gabrielle Lapierre, accompanied by her three year old child, made a purchase in the Gates Drug Store in Los Angeles, and passed one of the Mother's Cookie Company pay roll checks, indorsing it "Dorothy France."

On November 22d Edgar Lapierre and Archambault rented a Chrysler roadster in Los Angeles; Lapierre giving his name as Elmer E. Warner, and his address as 216 North Hoover street. He put up a $35 deposit, and stated that he would return at about 4 o'clock p. m. The car was returned to the owner on February 4, 1928, by the police; it having different license plates on it, having been recovered by the Oakland police on January 3, 1928. Edgar Lapierre testified that he had intended to keep it.

On November 23d George Lee was held up and robbed at the point of a pistol by Edgar Lapierre and Archambault in Oakland, and on the same day John Holly was also held up and robbed at the point of a pistol by these men.

On November 25th the drug store of Leonard G. Ellis was burglarized by Edgar Lapierre and Archambault. Goods of the value of $150 were taken, and about $85 worth of the goods were returned by the police after the arrest of Lapierre and Archambault.

On November 25th Muller's Grocery Store was burglarized, and groceries were taken which were later found in the house of appellants. On November 25th the place of Glaser, a florist, was burglarized by Edgar Lapierre and Archambault.

On December 1st Muller's Brothers Market was burglarized by them.

On December 2d Rouska's Grocery Store was burglarized by them.

On December 2d Thomas' Drug Store was burglarized by them.

On December 2d Lange's Meat Market was burglarized and a .45 frontier model Colt's revolver, which was used by Edgar Lapierre in his "duel" with Davis, was stolen.

On December 3d they burglarized the Barsi Barber Shop, and a gold watch was taken, which was later found in the possession of appellants and returned to the owner.

On December 4th Green's Hardware Store was burglarized by them.

On December 5th the Sanders Grocery Store was burglarized by them.

On December 6th Skaggs' store was burglarized by them, and an overcoat taken was found in the possession of appellants and returned by the police.

On December 8th the Bay State Market was burglarized by them, but nothing was taken.

On December 14th the place of business of the Black & Decker Electric Tool Company was burglarized, and three electric drills stolen, two of which were later found in the house in which the murder of Davis occurred, and the third was found in a black bag which was dropped by Edgar Lapierre on December 17th, as hereinafter set forth.

On December 15th the Bay City Lumber Company's office was burglarized, the combination of the safe being drilled out by a circle of small holes.

On December 17th Police Officer Blackstone, in police uniform, saw Edgar Lapierre and Leo Archambault, became suspicious of them, and, approaching them, asked them where they were going. As he did so, the two men separated so as to form a triangle about eight feet on each side. In this position it was impossible for the officer to watch both of them at once, whereupon Lapierre said, "Throw up your hands, we will show you where we're going," and as the officer looked Lapierre drew a pistol. Lapierre then kept the officer covered with the pistol, while Archambault left to return a few minutes later with an automobile. The officer was then commanded to turn his face to the wall. The two men then got into the automobile and drove away. The officer started shooting at them, and they returned his fire. They drove away in a Chrysler roadster. During the course of this occurrence Lapierre said to the officer, "If you bat an eye I will shoot you."

Upon that occasion Lapierre carried a black bag which was identified by the officer and received in evidence. A few minutes later it was found by Officer Reedy and contained an electric drill, an extension wire, a two-celled spotlight with a piece of playing card over the glass with a small pin hole through the playing card, and a set of drills. The electric drill was of Black & Decker manufacture and was identified by Frank Malley of the Black & Decker Electric Tool Company. After his arrest Lapierre admitted to Officer Blackstone that he had disposed of the bag upon that occasion, and that he was on his way to crack the safe in the Grandma's Cookie Company plant and also the Rawley plant.

On December 19th Gabrielle Lapierre opened a bank account under the name of Hollenbach. She signed the name Hollenbach by printing it, and explained that her reason for so doing was that she was French and had difficulty writing in English.

On December 21st Lapierre and Archambault burglarized the Chandler Grocery Store.

On December 23d they burglarized the Smithson Meat Market.

On December 21st Gabrielle Lapierre established credit at Capwell's Department Store in Oakland by entering into a contract of sale for a fur coat, and giving a check signed "Hollenbach" by her, the signature being printed; the check was found to be good. On December 24th she passed five checks signed in the name of Hollenbach, but in the meantime she had withdrawn her balance.

On December 25th Lapierre and Archambault burglarized the store at 7637 Foothill boulevard in Oakland. On December 28th they burglarized the Hagey Meat Market. On December 29th they burglarized the Roberts Coal Yard.

Only a few of these various burglaries were established by independent evidence; most of them were established by the admissions of Lapierre and Archambault made to the police after their arrest, in which they admitted having committed 22 burglaries between November 22d and January 3d. They were also admitted by Edgar Lapierre while on the witness stand. The robberies mentioned in the foregoing résumé, however, were all established by independent evidence, as were the bad and forged check offenses and the embezzlement of the automobile.

The evidence is too clear for controversy that these defendants were acting in concert in the commission of forgeries, burglaries, robberies, and kindred crimes; that they had committed crimes of this character almost without number, and were prepared to resist all attempts to arrest them, even to the extent of taking human life if necessary to prevent the frustration of their bold and desperate plans. That some brave officer of the law should be shot down in cold blood, as an incident in the career of such criminals as these defendants were shown to be, is not surprising.

[1] The brief of appellant is extremely scant in material, and it is doubtful whether any real assignments of error appear in the record. The most that can be ascertained is that complaint is made of the court's action in admitting over objection the recounting of a number of said alleged independent crimes. The only real objection made to the introduction of this testimony was during a preliminary discussion between counsel and the court, wherein the court announced his tentative intention to hold the testimony admissible. When the testimony was actually offered, witness after witness was allowed to take the stand and was examined and cross-examined on this subject without objection on the part of appellant. Treating the assignment as properly made, however, the question presents no difficulty. In the first place, such testimony, and the whole thereof, was admissible for the purpose of showing the motive actuating defendant in the shooting of the police officer. His career of crime, the presence of the officers, his consciousness of guilt, and the fact that he knew that he would probably be arrested, were strong and convincing reasons for his unprovoked murder of the officer. These crimes, therefore, furnished clear proof of the motive actuating the defendant to kill. Abundant authority may be found upon the question in this state, among which are the following cases: People v. Valliere, 123 Cal. 576, 577, 56 P. 433; People v. Prantikos, 164 Cal. 113, 116, 127 P. 1029; People v. Bringhurst, 192 Cal. 748, 752, 221 P. 897; People v. Woods, 147 Cal. 265, 271, 272, 81 P. 652, 109 Am. St. Rep. 151; People v. Middleton, 65 Cal. App. 175, 179, 223 P. 448; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 334, 340, 83 P. 43.

[2] There was also ample evidence to warrant the admission of this evidence, and the whole thereof, upon the theory that a general conspiracy to rob victims and burglarize buildings and places of business and to commit forgeries existed and was in flourishing operation at the time of this homicide, and this conspiracy contemplated resistance in case of attempts on the part of police officers to apprehend and arrest all or any of them, such resistance to be to the extent of taking human life, if necessary. Under this state of the record, the court was justified in the application of an exception to the general rule that evidence of separate and independent crimes will not be heard on the trial of a defendant for a separate and distinct felony. People v. Yeager, 194 Cal. 452, 483, 229 P. 40; People v. Brown, 59 Cal. 345; People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 92 P. 861; People v. Arnold, 199 Cal. 471, 487, 250 P. 168.

The rule and its exception are stated in People v. Morani, 196 Cal. 154, 236 P. 135, as follows:

"It is well settled that a defendant in a criminal case can be tried for no other offense than that charged in the indictment or information, and therefore it is not competent for the prosecution to prove the commission of independent crimes by the defendant, the evidence of which has no tendency to prove some material fact in connection with the particular crime charged. But this rule does not exclude such evidence when it logically tends to prove any fact necessary or pertinent to the proof of the crime for which the defendant is being tried. Such evidence is not to be rejected because it also tends to prove the commission of other crimes or because it may prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors. Generally speaking, such evidence is admissible when it tends to establish intent, guilty knowledge, motive, a common scheme, plan or system, or when it tends to connect the defendant with the crime charged, or when the other crimes are part of the res gestæ (8 Cal. Jur., p. 60 et seq.)."

See, also, People v. Wilson, 76 Cal. App. 688, 699, 245 P. 781.

No other assignments of error require attention. We have examined the whole record in this case and find no reason whatever for disturbing the action of the court and jury. The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

PEOPLE of State of California, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Gabrielle LAPIERRE, Defendant and Appellant. (Cr. 3125.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1928.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Leon E. Gray, Judge.

T. J. O'Leary, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PRESTON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Gabrielle Lapierre from an order denying a new trial, and from the judgment convicting her of manslaughter for her participation in the murder of William J. Davis, a police officer who was shot and killed on January 3, 1928, by her husband, Edgar Lapierre. Appellant, her husband, and one Leo Archambault were jointly tried on one indictment and duly convicted on the 15th day of February, 1928. A full recital of the necessary facts in this case is made in the appeal of defendant Edgar Lapierre, this day decided, 202 Cal. page —, 271 P. 497.

From the said facts it abundantly appears, not only that appellant participated in, aided, and abetted the murder of Davis, but the evidence also warrants the finding that appellant, her husband, and brother, Archambault, were coconspirators in an agreement or combination to rob victims, and burglarize buildings and places of business and to commit forgeries, even contemplating the resistance of attempts on the part of police officers to apprehend and arrest all or any of them, to the extent of taking human life if necessary. Not only this, but appellant under the evidence actually aided and abetted her said husband at the very time of the shooting, and she could well have been convicted of murder instead of manslaughter.

The question of whether or not a husband and wife may, under the laws of this state, be guilty of conspiracy, is not involved: First, because the conspiracy is not alleged to have been between husband and wife alone; and, second, this is not a prosecution for conspiracy, the existence of the conspiracy showing only that appellant aided and abetted the commission of the crime. Whether or not she and her husband could be prosecuted for the substantive offense of conspiracy under our law is immaterial.

Appellant makes no other assignment of error that is not treated in the appeal of Edgar Lapierre, 202 Cal. page —, 271 P. 497. She was fairly, accurately, and expeditiously tried, and there can be no legal cause for complaint.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

FIELD v. WALTON. (Civ. 4808.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 30, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨216—Statute requiring payment of treble rent by tenant holding over after notice to quit held impliedly repealed (Civ. Code, § 3345; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1174).

Civ. Code, § 3345, requiring payment of treble rent by tenant holding over after notice to quit, held impliedly repealed by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1174, permitting court in its discretion to allow treble damages in case of forcible entry and detainer.

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨291(14)—Court in unlawful detainer action properly exercised discretion in refusing treble damages, where lessee's holding over after expiration of term was not willful or malicious (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1174).

In lessor's action for unlawful detainer on lessee's failure to surrender possession on notice given after expiration of 5-year lease, in which there was no showing that holding over was of willful, deliberate, or malicious character, which might call for imposition of punitive damages, refusal of trial court to award treble damages held proper exercise of discretion vested in court in such cases under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1161, 1174 (Civ. Code, § 3345), requiring payment of treble rent when tenant holds over after notice to quit, being impliedly repealed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Isobel Field against J. A. Walton. From the judgment plaintiff appeals, claiming insufficient damages were allowed. Affirmed.

G. H. Gould, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Major McGregor, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

KEETCH, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment allowing but single damages in an action for unlawful detainer.

According to the allegations of the complaint the plaintiff leased to the defendant certain premises situated in the city of Santa Barbara for a term of five years, the lease expiring May 31, 1924. On April 21st, or a month prior to such expiration, the plaintiff notified the defendant in writing that she would require possession of the premises upon the termination of the lease. Defendant, however, failed to surrender possession on May 31st, and suit was filed immediately, or on June 2d. The agreed monthly rental in the lease at the time it terminated was $400. Plaintiff alleged the rental value to be $600 a month for the period occupied by the defendant after the lease had terminated, and prayed judgment for restitution of the premises, for rents and profits, and for treble damages for the detention. Only one allegation of the complaint was specifically denied in the answer, and that was as to the rental value, the defendant asserting it was not in excess of $400, the amount stipulated in the lease. The premises were surrendered by defendant June 28, 1924, or approximately one month after the lease terminated. The case was tried July 5, 1924, before the court without a jury. Findings were waived, but the court inserted in the judgment a finding for the plaintiff in the sum of $600 as "the rental value of the premises for the month of June."

The sole question presented is, in the language of the plaintiff and appellant: "Does the record require a judgment for the plaintiff in treble damages?" Assuming the affirmative, counsel for appellant contends that on the face of the record the detention was willful, and that under section 3345 of the Civil Code that alone was sufficient to require the imposition of treble damages. He cites in support the cases of Board of Public Service Commissioners v. Spear, 65 Cal. App. 214, 223 P. 423, and Alden v. Mayfield, 33 Cal. App. 724, 166 P. 382.

Section 3345 of the Civil Code reads in part as follows:

"Tenant willfully holding over. If any tenant * * * holds over any lands or tenements after demand made and one month's notice, in writing given, requiring the possession thereof, such person holding over must pay to the landlord treble rent during the time he continues in possession after such notice."

It is urged by respondent that this section does not apply, for the reason that its terms are intended to apply to a condition where the right to possession has already accrued by the failure to surrender, and that the demand and one month's notice required are subsequent to the accrual of this right. In the instant case no such subsequent demand and notice were given, and as the section, being penal in its nature, was not strictly complied with, it did not govern the case or the judgment. However, we do not think it necessary to pass upon these points because we are satisfied that section 3345 does not apply, for the reasons hereafter to be stated.

Section 1161 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads in part as follows:

"A tenant of real property, for a term less than life, is guilty of unlawful detainer: (1) When he continues in possession, in person or by subtenant, of the property, or any part thereof, after the expiration of the term for which it is let to him, without the permission of his landlord, or the successor in estate of his landlord, if any there be."

Section 1174 of the same Code covers the judgment in unlawful detainer, and in regard to the assessment of damages it reads:

"The jury or the court, if the proceeding be tried without a jury, shall also assess the damages occasioned to the plaintiff by any forcible entry or by any forcible or unlawful detainer, alleged in the complaint and proved on the trial. * * * Judgment against the defendant guilty of the forcible entry, or forcible or unlawful detainer may be entered in the discretion of the court either for the amount of the damages and rent found due, or for three times the amount so found." (Italics ours.)

[1] Section 3345 of the Civil Code was enacted into the Practice Act of 1872 from the common law, and its penal character was in conformity with the intent and purpose of the law to punish persons for forcibly entering upon, or forcibly detaining the possession of real property. Criminal prosecution was the original proceeding, but with the passing of time the severity of thought and procedure with regard to this subject has gradually been softened by statutory enactments, no doubt due to a recognition of the fact that circumstances and conditions may and do alter cases. It is to be noted in this connection that unlawful detainer, without a showing of force, has for some time been recognized as a part of the general law of forcible entry and detainer. While this is true, many of the punitive forms still remain on the statute books, and section 3345, Civil Code, and its companion section, 3344, Civil Code, are, perhaps, examples of this. It is a fair assumption that the recognition of these changed conditions brought about the amendment by the Legislature in 1907 of section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, giving discretion to the trial courts in the matter of the judgment and assessment of damages. Prior to this amendment an examination of the history of that section discloses that as enacted in 1872 it provided that upon a finding in favor of the plaintiff of forcible entry and detainer the "judgment must be entered for three times the amount of such damage or rent, as the case may be." The section was amended in 1873-4, and it then provided that:

"Judgment shall be rendered against the defendant guilty of the forcible entry, or forcible or unlawful detainer, for three times the amount of damages," etc.

In other words, unlawful detainer was added to the section. By the amendment of 1907 the language of the statute covering the assessment of damages in the judgment was changed to read:

"Judgment against the defendant guilty of the forcible entry, or forcible or unlawful detainer may be entered in the discretion of the court either for the amount of the damages and rent found due, or for three times the amount so found." (Italics ours.)

The language is plain and unambiguous and vests discretion in the trial court in the conjunctive, to be exercised in accordance with the facts and circumstances of each case. It would seem that the plain effect of this amendment is to repeal by implication sections 3344 and 3345 of the Civil Code, both of which, under the title "Penal Damages," pertain to actions of forcible entry and detainer. The procedure being fully covered by the provisions of chapter 4, title 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, these sections, in view of this amendment, are in conflict, serve no good purpose, and only create confusion.

[2] The discretionary power of the court under section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure is discussed at some length in the case of San Francisco, etc., Soc. v. Leonard, 17 Cal. App. 270, 119 P. 405. After quoting the language of the section and italicizing that portion giving the court discretion to assess damages in treble the amount found, and also quoting the language of section 735, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that if a person recover damages for forcible or unlawful entry or detention the judgment may be entered for three times the amount at which the actual damages are assessed, the court says:

"Thus, it will be perceived, the Legislature has clearly limited the power of the jury in such cases, so far as damages are concerned, to the assessment of such damages only as have actually been suffered by the complaining party, and has conferred upon the court the sole power of determining, in the exercise of its discretion, whether, in a given case, the circumstances are such as to justify the entry of judgment in favor of plaintiff, as a penalty for the acts of the defendant, for three times the amount found by the jury either as damages or for rent. That the power thus specially given the court was intended to be exercised in those cases only where the evidence discloses that the defendant has committed the tortious act charged against him wantonly or by oppression or with malice, express or implied (Civ. Code, § 3294, supra), is a proposition which, in our opinion, is rendered free from any kind of doubt, if not alone by the language of section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then most surely by that of section 735 of the same Code. In other words, the power to treble the damages or rent is a power to be exercised by way of punishment only, and the Legislature has (wisely, we think, as the writer further thinks would be true if it were so in all cases as to the awarding of punitive damages) committed the exercise of that power to the courts in preference to the jury, the theory of the lawmakers no doubt being that the court, having equal opportunity with the jury of hearing and passing upon the testimony, is better able to decide whether the evidence warrants the imposition of any penalty at all or an allowance in excess of the amount found by the jury to be the damages actually sustained."

The court in that case further held that this discretion as to whether or not treble or punitive damages shall be assessed is vested solely in the court and not in the jury, as it "is better able to decide whether the evidence warrants the imposition of any penalty at all or an allowance in excess of the amount found by the jury to be the damages actually sustained.

The case of Board of Public Service Commissioners v. Spear, supra, relied upon by appellant, presented the same question as the instant case—that is, whether or not the court had discretion to assess treble damages. In that case, however, the lower court found that the defendant willfully held over the premises involved "after demand and one month's notice, in writing given, requiring the possession thereof," and that such willful holding over was deliberate, intentional, and obstinate, and gave judgment for treble damages. (Italics ours.) In affirming the judgment, which, it held, came clearly within the provisions of section 3345, the appellate court said, in passing upon the question of discretion as vested in the court under section 1174 as amended and as urged by the appellant in that case, that "in a plain case this discretion has no office to perform, and its exercise is limited to doubtful cases where an impartial mind hesitates"—citing Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 422. The court also held, however, that the exercise of this discretion "must [be] in a sound, fair, and reasonable manner; it may not arbitrarily render judgment for either treble the amount or for the actual amount of rent found due; the facts must warrant the decree rendered." There is nothing inconsistent in this holding, as presented by the facts in that case, and the record in the instant case. In the former, the finding of the court was that the holding over was deliberate, intentional and obstinate; in the latter, the court simply found that the defendant, after notice to quit the possession of the premises at the expiration of the lease, did unlawfully continue in possession of said premises. There is nothing on the face of the record to show that the holding over was of that willful, deliberate, malicious and tortious character which might naturally and properly call for the imposition of punitive damages within the legal discretion of the trial judge as defined by the appellate court.

In the case of Alden v. Mayfield, supra, likewise relied upon by appellant, in which judgment for treble damages was rendered, the evidence also showed a deliberate, intentional, and obstinate refusal to surrender the premises; and the same argument applies as far as it applies to the instant case. The plaintiff was not entitled to exemplary damages where there was no evidence showing any overt or malicious act on the part of the defendant. Only v. Russell, 53 Cal. App. 660, 200 P. 732. In Toplitz v. Standard Co., 25 Cal. App. 576, 143 P. 53, the court said:

"Incidentally a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer may award such actual damages as may have been occasioned by a withholding over after a breach of the covenants of the lease; and in addition may, if the circumstances of the case justify it, award to the plaintiff by way of punitive damages a sum equal to treble the amount of the rent then due"—citing section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (Italics ours.)

We are of the opinion that the court below properly exercised the discretion vested in it by section 1174 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the judgment is affirmed.

TASKER v. COCHRANE. (Civ. 3573.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 18, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 17, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⚡854(6)—Order granting new trial, not specifying grounds therefor, will be sustained on appeal, if any ground assigned was sufficient.

Where trial court failed to specify any of grounds on which motion for new trial was granted, order granting new trial will not be disturbed on appeal, if any one of grounds set forth was sufficient to sustain motion.

2. Appeal and error ⚡854(6)—On appeal from order granting new trial not specifying grounds therefor, appellate court may inquire into grounds assigned, except as limited by statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 657).

Where trial court fails to specify any grounds on which motion for new trial was granted, District Court of Appeal may inquire into respective grounds assigned as basis for motion, except as limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 657.

3. Attorney and client ⚡167(2)—Reasonable value of opinion obtained from attorney held for jury.

In action to recover for legal services and expenses incurred in defendant's behalf, reasonable value of opinion obtained from another attorney was question of fact for jury under proper instructions, regardless whether transaction was shown to be an authorization or an approval of opinion obtained.

4. Attorney and client ⚡152—Attorney may recover costs of litigation from client, but not personal and traveling expenses or expense of additional counsel, in absence of special agreement.

Attorney is entitled to reimbursement from client for costs of litigation, but not for personal and traveling expenses or for expenditures in retaining additional counsel, in absence of special agreement therefor.

5. Trial ⚡260(9)—Instruction denying recovery for personal and traveling expenses of attorney held erroneously refused as covered by other instructions.

In action to recover reasonable value of services rendered by attorney and his expenses, where evidence showed that no instruction was given calling jury's attention to fact that expenditures outside of costs usually attendant on litigation, if made by counsel, can only be recovered where there is special agreement therefor, instruction that attorney could not otherwise recover for personal and traveling expenses was erroneously refused as covered by instructions given.

6. Attorney and client ⚡140—Overhead expense of counsel and cost of traveling expenses may be considered in determining value of attorney's services.

Ordinarily, overhead expense of counsel in maintaining their offices, cost of their traveling expenses, and similar outlays are matters to be taken into consideration in determining value of attorney's services and in fixing his fees therefor.

7. Attorney and client ⚡152—Instruction authorizing recovery for expenses of attorneys regardless whether they were reasonably necessary held error.

In action to recover reasonable value of attorney's services and expenses, instruction entitling plaintiff to recover for all outlays made by attorneys whether expenses or expenditures were or were not reasonably necessary held error.

8. Attorney and client ⚡152—Attorneys may recover court costs necessarily incurred and reasonable value of expenditures authorized or ratified by client and must prove such facts by preponderance of evidence.

Attorneys are entitled to recover all court costs necessarily incurred and reasonable value of all expenditures made by them authorized or ratified by client and must prove such facts by preponderance of evidence.

9. Attorney and client ⚡167(3)—Instruction, in action for attorney's services, that contracts between attorneys and clients relative to costs are presumptively void, held properly refused.

In action to recover reasonable value of attorney's services and expenses incurred, instruction based on theory that contracts or agreements between attorneys and clients relative to costs or expenditures are presumptively void held properly refused.

10. Guardian and ward $\Rightarrow$ 49—Guardian whose personal liability is not waived is liable for attorney's fees in relation to guardianship matters.

Where personal liability of guardian is not waived, guardian is liable for attorney's fees in relation to guardianship matters.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Warmer, Judge.

Action by Barbara A. Tasker against Genevieve C. J. Cochrane. Verdict for plaintiff, defendant's motion for new trial was granted, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lissner, Roth & Gunter, of Los Angeles, Raymond E. Hodge, of San Bernardino, and Lester Wm. Roth, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. F. Lewis, of Redlands, and Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order of the superior court granting a new trial after judgment had been rendered in favor of the plaintiff, based upon the verdict of the jury.

The action was prosecuted by the plaintiff as the assignee of Messrs. Janeway, Beach & Pratt, attorneys at law of Los Angeles, Cal., to recover the sum of $6,000, alleged to be the reasonable value of legal services rendered the defendant, and also to recover the further sum of $1,500.30, moneys alleged to have been paid out and advanced by said attorneys for and on behalf of the defendant.

The answer of the defendant practically admits the employment of said firm of attorneys, but denies that the value of the services rendered was greater than the sum of $500. The answer also contains a complete denial of any part of the sum of $1,500.30, representing the moneys paid out by the attorneys. The jury awarded the plaintiff the sum of $6,000 as the value of the legal services performed, and also found in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,500.30 on account of moneys paid out, costs, etc.

The defendant's motion for a new trial contained the following specifications:

"(1) Excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice.

"(2) Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict.

"(3) Insufficiency of the evidence to support the judgment.

"(4) That the verdict and judgment are against law.

"(5) Errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by said defendant.

"(6) Error in giving instructions to the jury.

"(7) Error in refusing instructions requested by the defendant.

"(8) Error in modifying instructions given to the jury and requested by the defendant."

[1, 2] The order of the court granting a new trial is in these words:

"The motion for new trial having heretofore been submitted, the court at this time grants the motion for a new trial."

It will thus be seen that the trial court failed to specify any of the grounds upon which the motion for a new trial was granted. Under such circumstances, if any one of the grounds set forth is sufficient to sustain the motion, the order of the court granting the same will not be disturbed upon appeal, and we are at liberty to inquire into the respective grounds assigned as a basis for the motion, save and except as limited by the last paragraph of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads:

"When a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground."

Counsel for the respective parties have called our attention to the various cases having to do with interpreting subdivisions 5 and 6 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure subdivision 5 referring to excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice, and subdivision 6 relating to the insufficiency of evidence as a reason for setting aside a verdict. On the part of the appellant the argument is advanced rather tentatively, however, that there is a distinction between granting a new trial on the ground that the verdict is excessive, and on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. This distinction may be admitted to exist in personal injury cases where the amount of the verdict may be possibly increased on account of sympathy for the plaintiff or prejudice or passion against the defendant, but upon an action in the nature of quantum meruit for services performed, the distinction, if it exists at all, is little more than a fiction. The nonexistence of a distinction between the two grounds in actions such as the one before us is very clearly stated in an opinion by Justice Finlayson in the case of Griffey v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 58 Cal. App. 509, 209 P. 45, as follows:

"If a new trial on the ground of 'excessive damages' be granted under the sixth subdivision, it necessarily is granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict for the amount awarded by the jury. If it be granted under the fifth subdivision, it is equally true that it is granted on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a verdict for an amount as great as that returned by the jury; for, as our Supreme Court has pointed out, to say that a verdict has been influenced by passion or prejudice is but another way of saying that it exceeds any amount justified by the evidence. Doolin v. Omnibus Cable Co., 125 Cal. 144, 57 P. 774; Graybill v. De Young, 140 Cal. 327, 73 P. 1067; Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 254, 116 P. 513. See, also, Meinberg v. Jordan, 29 Cal. App. 762, 157 P. 1005, 1007. For these reasons there is no merit in the claim that on this appeal we are precluded from determining whether the trial court abused its discretion in granting a new trial on the ground that the damages are excessive."

In that case the order granting a new trial contained a statement that it was granted "on the ground of excessive damages." In the instant case the order is silent, and if, in actions based upon a complaint seeking a recovery for the reasonable value of services performed, the reason for granting a new trial is not stated, we do not very well see how any distinction can be drawn between subdivision 5 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, relating to excessive damages where no passion or prejudice is shown, and subdivision 6, relating to the insufficiency of the evidence, without entirely eliminating the last paragraph of said section, which requires that, if a new trial is granted upon the insufficiency of the evidence, the order must be so stated, or if not so stated, upon appeal it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground. In view of the quotation which we have taken from the case of Griffey v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra, we will confine our discussion to other grounds set forth in the notice of motion and motion upon which the new trial was granted, two of which we think sufficient to sustain the order, to wit: The assignment of error on the part of the court in giving instructions to the jury; and also error of the court in refusing an instruction requested by the defendant.

[3, 4] As we have stated, the complaint in one of the causes of action set forth asked for a judgment against the defendant in the sum of $1,500.30 for and on account of moneys expended by the law firm of Janeway, Beach & Pratt, the assignor of the plaintiff, during the course of their employment by the defendant or during the time when they were rendering legal services for and on behalf of the defendant. The items making up the claim for $1,500.30 are set forth in a bill of particulars rendered by the plaintiff to the defendant and include items for telegrams, expenses of trips by Mr. Pratt, one of the firm, from Los Angeles to Redlands and return, like expenses to Riverside from Los Angeles, long-distance telephone calls, items for filing petitions for letters of guardianship, cost of bonds, cost of certified copies of letters of guardianship, expenses of trip by Mr. Pratt from Los Angeles to San Bernardino, Pullman reservations of Mr. Beach, a member of the firm, from Los Angeles to Duluth, Minn., and return, railroad fare of Mr. Beach to Duluth and return, $500 for a legal opinion obtained from Mr. Gunter by Janeway, Beach & Pratt, and $533, amount paid by plaintiff's assignors to attorneys Washburn, Bailey & Mitchell at Duluth, Minn. An examination of the record discloses that several of the items included in the bill of particulars listed as traveling expenses were not authorized or subsequently ratified by the defendant. As to the item of $500 alleged to have been expended in obtaining an opinion from an attorney by the name of Gunter, the record shows that the opinion was obtained by Janeway, Beach & Pratt without any knowledge or authorization on the part of the defendant, and that, after it had been obtained, information of such fact was conveyed to the defendant by Mr. Beach, and all the authorization or ratification of the defendant pertaining to that transaction is summed up in the conclusion of the witness, who expressed his conclusions as follows: "She said she quite approved of that; she understood those things cost money." In either case, whether that transaction was shown by the conclusion character of the witness' testimony to be either an authorization or an approval, the reasonable value thereof was certainly a question of fact for the jury, under proper instructions calling attention thereto. The cases having to do with the expenditures by counsel draw a line of demarcation between costs of the litigation, such as clerk's fees, filing fees, witness fees, jury fees, and the like, and the personal and traveling expenses of attorneys. The rule is thus stated in 3 California Jurisprudence, p. 702, § 100:

"In the absence of a special agreement to the contrary, a client is bound to repay his attorneys for all outlays made by him in the payment of the expenses of carrying on the litigation, and an attorney is bound to bear his own personal and traveling expenses."

A like rule is set forth in relation to the employment by the retained attorney of some other attorney to assist him or to give his advice or an opinion upon any of the questions involved. To this effect are the cases of Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, 105 P. 981; Miller v. Ballerino, 135 Cal. 566, 67 P. 1046, 68 P. 600; Porter v. Elizalde, 125 Cal. 204, 57 P. 899; Alexander v. Denaveaux, 59 Cal. 476. A somewhat similar question was presented in the case of Davis v. Mackay, 50 Cal. App. 251, 194 P. 738, where it was held that an attorney had no power, without previous authorization, to employ a detective, at the expense of his client to assist in securing evidence and preparing a case for trial.

This brings us to a consideration of the errors alleged to have been made by the trial court in the giving and refusing of instructions. At the request of the plaintiff the court first instructed the jury that, if they found that plaintiff's assignors had rendered services to the defendant or her children, or both, then the jury should find for the plaintiff in such sum as the jury might believe from the evidence that the services of plaintiff's assignors were reasonably worth, and in addition:

"If you find that plaintiff's assignors, in the rendering of such services, if any, incurred for and on behalf of defendant or her minor children, or both, expenses reasonable and necessary in the rendering of such services, then you must add the total of such reasonable and necessary expenses as you may find, if any, to the amount, if any, that in your judgment plaintiff's assignors are entitled to recover for the reasonable value of their services."

The court then gave to the jury the following instruction:

"No. ——. You are further instructed that if you find from the evidence that services were rendered by plaintiff's assignors at the instance and request of defendant and that moneys were advanced for and on behalf of defendant by plaintiff's assignors, that you must find for plaintiff in such sum as you believe such services as were rendered were reasonably worth; and you must further find for plaintiff in an additional sum for the total of all moneys advanced and expended for and on behalf of defendant in connection with the services rendered by plaintiff's assignors if you find such services were rendered and such sums were so expended,"

—and also an instruction called "No. 5," as follows:

"No. 5. You are instructed that if you find from the evidence that plaintiff's assignors have performed services for the defendant with her consent and have advanced and paid moneys for her while acting as her attorneys in matters connected with said employment, that you must find for the plaintiff the reasonable value of such services, if any, as you may find from the evidence were rendered and also the amount of money, if any, which the evidence shows that plaintiff's assignors have advanced for and on behalf of defendant in connection with said employment," —and refused the following instruction requested by the defendant:

"No. 8. The law of the State is that in the absence of any special agreement, an attorney cannot recover for personal and traveling expenses, and in the absence of proof establishing such an agreement by preponderance of the evidence, the plaintiff cannot recover any sum or sums claimed to have been expended for personal or traveling expenses of Janeway, Beach & Pratt."

[5-10] The reason for the refusal of the court to give defendant's instruction No. 8 is that it was already covered in substance by instructions elsewhere given. An examination of the record shows this to be erroneous. No instruction was given to the jury calling their attention specifically to the fact that expenditures made by counsel, outside of those costs usually attendant upon litigation which we have specified, if made by counsel, can only be recovered where the evidence shows that there is a special or express agreement that counsel may be reimbursed therefor. The ordinary rule is that the overhead expense of counsel in maintaining their offices, the cost of their traveling expenses, their board bill, and outlays of that kind are, save and except as to the board bill, matters to be taken into consideration in determining the value of an attorney's services and in fixing his fees therefor. But counsel are not entitled to have all of those matters taken into consideration in the fixing of fees, and then maintain an action to recover for their personal expenses, unless there has been an agreement to that effect. If, in this case there were any agreements to such effect, it would have to be proven by a preponderance of the testimony, and the defendant was entitled to have an instruction given to the jury calling attention to such fact. In this particular it will be noticed that the two instructions which were given by the court to the jury told the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for all outlays made by her assignors, Janeway, Beach & Pratt, whether such expenses were or were not reasonably necessary. The language of the two instructions differs slightly, but both of them instruct the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover such sums irrespective of the reasonableness of the outlays. The jury was told that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for the reasonable value of the services of the attorneys, and, in addition thereto, all the expenses incurred by them or expenditures made by them. This is not a correct statement of the law. They were entitled to recover all court costs necessarily incurred, and the reasonable value of all expenditures made by them authorized or ratified by the defendant, and to do so, they must prove such facts by a preponderance of the evidence. We find no merit in the contention of respondent that the court committed error in refusing instructions based upon the theory that contracts or agreements between attorneys and clients relative to costs or expenditures are presumptively void. Nor do we find any merit in the contention of the respondent that the defendant was not liable for attorney's fees in relation to the guardianship matters. In the absence of an agreement to the contrary, where the personal liability of a guardian is not waived, the law appears to be very well established in this state that a guardian is liable. Hunt v. Maldonado, 89 Cal. 636, 27 P. 56; Morse v. Hinckley, 124 Cal. 154, 56 P. 896; McKee v. Hunt, 142 Cal. 526, 77 P. 1103; In re Price, 61 Cal. App. 592, 215 P. 710. In the case at bar the record fails to show that the respondent either proved or offered to prove that there was any contract between the attorneys and the defendant relative to fees for services for the defendant as guardian, by which personal liability would be waived. The respondent did offer to introduce in evidence certain unsigned writings which, if executed, would have justified the trial court in holding that personal liability had been waived, but that is the extent of the offered testimony.

In view of the fact that a new trial must be had in this action, as directed by the trial court, we have purposely refrained from expressing any opinion as to either the character or value of the services performed by plaintiff's assignors, and also in view of the cases having to do with section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, we have likewise refrained from expressing any opinion as to whether the award of the jury was excessive in fixing the fees of counsel.

The order of the trial court is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH P. J.; HART, J.

FITZGERALD et ux. v. SMITH et ux.
(Civ. 6256.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

1. Dedication ⚡19(1)—Recording map of plat without reservation constitutes offer to dedicate streets therein to public use, though there is no express declaration of dedication.

Where owner of subdivision of land records map thereof without reservation, he thereby offers to dedicate streets and roads shown thereon to public use, even where there is no express declaration of dedication in plat.

2. Dedication ⚡31, 38—Dedication of streets is complete after acceptance by public, and power of revocation is gone.

On acceptance by public of streets dedicated in plat to public use, dedication becomes complete, and power of revocation is gone.

3. Dedication ⚡31—Public rights are not affected by failure of municipal authorities to formally accept dedication.

Rights of public to use of streets dedicated after acceptance of dedication by public is not affected by fact that dedication has never been formally accepted by municipal authorities.

4. Dedication ⚡35(1)—Acceptance of dedication of streets may be actual or implied.

Acceptance of dedication by public of streets may be actual or implied, and is as effectual when made in one way as in another.

5. Dedication ⚡35(1)—Acceptance of dedication of streets is "actual" when formally accepted and "implied" from use for length of time showing intention to accept dedication.

Acceptance of dedication of streets is "actual" when formal acceptance is made by proper authorities and "implied" where use has been made of property by public for such length of time as will evidence an intention to accept dedication.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Actual; Implied Acceptance.]

6. Dedication ⚡43—Situation of property is to be considered in considering extent of use necessary for implied acceptance of dedication of streets.

In considering extent of use of streets by public sufficient to show implied acceptance of dedication of streets, situation of property is to be considered.

7. Dedication ⚡45—Whether land has been dedicated for highway is conclusion of fact to be drawn from circumstances of particular case.

Question whether dedication of land for highway purposes has occurred is conclusion of fact to be drawn from circumstances of particular case.

8. Municipal corporations ⚡663(1)—Owners of property abutting on streets or highways have special interest therein entitling them to sue for enforcement of rights.

Persons owning property abutting on streets or highways have such special property interest therein as entitles them to maintain suit for enforcement and preservation of such rights.

9. Easements ⚡1, 58(1)—Private easements in street appurtenant to lot abutting on street are private property, and obstruction impairing easements is private injury differing from injury to general public.

Lots fronting on street have as appurtenances thereto certain private easements in street which are part of lots and are private property, and any obstruction to use of street which impairs or destroys easements is private injury, special and peculiar to owners of lot and different from injury to general public.

10. Easements ⚡61(2), 64—Owners of property abutting on street may sue for damages or to enjoin injury to private easements in street, though same obstruction constitutes injury to public generally.

Owners of property abutting on streets may sue for damages or enjoin continuance of injury to private easements in street regardless of fact that same obstruction also constitutes injury to public right of travel and regardless of number of persons who may suffer similar injury to similar private easements appurtenant to other lots fronting on street, such injury constituting both private and public nuisance.

11. Municipal corporations ⚡671(1, 5), 692—Unlawful obstruction or interference with highway is per se a nuisance, giving abutting owner usual rights and remedies of owner of freehold.

Any unlawful obstruction or interference with highway is per se a nuisance, and abutting owner has all usual rights and remedies of owner of freehold concerning same, including trespass, ejectment, action for damages, injunction, or action to remove an obstruction or abate nuisance.

12. Municipal corporations ☞697(1)—Authority vested in municipal officers over roads held not to prevent court from abating nuisance violating private rights (Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, et seq.).

Authority vested in municipal officers under Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, et seq., over roads and highways, held not intended to prevent court of competent jurisdiction from abating nuisance maintained in violation of private rights.

13. Municipal corporations ☞671(7)—Maintenance of trees on land claimed as highway obstructing abutting owner's travel constitutes nuisance which may be abated and removed.

Maintenance of trees as part of an orchard and cultivation of same in strip of land claimed to be highway and obstructing passage and travel over land by owner of abutting property constitutes nuisance which court has power to abate and remove.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by P. J. Fitzgerald and wife against E. O. Smith and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. T. Jenkins and C. B. Wooster, both of San Jose, for appellants.

Louis Oneal and Maurice J. Rankin, both of San Jose, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. Action to restrain defendants from obstructing or interfering with the use by plaintiffs of a certain strip of land, claimed to be a public highway; to remove obstructions thereon; and to establish a right of way over and across the same. The strip of land in dispute is described as that certain roadway known and designated as Delmas avenue as delineated upon a certain map entitled, "Map of I. J. Truman's Subdivision No. 2 near Mountain View, California." On September 12, 1904, defendants' predecessor in interest, I. J. Truman, recorded this map, which shows Delmas avenue as a 20-foot roadway. The certificate attached thereto recites that the streets, roads, and alleys as shown thereon are dedicated to the use of the public forever. Plaintiffs are the owners of certain lots in what is known as the Wright and Gibson tract, the westerly boundary of which tract is the easterly line of Delmas avenue as is shown on the Truman map. The Wright and Gibson tract was carved out of the Truman subdivision. Defendants are the owners of certain lots fronting on the westerly side of Delmas avenue directly opposite the lands owned by plaintiff. Fremont avenue is a main thoroughfare which forms an outlet to those having property on Delmas avenue and it is an open traveled street forty feet in width. Plaintiffs allege that Delmas avenue is their only means of ingress and egress from their lands to Fremont avenue and they charge that defendants have planted trees in and upon said right of way and roadway so as to obstruct plaintiffs' passage and travel thereon and have plowed up the road and replaced the same with loose dirt to the extent that it interferes with plaintiffs' use thereof and has made said road difficult and hazardous for travel purposes. Defendants denied that plaintiffs were the owners of any right of way or had any right to travel over the described strip of land, or that the same was the only means of ingress to or egress from plaintiffs' property to Fremont avenue. They admitted the planting of trees, but denied that they in any way interfered with the use of the road. The trial court found in substance that plaintiffs were the owners of a right of way for travel over Delmas avenue; that such right of way was the only means of ingress to and egress from plaintiffs' property to Fremont avenue; and that defendants had obstructed it by planting trees and doing the other acts complained of. It further found that Delmas avenue was, at all times mentioned in the complaint, a public road and highway; that plaintiffs' property abutted on said highway, and for more than six years last past they had maintained a dwelling house thereon where they resided, and also a garage and other outbuildings. Upon these findings a judgment was entered declaring plaintiffs to be the owners of a right of way for all purposes of travel over and across said road and highway, and defendants were enjoined from planting or maintaining trees thereon or from plowing it up or placing loose dirt thereon that might in any manner interfere with plaintiffs' use of the same for all purposes of travel. Defendants were also directed to remove the obstruction in the road. Several reasons are urged why the judgment should be reversed.

[1-7] It is first claimed that there is no evidence to support the finding that Delmas avenue is a public highway. The contention is without merit. Where an owner of a subdivision of land makes a map of the same and files it for record without reservation he thereby offers to dedicate the streets and roads shown thereon to public use, and this is so even where there is no express declaration of dedication in the plat. Where, as here, there is such an express dedication, the intention to dedicate is evident from the plat itself. Upon acceptance by the public the dedication becomes complete and the power of revocation is gone. The rights of the public thereafter to the use of the streets or roads thus dedicated is in no manner affected by the fact that the dedication has never been, as here, formally accepted by the municipal authorities. San Leandro v. Le Breton, 72 Cal. 170, 13 P. 405; 18 Cor. Jur., p. 132. The acceptance may be actual or implied, and it is as effectual when made in one way as in the other. Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 P. 658. It is actual when formal acceptance is made by the proper authorities, and implied where a use has been made of the property by the public for such a length of time as will evidence an intention to accept the dedication. Smith v. San Luis Obispo, 95 Cal. 470, 30 P. 591; People v. Laugenour, 25 Cal. App. 44, 142 P. 888. Here there is ample evidence to show that use was made of Delmas avenue by purchasers of land abutting thereon under a claim of right, and by the public generally, since the recording of the map in 1904, and that such user was sufficient in extent to constitute a valid acceptance of the offer of dedication. Nor is there any merit in the claim that the use was of such a casual character as might be referable to a mere license. In considering the extent of the use, the situation of the property is to be considered. Wheeler v. City of Oakland, 35 Cal. App. 671, 674, 170 P. 864. The question of whether dedication of land for highway purposes has occurred is a conclusion of fact to be drawn from the circumstances of the particular case. Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., supra.

[8-10] Nor is there any merit in the further contention that plaintiffs have no right to maintain their action, conceding Delmas avenue to be a public highway, as there is no evidence to show that they have suffered special injury different than that suffered by the general public. The rule is well established that persons owning property abutting on streets or highways have such special property interest therein as entitle them to maintain a suit for the enforcement and preservation of such rights. Every lot fronting upon a street has, as appurtenances thereto, certain private easements in the street, which easements are a part of the lot, and are private property as fully as the lot itself. Any obstruction to the use of the street which impairs or destroys these easements is a private injury, special and peculiar to the owners of the lot and different and distinct from the injury to the general public and from which such owners may suffer as a part of the general public. As abutting owners, they have the right to private easements, and may sue for damages or to enjoin the continuance of the injury thereto, regardless of the fact that the same obstruction also constitutes an injury to his public right of travel, and regardless of the number of persons who may suffer a similar injury to similar private easements appurtenant to other lots fronting on the street. Williams v. Los Angeles R. R. Co., 150 Cal. 592, 89 P. 330; Strong v. Sullivan, 180 Cal. 331, 181 P. 59, 4 A. L. R. 343; McLean v. Llewellyn Iron Works, 2 Cal. App. 346, 83 P. 1082, 1085. The injury in so far as it affects the value of their property is a right peculiar to the owners and any interference with it constitutes a private as well as a public nuisance. Voorheis v. Tidewater Co., 41 Cal. App. 315, 182 P. 797; Cushing-Wetmore Co. v. Gray, 152 Cal. 118, 92 P. 70, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47.

[11-13] The final contention is made that the trial court was without jurisdiction to order the removal of the trees, it being claimed that such power resides exclusively in the municipal authorities by reason of sections 2633 and 2742 et seq. of the Political Code. There is no question that under the provisions invoked municipal authorities have certain power of control over streets and highways, including spaces occupied by trees, but no question concerning such statutory powers is here involved. These provisions have no application, as here, to suits to abate nuisances brought by one who suffers a special injury distinct from that suffered by the general public. Any unlawful obstruction or interference with a highway is per se a nuisance, and an abutting owner has all the usual rights and remedies of the owner of a freehold concerning the same, including trespass, ejectment, action for damages, injunction, or an action to remove an obstruction or abate a nuisance. Hargro v. Hodgdon, 89 Cal. 623, 26 P. 1106. The authority vested in municipal officers over roads and highways was never intended to prevent a court of competent jurisdiction from abating a nuisance maintained in violation of private rights. The maintenance of trees as a part of an orchard and the cultivation of the same in the manner indicated constitutes a nuisance which the court had power to abate and remove.

Judgment affirmed.

MACPHERSON v. WEST COAST TRANSIT CO. (Civ. 6388.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 25, 1928.

1. Automobiles ⇐244(10)—Evidence held to warrant finding that collision between automobile and motorbus resulted solely from bus driver's negligence.

Evidence held to warrant finding that collision between plaintiff's automobile and motorbus on public highway resulted solely from motorbus driver's negligence.

2. Trial ⇐309—Knowledge gained by jurors' view of scene of accident was independent evidence to be considered in determining issues (Code Civ. Proc. § 610).

Knowledge gained by jury from viewing scene of collision between automobile and mo-torbus, under Code Civ. Proc. § 610, was independent evidence to be taken into consideration in determining issues in the case.

3. Trial $\S$ 28(2)—Trial court had discretion to permit jurors to view scene of collision between automobile and motorbus (Code Civ. Proc. § 610).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 610, it was within discretion of trial court to permit jurors to view scene of collision between plaintiff's automobile and defendant's motorbus.

4. Evidence $\S$ 332(3)—Witnesses $\S$ 414(2)—Injured automobile passenger's complaint against bus company held admissible in automobile owner's action against bus company to corroborate plaintiff and to rebut inference that he transferred property to avoid passenger's claim.

Where cross-examination of plaintiff automobile owner suing bus company for injury in collision elicited that plaintiff had transferred personality to his parents, and plaintiff's witnesses testified that transfer was made as security for loan and that passenger in plaintiff's car who was injured in collision had sued defendant alone before the transfer and had never filed action against plaintiff, said passenger's complaint against defendant was admissible in evidence as corroborating plaintiff's evidence and as tending to rebut inference that object of transfer was to avoid claim for damages against plaintiff.

5. Appeal and error $\S$ 933(5)—Conflicts between affidavits on motion for new trial must be presumed to have been resolved in favor of ruling, and implied findings thereon cannot be disturbed on appeal.

In reviewing ruling denying defendant's motion for new trial, it must be presumed that conflicts between affidavits filed thereon were resolved by trial court in favor of plaintiff, and its implied findings thereon cannot be disturbed on appeal.

6. New trial $\S$ 159—Denial of new trial impliedly determined that no prejudice was suffered through alleged misconduct of counsel or jury.

In denying defendant's motion for new trial, court impliedly determined that no prejudice was suffered by defendant through alleged misconduct of plaintiff's counsel or of jury.

7. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(6)—Any misconduct of jurors while viewing scene of accident held not to require reversal, in absence of showing of prejudice (Code Civ. Proc. § 475).

Any misconduct of jurors in discussing facts of case while viewing scene of accident held not to justify new trial, in absence of showing of prejudice to substantial rights of party moving for new trial, under Code Civ. Proc. § 475.

8. Appeal and error $\S$ 1170(6)—Misconduct of attorneys not shown to be prejudicial does not require reversal (Code Civ. Proc. § 475).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, any misconduct of attorneys in arguing to jury does not require reversal, in absence of showing of prejudice.

9. Appeal and error $\S$ 978(3)—Trial judge's determination that verdict did not result from misconduct will not be disturbed on appeal, unless plainly wrong.

Trial court's conclusion that verdict was not probably due wholly or in part to alleged misconduct of jurors or of counsel should not be disturbed on appeal, unless circumstances show that it is plainly wrong.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by John A. MacPherson against the West Coast Transit Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Nelson and Nelson & Ricks, all of Eureka, for appellant.

Pierce H. Ryan and A. G. Bradford, both of Eureka, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. This action was brought to recover damages for injuries to the person and property of the plaintiff alleged to have been caused by the negligent operation of an automobile stage by defendant company. The latter denied that the injuries were caused by its acts or negligence, and alleged as a further defense the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. The jury found for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,500, and, from the judgment entered on the verdict, the defendant has appealed.

It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and that the conduct of the jury and of counsel for the plaintiff was prejudicial to the rights of the defendant and prevented it from having a fair trial.

[1] The accident occurred at a point on the public highway between Korbelt and Blue Lake in Humboldt county. The plaintiff, accompanied by Mrs. Hattie McDaniel, was driving his automobile—a Buick roadster—toward Korbelt, and at the point where the accident occurred met the automobile stage owned and operated by the defendant. The road at this point passes around a hill which on the left, approaching Korbelt, forms a steep bank. On the right a fence had been erected to prevent automobiles from leaving the highway, which is approximately 100 feet above the floor of the valley and the descent to which from the said road is precipitous. As this portion of the road came into view the plaintiff, as he testified, observed the approach of the stage, which was preceded by a horseman. The stage was then traveling behind the horseman, but on plaintiff's side of the road. The driver of the stage, instead of turning to his right and remaining behind the horseman until the plaintiff had passed, continued on his course, passed the horseman on the left, and thereupon turned the stage sharply and suddenly toward the bank. By this movement the stage was placed diagonally across the road in such a position that the plaintiff was unable to pass without striking the vehicle. According to his testimony the stage when first seen was traveling about 30 miles per hour; he immediately sounded his horn and applied the brakes, thinking, as he testified, "that the driver of the stage would slow down and pull in back of the horse." Instead of so doing, the stage driver followed the course above described, with the result that the plaintiff was unable before striking the stage to fully stop his car, the left front wheel of which struck the rear end of the stage. As the result of the impact the car skidded to the right, passed through the fence and down the hill, causing physical injury to the plaintiff and damage to his car.

The defendant claimed that no collision occurred between the two vehicles and that the accident was due solely to the negligent driving of the plaintiff. The testimony of the latter, however, was corroborated in all material respects by that of Mrs. McDaniel, who also testified to a collision with the stage before the plaintiff's car passed through the fence and down the hillside.

[2] A view of the scene of the accident was ordered by the court, it being stipulated by counsel that travel at that point should be stopped while the jury was present. The court assented to the stipulation, and, among other instructions, admonished the jury with respect to the situation at the scene of the accident as follows: "I think it is better for you not to discuss it among yourselves." Testimony contradicting plaintiff's version of the affair was adduced by defendant; but it will be sufficient to say that the evidence as to the cause of the accident was conflicting, and the facts as related by the plaintiff and his witnesses, which the jury believed, were not improbable. Moreover, as stated, the jury, after hearing the testimony, viewed the scene of the accident, and knowledge so gained was independent evidence to be taken into consideration in determining the issues in the case (People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 184, 185, 54 P. 833; People v. Pompa, 192 Cal. 412, 221 P. 198; Hatton v. Gregg, 4 Cal. App. 537, 88 P. 592; Vaughan v. County of Tulare, 56 Cal. App. 261, 205 P. 21), and a review of the evidence shows that their conclusion that the damage complained of resulted solely from the negligence of the defendant was sufficiently supported.

Defendant moved for a new trial, alleging, among other grounds, misconduct of the jury and by counsel for the plaintiff. In support of the motion affidavits were filed by defendant's counsel to the effect that, notwithstanding the instructions of the court, the jury, while viewing the scene of the accident, talked among themselves regarding the matters under observation; that traffic along the highway was not stopped as had been agreed; and that the jury endeavored to draw conclusions from passing traffic respecting facts in issue, those observed not being the same as those testified to; and, further, that the condition of the roadway since the accident had been materially changed, thus causing the jury to be misled. It was further alleged that the attorney for the plaintiff offered in evidence the complaint in an action brought by Hattie McDaniel against defendant to recover damages due to the same accident, stating in the course of his argument to the jury that defendant had settled the claim and that the claimant "had walked out of court satisfied," and that, notwithstanding defendant's objection to the above and reference to any settlement of the case, counsel continued to refer thereto in his argument. Plaintiff by affidavit of his counsel denied that reference was made through the latter to the McDaniel claim otherwise than to state that an action was filed by her after a certain date and that the same had been disposed of. It had developed on the cross-examination of the plaintiff that on March 6, 1925, he transferred certain personal property to his parents, who retransferred the same to him on January 28, 1926. The purpose of the question was to show that he feared an action for damages by Mrs. McDaniel. Both the plaintiff and his father testified that the transfer was made as security for a loan, and also that Mrs. McDaniel had brought suit against the defendant alone before the date first mentioned and had never filed an action against the plaintiff. The original complaint in the McDaniel suit was then offered, and the same, with the exception of the allegations therein as to the amount claimed as damages, was admitted in evidence for the purpose of showing that a suit had been brought by her against the defendant company and the date when the same was filed. This affidavit also alleged that upon objection being made to the statement respecting the McDaniel claim counsel withdrew the statement and requested the jury to disregard it, but that no request for a like instruction by the court was made by the defendant; that affiant saw but one automobile approach the scene of the accident during the view, and that the presiding judge, who was present, was then asked, in the presence of defendant's counsel, whether he wished the road closed to traffic; that the judge replied in the negative, his reason in substance being that owing to conditions at the scene of the accident such action was not feasible; that defendant made no objection thereto and made no further request that such an order be made; furthermore, that no objection to conversations between the members of the jury was made by defendant's counsel; that the matter was not called to the attention of the court by him nor a request made that the jury be discharged. It was further alleged that no change in the highway other than that there had been an increase of one foot in its width had been made, and that the fact was in evidence before the view by the jury.

[3, 4] The view was within the discretion of the trial court (Code Civ. Proc. § 610), which in the present case was not abused, nor was the admission of the McDaniel complaint as evidence corroborating the witness McPherson, and tending to rebut the inference that the object of the transfer was to avoid a claim for damages against the plaintiff, erroneous. The evidence being before the jury, references thereto by counsel in his endeavor to convince them that the transfer mentioned was for a purpose other than that claimed by the defendant were proper.

[5-8] In passing upon the motion for a new trial, it must be presumed that conflicts between the affidavits filed were resolved by the court in favor of the plaintiff, and its implied findings thereon cannot be disturbed. Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 46 Cal. App. 148, 189 P. 462. Moreover, in denying the motion, the court impliedly determined that no prejudice was suffered through the alleged misconduct of either counsel or the jury. Lafargue v. United Railroads, 183 Cal. 720, 192 P. 538. The affidavits made and filed by defendant's counsel in support of the motion did not disclose the conversations had between the jurors, nor did affiant claim to have heard all that was said. He states, however, that he knew that the jurors did discuss the facts of the case at the scene of the accident, to which he called the attention of the court at the time, and, further that he "observed said jurors scattered and separate over the scene of said accident, some of the jurors being many yards distant from others, and while so standing saw them talking to each other and pointing out various physical objects and conditions as they existed." It has been held to be improper for jurors to talk to each other about the case before its final submission (Monaghan v. Pac. Rolling Mill Co., 81 Cal. 190, 22 P. 590), but such misconduct does not justify a new trial, unless it appears that prejudice to the substantial rights of a party resulted therefrom (People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 P. 842; Siemens v. Oakland S. L. & H. Electric Ry., 134 Cal. 494, 498, 66 P. 672; Code Civ. Proc. § 475). The same rule applies to misconduct of attorneys. In the present case, the statement so assigned having been withdrawn, with a request to the jury to disregard it, and no instruction by the court to that effect having been requested by defendant, we cannot say that the latter was prejudiced by the remark. Moreover, as was said in Lafargue v. United Railroads, supra, "the trial judge is in a much better position than an appellate court to determine whether the verdict in a case is probably due wholly or in part to such alleged misconduct * * * and his conclusion in the matter should not be disturbed unless, under all the circumstances appearing, it is plainly wrong."

After an examination of the entire record we are satisfied that the verdict, together with the implied findings of the trial court on the motion for a new trial, were fully sustained, and no error is shown which reasonably supports the conclusion that the matters complained of were prejudicial or that the trial resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCARTE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6499.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

1. Prohibition ⇨9—Prohibition must be denied on showing that petitioner's claims were fully heard, contrary to allegations.

Where it appeared, on hearing of motion for peremptory writ of prohibition, that one of two petitioners appeared in proceedings before respondent court, and that her claims were fully heard, contrary to allegations of petition, such court had complete jurisdiction as respects her rights, and her petition must be denied.

2. Receivers ⇨77(1)—Attorney for one claiming premises through corporation in receivership proceedings as agent cannot assert independent right to possession, nor possession as voluntary trustee for creditors without owners' consent.

Attorney for one asserting ownership and possession of premises through corporation as her agent could not assert independent right to possession in receivership proceedings, and his possession as voluntary trustee for creditors was that of mere interloper, in absence of assent of real owners.

3. Prohibition ⇨17—Objection to want of jurisdiction, not apparent on face of proceedings, should be made in lower court before applying for prohibition.

If want of jurisdiction is apparent on face of proceeding in lower court, no plea or preliminary objection is necessary before suing out a writ of prohibition, but, when want of jurisdiction is not apparent, objection to want or excess of jurisdiction should be made and overruled by lower court; rule being one of practice only, based on respect and consideration due lower court and expediency of preventing unnecessary litigation.

4. Prohibition ⇨9—One refusing to reduce motion for stay of receivership proceedings to writing held not entitled to prohibition for want of opportunity to present claim.

One merely walking into courtroom, asking stay of receivership proceedings on ground that he claims interest in premises, and refusing to comply with court's request that he reduce motion to writing, with proper statement of facts as basis for judicial hearing, held not entitled to peremptory writ of prohibition on ground that he had no opportunity to present his claim to court.

Application by Nettie E. McCarte and another for a writ of prohibition to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Walter Perry Johnson, as Judge thereof, in which John Joseph McCarte, administrator of applicant's estate, was substituted in her place on her death. Peremptory writ denied, and proceedings dismissed.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Harry I. Stafford and Edward A. Cunha, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. An alternative writ of prohibition was issued on the application of the two petitioners which alleged that they were the joint owners and entitled to the possession of the El Patio dance hall; that in a proceeding before the respondent superior court, entitled Propper v. Poetz, a receiver was appointed by respondent to take possession of the premises; that neither of these petitioners were parties to said proceeding, had no notice thereof, and were not given an opportunity to be heard therein. Upon motion of respondent, and it appearing to this court that it had been imposed upon in the application for the alternative writ, said writ was set aside, and the proceedings were converted into a motion for a peremptory writ of prohibition. Pending this hearing, the death of petitioner McCarte was suggested, and her administrator was duly substituted.

[1] The gravamen of the petition is that the order of respondent in appointing a receiver to take possession of the premises was without jurisdiction because the petitioners are the real owners thereof, and, as such, were not given an opportunity to be heard in the trial below. Upon the hearing of the motion for the peremptory writ, it appeared that, contrary to the allegations of the petition, the petitioner McCarte did appear in the proceedings before the respondent court, and that her claims to the premises were fully heard by the respondent. In so far as the rights of the petitioner McCarte are concerned, the respondent court had complete jurisdiction, and her petition herein must be denied.

[2] The petitioner Herron claims that he is the joint owner of the premises, and that he has had no opportunity to present his claim to the superior court. The return of respondent herein alleges (and this is admitted) that, after the order appointing the receiver had been made, this petitioner appeared for the first time before respondent, and asked for a stay of proceedings, stating that he was a claimant of an interest in the premises; that respondent thereupon advised him that, if he would make formal application in writing, with a proper statement of facts as a basis for a hearing, the respondent would then entertain a hearing, and act upon any motion or application for relief which said petitioner should present. This petitioner failed to follow this course, and upon the hearing in this court two continuances were granted to enable him to make some showing that his claim of ownership in the premises was bona fide. He made no effort to show this other than his unverified statement that he held some written assignment of some interest, and that at some indefinite time he had become a voluntary trustee for certain unnamed creditors of his copetitioner, and that as such trustee he was in actual possession of the dance hall at the time of the appointment of the receiver. But it appears without dispute from the record of the trial before the respondent court that the Van Ness Amusement Company, party defendant in that action, was a corporation holding possession of the premises in dispute as a mere agency or instrumentality through which and by which the petitioner McCarte asserted her right to ownership and possession of the premises, and that her copetitioner is an attorney at law representing Mrs. McCarte in her private capacity until the time of her death. Thus any claim to possession on the part of petitioner Herron, as agent of his copetitioner, would not entitle him to assert an independent right to possession, and, in the absence of consent of the real owners, his possession as a voluntary trustee for creditors was that of a mere interloper.

[3, 4] The rule of law involved is discussed at length in the opinion of Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 327, 402, et seq., 24 P. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192. Briefly, this rule is that, if a want of jurisdiction is apparent on the face of the proceeding in the lower court, no plea or preliminary objection is necessary before suing out a writ of prohibition, but, when the want of jurisdiction is not apparent, an objection to the want or excess of jurisdiction should be made in some form and overruled by the lower court. The rule is not that the court is without power to issue a writ of prohibition, where preliminary objection has not been made in the lower court, but it is a rule of practice only, based upon the respect and consideration due to the lower court and the expediency of preventing unnecessary litigation. In the case before us we hold that this rule is not followed when a petitioner merely walks into the courtroom and states his objection, and refuses to comply with the request of the court that he follow the ordinary procedure of reducing his motion to writing with a proper statement of the facts as a basis for a judicial hearing.

The peremptory writ is denied, and the proceedings are dismissed.

HERRON v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 6505.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

Prohibition ⇨28—Whether applicant for prohibition to restrain court from contempt in interfering with receiver had possession under claim of right is question for respondent.

Whether one applying for writ of prohibition to restrain court from hearing proceedings on accusation of contempt in interfering with receiver appointed by court was in possession of premises occupied by receiver under claim of right is a question of fact, which must be tried by respondent court in contempt proceedings.

Original application by William F. Herron for a writ of prohibition to the Superior Court in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and Walter Perry Johnson, Judge thereof, to prevent a hearing on an accusation of contempt. Writ denied.

William F. Herron, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Harry I. Stafford and Edward A. Cunha, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an original application for a writ of prohibition to restrain the respondent superior court from hearing proceedings upon an accusation of contempt based upon the petitioner's alleged interference with a receiver appointed by order of the superior court.

The theory of the petitioner is that he was in possession of the premises occupied by the receiver under a claim of right. This is a question of fact, which must be tried by the respondent court in the contempt proceedings. Goodrich v. Superior Court (Cal. App.) 268 P. 669.

WILBUR et al. v. BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF TIA JUANA RIVER IRR. DIST. (Civ. 3525.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

1. Waters and water courses ⇨225—Warrants for salaries of regular officers of irrigation district must be deducted in determining whether outstanding unpaid warrants exceed limitation permitted for organization expenses (Irrigation Act, § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4).

Warrants covering the salaries of officers of irrigation district holding offices provided by California Irrigation Act held not to constitute preliminary expenses in organization of district, and outstanding salary warrants were therefore required to be subtracted from outstanding unpaid warrants of district in determining whether unpaid warrants exceeded $2,000 limit of indebtedness permitted for organization purposes under Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4.

2. Waters and water courses ⇨231—Irrigation district's issuance of warrants for payment of illegal claims does not invalidate tax levy (Irrigation Act, § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4).

Issuance by irrigation district of warrants for payment of illegal claims does not invalidate district's tax levy under California Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4, which limits aggregate amount of claims against district.

3. Waters and water courses ⇨231—Irrigation district's tax levy held not invalidated by fact that some of warrants were void because exceeding debt limit (Irrigation Act, § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4).

Fact that irrigation district issued warrants in excess of debt limit prescribed by Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4, making additional obligations incurred absolutely void, held not to invalidate district's tax levy, in injunction suit.

4. Waters and water courses ⇨230(6)—That irrigation district's tax levy is valid notwithstanding illegal warrants does not necessarily authorize payment of all warrants issued (Irrigation Act, § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4).

Fact that irrigation district's tax levy is valid notwithstanding warrants illegally issued does not necessarily authorize payment of all warrants issued by the district, where debt limit under Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4, is exceeded.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨225—Obligations of irrigation district in excess of statutory debt limit, excluding indebtedness incurred for salaries of officers, are void (Irrigation Act, § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4).

Any debt incurred by irrigation district in excess of $2,000 limit under Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4, is void, except that debts incurred for payment of salaries of officers are not included.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨225—Irrigation district's warrants, exclusive of salary warrants, which carried indebtedness beyond statutory debt limitation, held void (Irrigation Act, § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4).

In action by taxpayers of irrigation district to enjoin tax levy, warrants of district which, in order of their issuance, carried district's indebtedness over $2,000 limit, exclusive of indebtedness for salaries, under Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) § 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, § 4, held void.

7. Waters and water courses $\S$ 225—Indebtedness represented by irrigation district's warrants cannot be prorated, where warrants are issued in excess of statutory debt limit, warrants issued over limit being absolutely void (Irrigation Act, $\S$ 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, $\S$ 4).

Under Irrigation Act (St. 1915, p. 1369) $\S$ 61, as amended by St. 1921, p. 1110, $\S$ 4, making debts incurred by irrigation district in excess of \$2,000 limit absolutely void, claims cannot be prorated and allowed proportionately, since district's warrants exceeding limit are void while those first issued within the debt limit are valid.

8. Waters and water courses $\S$ 224—Statutory irrigation district is quasi public in character.

Irrigation district, organized pursuant to California Irrigation Act as amended in 1921, is quasi public in its character.

9. Waters and water courses $\S$ 227—Directors of irrigation district in incurring expenses and levying taxes act in quasi judicial capacity and their discretion is not generally disturbed.

Board of directors of irrigation district in employing agents, authorizing expenses and levying taxes, assessments, and determining reasonable value and character of materials and labor performed, act in quasi judicial capacity, and their discretion is not generally interfered with.

10. Appeal and error $\S$ 843(3)—Refusal to permit proof that value of engineer's services for irrigation district did not exceed \$1,000 became moot, where warrants for engineer's services over \$1,000 were void.

In action to enjoin tax levy against lands of irrigation district, refusal of trial court to permit proof that reasonable value of engineer's services did not exceed $1,000 was moot question, where reviewing court held part of warrants void, and aggregate sum of warrants for engineer's services which were approved did not exceed $1,000.

11. Trial $\S$ 388(4)—In case tried on stipulation of facts, court was not required to make findings in addition to findings concerning truth of allegations of complaint.

Where case was tried on stipulation of facts, court was not required to make findings additional to finding that allegations of plaintiff's causes of action were untrue.

12. Trial $\S$ 388(4)—Findings as to facts admitted by stipulation are unnecessary.

When facts are admitted by stipulation, findings as to such facts become unnecessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by John G. Wilbur and others against the Board of Directors of the Tia Juana River Irrigation District composed of A. G. Arnold and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Jesse George, of San Diego, for appellants.
Sloane & Sloane, of San Diego, for respondents.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by taxpayers from a judgment denying injunctive relief and upholding the proceedings and tax levy against the lands of Tia Juana River irrigation district, which was assessed to pay claims for preliminary organization of the district, together with other expenses of maintaining and operating the affairs of said district pursuant to law.

It is contended by the appellants that the entire tax levy is void, and that the several warrants which were issued in payment of obligations incurred for preliminary organization are in violation of section 61 of the California Irrigation Act as amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1110), for the reason that the aggregate amount of these claims exceeds $2,000, which is the maximum sum authorized for that purpose.

The cause was tried upon a stipulation of facts. Appellants are taxpayers in the Tia Juana River irrigation district in San Diego county, Cal., which was duly organized August 18, 1924, and embraces 1600 acres of land. Respondents Arnold, Patterson, and Ables were thereafter elected directors of said district, and on February 9, 1925, appointed H. C. McCann as assessor, tax collector, and treasurer, fixing his salary at $75 per month. August 19, 1924, the board adopted a resolution employing John F. Covert as engineer of the district, and directed him to prepare preliminary plans and estimates for a proposed bond issue, which were subsequently filed and adopted. The engineer also made surveys and specifications for desired improvements, including a water pipe system. Ten acres of land was authorized to be purchased, upon which test wells for water supply were drilled by J. W. Brannon, who was hired for that purpose. Attorneys were employed and rendered services in organizing the district. Before the levying of an assessment or the calling of a bond election some 37 warrants aggregating the sum of $5,565.25 were ordered to be drawn in payment of expenditures for office rent, salaries, legal notices, purchase of land for test wells, cost of sinking wells, engineer's plans, labor, fees for certifying bonds and legal services. There was no money in the treasury with which to meet these preliminary expenses, or with which to pay the subsequent current expense of operating the affairs of the district. A detailed survey and plans for bonding the district for $219,200 was thereupon adopted and submitted to the California bonding commission for approval. On September 15, 1925, the directors levied an assessment against the district for the aggregate sum of $7,098.42, being 2 per cent. of the entire valuation of the property estimated to be $354,921. For this purpose a resolution was adopted by the directors of the irrigation district providing in part that:

"* * * The sum of $2,471.83 is necessary for the payment of unpaid warrants of the district issued in accordance with the law, and that said district requires the additional sum of $4,626.59 * * * for carrying out, within the district, the purposes of the California Irrigation Act. * * *"

[1-3] Among the claims for the payment of which said tax assessment was levied were nine warrants aggregating the sum of $775, which had been previously issued to H. C. McCann, the duly elected secretary and treasurer of said district, in payment of his salary, which had been regularly fixed. These salary warrants must be assumed to have been included in the sum of $2,471.83 mentioned in the above resolution found to be "necessary for the payment of unpaid warrants of the district" for preliminary expenses. The salaries of regular officers, which offices are provided for by the Irrigation Act of the Legislature, are deemed to be continuing obligations and not merely preliminary expenses in the organization of a district. In order to ascertain what amount the directors sought to raise for the payment of preliminary expenses as represented by outstanding unpaid warrants of the district, said sum of $2,471.83 should be reduced by subtracting therefrom the sum of $775, which was the total amount of the outstanding salary warrants. This leaves only the sum of $1,693.83 sought to be raised by the tax levy for the payment of outstanding warrants for preliminary organization expenses, which was strictly within the $2,000 limitation prescribed by statute. The balance of the amount to be raised by means of this challenged tax levy was declared by the resolution to be "for carrying out * * * the purposes of the California Irrigation Act," after the organization was perfected. In the case of Mitchell v. Patterson, 120 Cal. 286, 52 P. 589, involving the construction of section 42 of the former Irrigation District Act (Stats. 1891, p. 147), which is similar to section 61 of the Irrigation Act under consideration in the present case, it was held that the statutory limitation which prohibited the directors from incurring obligations prior to the completion of the organization in excess of $2,000 did not include salaries for officers the appointment of which were provided for by the act. Under this authority these salary warrants may not be considered in determining either the validity of the tax levy or the outstanding warrants. There is, therefore, nothing in the record to indicate that the tax assessment was levied to pay illegal claims, for preliminary organization in excess of the inhibition of the statute. It was stipulated that the irrigation district was duly organized, and its officers regularly elected in August, 1924. The court specifically found that the board of directors "in all its proceedings relating to the assessment of lands and levy of assessment thereon in the year 1925 acted within the scope of its authority and in the manner required by law, and that the levy is in all respects regular and valid." The mere issuing of warrants for the payment of illegal claims does not invalidate the proceedings instituted for the tax levy. It follows that the tax levy is, therefore, valid and binding.

[4, 5] The fact that the tax levy was valid does not necessarily authorize the payment of all of the warrants which were issued. Section 61 of the California Irrigation Act as amended in 1921 provides that:

"The board of directors * * * shall have no power to incur any debt or liability whatever, either by issuing bonds or otherwise, in excess of the express provisions of this act; and any debt or liability incurred in excess of such express provisions shall be and remain absolutely void, except that for the purposes of organization, or for any of the purposes of this act, the board of directors may, before the levying of the first assessment, incur indebtedness in such sum or sums as shall amount to $2,000, or, if the district shall contain more than 4,000 acres, to one-half as many dollars as there are acres of land in the district, and may cause warrants of the district to be issued therefor."

This language seems too clear for serious controversy. Section 61 of this act specifically prohibits the incurring of debts or liabilities against the irrigation district, for any purpose whatever, in excess of those obligations which are expressly authorized by the act. It is, however, provided that the directors may incur obligations and issue warrants for preliminary organization purposes not to exceed the aggregate sum of $2,000. As Mr. Justice Harrison said in the case of Hughson v. Crane, 115 Cal. 404, 413, 47 P. 120, 122: "The irrigation act is evidently framed upon the theory, and with the intention on the part of the Legislature, that the affairs of the district shall be conducted upon a ready-money basis, and not upon credit, and, to enable the directors to carry out this purpose, provision is made for levying special assessments for the payments of salaries, wages, and expenses of management." Realizing that certain limited preliminary expenses would necessarily be incurred in organizing an irrigation district prior to the time when an assessment could be legally made against the lands of the district, the Legislature wisely authorized the incurring of such obligations in an aggregate sum not to exceed $2,000. Section 61 of this act is a specific limitation upon the powers of the directors to incur preliminary indebtedness, and any obligation incurred in excess of that amount becomes absolutely void. Except for the payment of salaries as above stated, the nature of such indebtedness is immaterial, and may, under no circumstances, exceed the specific inhibition of the statute which provides that:

"* * * Any debt * * * in excess of such express provisions shall be * * * void, except that for the purposes of organization, or for any of the purposes of this act, the board of directors may * * * incur indebtedness in such sum * * * as shall amount to $2,000."

It follows that the board of directors in the present case was authorized to incur indebtedness, exclusive of the salaries of officers provided for by the act, and issue warrants in payment therefor, in an aggregate sum not to exceed $2,000. Therefore every warrant for a legal obligation, in addition to the salary warrants above mentioned, coming within the above limitation, is valid and binding upon the district. Upon the contrary, in the order in which these obligations were incurred, every warrant which carries the aggregate sum beyond the $2,000 limitation is void, except that in determining the validity of these warrants, the items for salary are not to be considered.

Eliminating all salary warrants, numbers 2, 6, 17, 18, 21, 23, 24, 27, and 31 which are not within the inhibition of the statute and therefore valid, the first warrant which carries the aggregate sum of the indebtedness beyond the prohibited sum of $2,000 is warrant No. 14 for the sum of $1,086.10 for services of an engineer. This last-mentioned warrant is therefore void. The next warrant which carries the total indebtedness beyond the $2,000 limit is warrant No. 16 for the sum of $450 for commissions on bonds. This warrant is, therefore, also void. The next warrant in the order of their issuance which carries the total indebtedness above the maximum sum of $2,000 is warrant No. 20 for the sum of $207.63 for drilling wells, which therefore becomes void. All subsequent warrants from and including number 32 become void for the same reason. All warrants preceded with the sign of a star are void. All of the remaining warrants aggregating the sum of $1,982.40 are valid, and within the limitation of preliminary expenses authorized by statute.

[7] The respondents claim that if the aggregate sum of all warrants be held to be void for the reason that it exceeds the $2,000 limitation prescribed by statute, then all claims should be prorated and allowed in the proportion which their respective sums bear to the entire amount of the obligations incurred. But this method clearly violates the letter and the spirit of the statute, which declares that: "Any debt or liability incurred in excess of such express provisions shall be and remain absolutely void." Every obligation incurred beyond the express authorization of the act is therefore void, and no proportion of such claim is entitled to be allowed.

[8-10] The appellants claim that the trial court erred in refusing to permit them to prove that the value of the engineer's services which were rendered were not reasonably worth more than $1,000. An irrigation district which is organized pursuant to statute, similar to that of a reclamation district, is quasi public in its character. 15 R. C. L. 495, § 46; Luckehe v. Reclamation District No. 2054, 73 Cal. App. 361, 365, 238 P. 760; Tulare Irrigation District v. Shephard, 185 U. S. 1, 22 S. Ct. 531, 46 L. Ed. 773. In the employment of its agents, the authorization to incur operating expenses, the levying of taxes and assessments, and the determination of the reasonableness of the value and character of materials furnished and labor performed, the board of directors act in a quasi judicial capacity, and their discretion in these matters may not ordinarily be interfered with. Colusa County v. De Jarnett, 55 Cal. 373; Langdon v. Koster, 157 Cal. 39, 41, 106 P. 209; County of Yolo v. Joyce, 156 Cal. 429, 433, 105 P. 125. In the present case, however, this question has become moot for the reason that the aggregate sum of the warrants for engineer's services, which have been herein approved as valid, do not exceed the sum of $1,000.

[11, 12] The appellants contend that the court erred in not specifically adopting findings determining the validity of the obligations incurred and the warrants issued in payment thereof, and that for this reason the judgment was not supported by the findings. The court did, however, find that all of the allegations of plaintiffs' first and second causes of action were untrue, except as to the admissions thereof, contained in the defendants' answer. The present case was tried on a stipulation as to the facts, and more specific findings than those which were adopted were, therefore, unnecessary. In 24 California Jurisprudence, 953, § 192, the author says:

"When a case is submitted on an agreed statement of facts, the statement takes the place of and has the force and effect of an unattacked finding of facts, from which it follows that findings are unnecessary, the only question being as to the law applicable."

This text is amply supported by a citation of California authorities. When an issue is admitted by stipulation, findings as to such fact become unnecessary. Wilson v. Mattel (Cal. App.) 258 P. 453; Alderson v. Cutting, 163 Cal. 503, 126 P. 157, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1; Fernandez v. Watt, 26 Cal. App. 86, 146 P. 47. In the case last cited the court says:

"It needs no citation of authority to support the proposition that findings upon admitted facts are not required, and that a judgment will not be disturbed because of a real or apparent conflict in such findings."

The judgment in this case is hereby modified by striking therefrom the amount of warrants Nos. 14, 16, 20, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36 and 37 and by enjoining the directors of the Tia Juana River irrigation district, their agents, employees, officers and representatives from paying the same. As so modified the judgment is affirmed, the appellants to recover their costs of appeal.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY FLOOD CONTROL DIST. v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (CITY OF PASADENA, Intervener). (Civ. 6137.) *

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. October 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 22, 1928. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Pleading §214(2)—Demurrer to complaint admits truth of matters well pleaded in complaint.

Demurrer to complaint admits that matters well pleaded in the complaint are true.

2. Levees and flood control §25—Term "tax," as used in Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, means "assessment" (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, as amended).

Term "tax," as used in Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502, as amended), means "assessment," which, in matters of taxation, refers to the process of listing persons and property to be taxed, and of extending sums which are to be guide in apportionment of tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Tax—Taxation; First, Second, and Third Series, Assessment (in Taxation).]

3. Statutes §245—Authority to impose taxes must strictly comply with statute.

Authority to impose taxes for public purposes must be exercised strictly in manner laid down in statute, and taxing authorities must establish every fact necessary to maintenance of right to recovery of tax.

4. Statutes §245—Taxing statute must be strictly construed in favor of taxpayer and against state.

Statute imposing taxes for public purposes must be strictly construed in favor of taxpayer and against the state.

5. Levees and flood control §25—If flood control assessment does not strictly comply with statute, subsequent proceedings are nullities (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, as amended).

If assessment, under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502, as amended), is not made in strict compliance with statute, no valid levy of tax may be imposed, and all subsequent proceedings are nullities.

6. Levees and flood control §25—Assessment for flood control, made without notice to landowner, is void (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act; Const. art. 13, § 9; Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672-3677, 3681, 3714).

If board of county supervisors, acting as board of equalization, under Pol. Code, § 3681, do not give landowner notice of intention to make assessment against his property, under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502), as amended, assessment is void, under Const. art. 13, § 9, and Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672-3677, 3714.

7. Levees and flood control §29—Suit to recover amount of invalid assessment for flood control, paid under protest, held not plain, speedy, and adequate remedy as respects right to injunction (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, as amended; Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672-3677, 3681, 3714, 3804, 3819; Const. art. 13, § 9).

Where assessment, under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502, as amended), was invalid for failure to comply with requirements of such statute, and Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672-3677, 3681, 3714, and Const. art. 13, § 9, payment of tax under protest and suit to recover back amount so paid, under Pol. Code, §§ 3804, 3819, does not give a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, since taxpayer is not entitled to recover interest on amount so paid, and taxpayer is therefore entitled to injunction.

8. Levees and flood control ⚡26—City could not recover money paid on flood control assessments, on ground they were void, there being no compulsion to pay void assessments (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, as amended; Pol. Code, §§ 3804, 3819; Const. art. 11, § 17).

If city officers paid out city money on void flood control assessments against city property, under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502, as amended), city could not recover money back, under Pol. Code, §§ 3804, 3819, on ground assessments were void, since city was not compelled to pay void assessments, and under Const. art. 11, § 17, city officers have no right to pay out city funds on void claims.

9. Injunction ⚡85(2)—Statute prohibiting injunction to prevent execution of statute for public benefit does not apply to void statute.

Civ. Code, § 3423, subd. 4, providing that injunction cannot be granted to prevent execution of a public statute by officers of the law for public benefit, has no application to enforcement of void statute.

10. Taxation ⚡608(1)—Statute prohibiting injunction against execution of public statute does not apply, with certain exception, to proceeding to enforce tax by officers who have failed to acquire jurisdiction.

Civ. Code, § 3423, subd. 4, providing that injunction cannot be granted to prevent execution of statute for public benefit, does not apply to proceeding by public officers under valid statute to enforce a tax, when they proceed in such manner that they fail to acquire jurisdiction to tax, unless it appears that deed which may be issued under tax sale will show on its face that proceedings are void.

11. Levees and flood control ⚡29—Injunction lies to prevent colorable lien of void special assessment attaching, where extrinsic evidence is necessary to defeat lien.

An injunction lies to prevent the colorable lien of a void special assessment attaching to lands in an assessment district, where it is necessary to resort to extrinsic evidence to defeat the lien of the assessment, otherwise, on its face and by virtue of presumption of regularity, valid.

12. Levees and flood control ⚡29—City held entitled to enjoin sale of its land for delinquent flood control assessment, where authorities failed to acquire jurisdiction to levy assessments (Los Angeles County Flood Control Act, as amended; Pol. Code, §§ 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672-3677, 3681, 3714, 3771).

Where assessor and supervisors proceeded irregularly to make assessment under Los Angeles County Flood Control Act (St. 1915, p. 1502, as amended), and Pol. Code §§ 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672-3677, 3681, 3714, and failed to acquire jurisdiction to levy assessments against city property, and further action on part of tax collector to sell city's property to state for the delinquent assessment, under Pol. Code, § 3771, would result in uselessly adding to cloud on city's title, by imposing thereon additional apparent burdens of penalties, interest, and costs of sale, and added threat of ultimate sale and deed by state, based on void foundation, city was entitled to injunctive relief.

Application for writ of prohibition by the Los Angeles County Flood Control District, to be directed to Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and others, in which the City of Pasadena intervenes. Writ denied.

Everett W. Mattoon, Co. Counsel, Roy W. Dowds, Flood Control Counsel, and W. Sumner Holbrook, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

R. C. McAllaster, City Atty., and Harold P. Huls, Deputy City Atty., both of Pasadena, for respondents and intervenor.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Alan Pat-ten, Deputy City Atty., both of Los Angeles, W. Turney Fox, City Atty., of Glendale, Chester L. Coffin, City Atty., of Santa Monica, and Nowland M. Reid, City Atty., and C. A. Windham, Chief Deputy City Atty., both of Long Beach, amici curiæ.

HAZLETT, Justice pro tem. This is an original application for a writ of prohibition to require respondent superior court of Los Angeles county to dissolve a restraining order issued pending an action commenced in that court on June 29, 1928, by the city of Pasadena against W. O. Welch, as tax collector of the county, and petitioner Los Angeles County flood control district, numbered 255803, and to prevent respondents from taking any further proceedings in the action.

From the act creating petitioner district and the allegations of the pleadings in this application admitted to be true, the following facts appear:

Petitioner Los Angeles County flood control district is a body corporate and politic, created by the act of the Legislature known as the "Los Angeles County Flood Control Act," approved June 12, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1502), and operating under the act and the amendments thereto. The district comprises many thousands of acres of land in the county and territory of cities, to wit, that portion of Los Angeles county lying south of the north line of township 5 north, San Bernardino base, excepting therefrom the islands of the coast included in the county. Pursuant to the provisions of the act, bonds of the district were authorized in 1917 and in 1924, and on the first Monday in March, 1927, there were approximately $9,750,000 of the bonds issued and outstanding and in the hands of investors, and those bonds are liens upon the taxable lands of the district. The act provides that the board of supervisors of the county shall levy the taxes required to be imposed for the purposes of the district, that the officers of the county shall perform their various functions as officers ex officio of and for the district, and that the taxes shall be levied and collected at the same time and in the same manner and by the same officers as general taxes in the county.

On the first Tuesday after the first Monday in September, 1927, the board of supervisors levied an assessment upon all benefited taxable real property in the district to pay interest and installments of principal on the outstanding bonds, and an additional assessment to pay for maintaining, operating, extending and repairing the work or improvements of the district. The lands assessed include 242 parcels belonging to the city of Pasadena and used by the city for public purposes on and subsequent to the first day of March, 1927. The city did not pay the assessments, but permitted them to become delinquent, and the tax collector published the delinquent tax list, including a notice that the parcels would be sold to the state, as provided in section 3771 of the Political Code, if not paid, and prior to June 30, 1928, he mailed a like list and notice to the city.

Thereupon the city commenced the action in respondent court. In its complaint the city alleges that, notwithstanding protests made by the city, the officers of the county and district, more particularly the assessor, after August 1, 1927, and prior to December 1, 1927, the exact date being unknown to the city, proceeded to assess and to levy the assessments upon the lands of the city, and that by reason of their actions the city was deprived of the right to appear before the board of equalization and be heard as to the values of the parcels, but that the values were arbitrarily established by the assessor and the city was given no opportunity to have the values reviewed as provided by law; alleging the notice of delinquencies and proposed sales to the state for nonpayment of the taxes, penalties and costs; that if the sale is made the city will suffer irreparable loss, and will not have for five years after the sale an opportunity to contest the validity of the tax or sale, and that each year thereafter the county officers will impose additional taxes, and will claim and demand additional penalties and interest thereon; that the city has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law, in that it may not pay the taxes for the reasons that they are invalid, that such payment would be a gift of public moneys of the city, and that application to the board of supervisors for cancellation of the assessment would be fruitless, as the board has refused to cancel any taxes or assessments upon any property in the same situation, basing its refusal upon the advice of the county counsel; and that, by the proposed sale, the city will be deprived of its property without due process of law. Wherefore the city prays that the purported assessments be declared null and void, that the defendants in the action be permanently enjoined from selling the parcels to the state, and from doing any other acts to collect the assessments, or to enforce the lien thereof, for an injunction pendente lite and for general relief.

On June 29, 1928, the superior court issued a temporary restraining order, prohibiting the tax collector from selling the parcels to the state, etc., until the further order of the court.

[1] The tax collector and the district filed a demurrer to the complaint on general grounds, as well as a motion to dissolve the restraining order, which motion the court heard and denied, but the demurrer has not been heard. The demurrer admits that the matters well pleaded in the complaint are true.

Petitioner contends that the sale restrained is a ministerial act to be performed by an officer of the law pursuant to public statute for public benefit; that injunctive relief is not open to impede the operation of revenue laws, unless the act sought to be restrained is of such a nature as to irreparably injure the property or throw a cloud upon it; that the assessments were validly levied upon the property of the city; that the city has an adequate remedy at law to determine the validity of assessments under the provisions of sections 3804 or 3819 or 3804a of the Political Code; and that petitioner district has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. Respondents demurred to the petition on general grounds, and also filed an answer thereto. They contend that the assessments and the levy thereof on the city's lands are void.

It fairly appears from the allegations of the complaint of the city that no assessment of the city's lands was made until some time between the 1st day of August and the 1st day of December, 1927. The petition of the district shows that the assessments were levied by the board of supervisors on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in September. The question is squarely presented whether the assessment and levy are valid and enforceable. The procedure required to be followed by the assessor and the board is laid down in sections 3628, 3650, 3652, 3654, 3672 to 3677, inclusive, 3681, and 3714 of the Political Code.

Section 3628 provides that the assessor must, between the first Monday in March and the first Monday in July of each year, "ascertain the names of all taxable inhabitants, and all the property in his county subject to taxation, except such as is required to be assessed by the state board of equalization and must assess such property to the persons by whom it was owned or claimed, or in whose possession or control it was, at twelve o'clock meridian of the first Monday in March next preceding. * * *

Section 3650 provides that the assessor must prepare an assessment book with appropriate headings, in which must be listed all property within the county, and must show the name, if known, of the person to whom the property is assessed, the descriptions of the lands assessed, the cash value of all real estate and the total value of all property.

Section 3652 provides that on or before the first Monday in July of each year the assessor must complete his assessment book, and section 3654 provides that as soon as the assessment book is completed it must be delivered to the clerk of the board of supervisors, who must give notice by publication thereof of the time the board will meet to equalize the assessments, and that after the board of equalization has completed its labors the book must be returned to the assessor's office.

Section 3672 provides that the board must meet on the first Monday of July in each year to examine the assessment book and equalize the assessment of property in the county, and must continue in session for that purpose from time to time until the business of equalizing is disposed of, but not later than the third Monday in July.

Section 3681 provides that:

"During the session of the board, it may direct the assessor to assess any taxable property that has escaped assessment, or to add to the amount, number, or quantity of property, when a false or incomplete list has been rendered; and to make and enter new assessments * * *; but the clerk must notify all persons interested, by letter deposited in the post office or express, postpaid, and addressed to the person interested, at least five days before action taken, of the day fixed when the matter will be investigated."

Section 3714 (as in effect in 1927 [St. 1927, p. 721]) provides that:

"The board of supervisors of each county must on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of September of each year, fix the rate of county taxes, designating the number of cents levied for each fund on each one hundred dollars of property, and must levy the state and county taxes upon the taxable property in the county. * * *"

[2] The term "tax," as used in the Los Angeles County Flood Control Act means "assessment." Los Angeles County Flood Control Dist. v. Hamilton, 177 Cal. 119, 128, 169 P. 1028. The word "assessment," in matters of taxation, refers to the process of listing the persons and property to be taxed, and of extending the sums which are to be the guide in an apportionment of the tax between them. Bruschi v. Cooper, 30 Cal. App. 682, 697, 159 P. 728, 734.

If the lands of the city were not exempt from the assessments, it was the duty of the assessor to assess them and to make the assessments prior to the first Monday in July, 1927; and, as the lands were not then assessed, the board of supervisors, acting as a board of equalization, had the right under section 3681, at any time between the first and third Mondays in July, to order the assessor to assess them as taxable property which had escaped assessment. From the facts pleaded and admitted, it appears that the board took no such action before the 1st day of August. We might assume that the board acted within 20 days after the third Monday in August, which extended time could have been granted the board by the state board of equalization under section 3705 of the Political Code, as under like circumstances was assumed in Buswell v. Supervisors, etc., 116 Cal. 351, 354, 48 P. 226, were it not for the fact that notice of the intended action by the board was a jurisdictional step in the matter.

It was the duty of the clerk of the board of supervisors, as provided in section 3681, to give the city, as the interested party, notice by letter at least five days before action taken by the board of the day fixed when the matter of ordering the assessments would be acted upon and the order to assess made. Huntley v. Board of Trustees, 165 Cal. 298, 304, 131 P. 859. From the facts well pleaded in the city's complaint it appears that no such notice was given, but nevertheless at some time after the 1st day of August the assessor assessed the lands and the board levied the assessments complained of. It does appear, however, that prior to the time when the assessments were made the city protested, presumably to the assessor, against any assessment of its lands, but the city was given no opportunity to be heard by the board at a time fixed by the board for considering any proposed assessment of the city's lands, or to make any showing or protest against the values that might be placed upon the lands for the purposes of the assessments, as the city had the right to do pursuant to the provisions of sections 3673 to 3677, inclusive, and 3681 of the Political Code. Therefore the city had no opportunity to have the values fixed reviewed.

[3-5] The authority to impose taxes upon persons or property for public purposes must be exercised strictly in the manner laid down in the statutes, and all laws having this object are to be strictly construed in favor of the taxpayer as against the state. The taxing authorities must establish every fact essential to the maintenance of the right of recovery of the tax. In this sense the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors and the assessor extends only to their right to act in the manner provided by law (Estate of Potter, 188 Cal. 55, 64, 204 P. 826; Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irrigation Dist., 173 Cal. 660, 664, 161 P. 113; Birch v. Board of Supervisors, 191 Cal. 235, 237, 215 P. 903), and if the assessment is not so made, no valid levy of the tax may be imposed and all subsequent proceedings are nullities (Wright v. Fox, 150 Cal. 680, 89 P. 832; Carter v. Osborn, 150 Cal. 620, 623, 89 P. 608; Savings & Loan Soc. v. San Francisco, 146 Cal. 673, 676, 80 P. 1086; Dranga v. Rowe, 127 Cal. 506, 508, 59 P. 944).

[6] A taxpayer is entitled to notice of the meetings of the board of equalization at which his taxes may be increased, an assessment arbitrarily made by the assessor is void, and the taxpayer cannot be deprived of an opportunity of appearing before the board to contest the amount assessed against him and to have the value fixed reduced. His right to such notice is determined by section 9 of article 13 of the state Constitution, as well as by the statutes above referred to, and if the notice is not given him the attempt to tax his property is abortive, the assessment and tax are in violation of the mandate of the Constitution and are void. People v. Pittsburg R. R. Co., 67 Cal. 625, 626, 8 P. 381. See, also, section 3673, Pol. Code.

For the reasons stated, it appears from the admitted allegations of the city's complaint that the assessments and levy complained of were made arbitrarily and are void.

[7] Payment of the tax under protest and suit to recover back the amount as provided in sections 3804 and 3819 of the Political Code do not constitute a plain, speedy, or adequate remedy, for the reason that the taxpayer is not entitled to recover interest on the amount paid. Birch v. Board of Supervisors, supra; Hopkins, Assessor, v. Southern California Telephone Co., 275 U. S. 393, 48 S. Ct. 180, 72 L. Ed. 329. It certainly would be useless and unreasonable for the court to adjudge a tax invalid and then to remit the taxpayer plaintiff to the pursuit of statutory remedies, particularly when all subsequent proceedings of the taxing and tax collecting authorities would necessarily be based upon a foundation decreed to be void. No matter what remedies are allowed by statute, it would come back to the proposition that the taxpayers should be relieved from the payment of a void tax. Spring Valley Water Co. v. Planer, Tax Collector (Cal. App.) 263 P. 323. See, also, Hopkins v. Southern California Telephone Co., supra.

[8] City officers have no right to pay out moneys of the city upon a void claim (section 17, art. 11, Const.); and if in this matter the officers of the city of Pasadena had used the money of the city to pay the assessments as provided in sections 3804 and 3819 of the Political Code, the city could not have recovered the money back upon the ground that the assessments were void, for the reason that no compulsion to pay the void assessments existed. Spencer v. Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 107, 179 P. 163.

[9, 10] The provision of subdivision 4 of section 3423 of the Civil Code, to wit, that "an injunction cannot be granted * * *

(4) to prevent the execution of a public statute, by officers of the law, for the public benefit," rests on the premise that the statute in question is a valid exercise of legislative power; but, if the statute is void, subdivision 4 of section 3423 has no application, and does not prohibit the issuance of the injunction. Livermore v. Waite, 102 Cal. 113, 36 P. 424, 25 L. R. A. 312; Wheeler v. Herbert, 152 Cal. 224, 228, 92 P. 353; Reclamation Dist. v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 672, 676, 154 P. 845. Neither do the provisions quoted from section 3423 have any application to a proceeding by public officers under a valid statute to impose or enforce a tax when they proceed in such manner that they fail to acquire jurisdiction to tax, unless it appears that the deed which may be issued pursuant to the tax sale will show on its face that the proceedings are void. In the latter case injunction to stay the hands of the officers does not lie, as the deed would not constitute a cloud upon the title. Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Preciado, Tax Collector, 167 Cal. 580, 584, 140 P. 239; Pierce v. City of Los Angeles, 159 Cal. 516, 519, 114 P. 818; Woolacott v. Meekin, 151 Cal. 701, 707, 91 P. 612; Pasadena Park Imp. Co. v. Lelande, 175 Cal. 511, 521, 166 P. 341; Title Restoration Co. v. Kerrigan, 150 Cal. 289, 88 P. 356, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 682, 119 Am. St. Rep. 199.

[11] An injunction lies to prevent the colorable lien of a void special assessment attaching to lands in an assessment district (Pasadena Park Imp. Co. v. Lelande, supra; Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Preciado, supra), where it is necessary to resort to extrinsic evidence to defeat the lien of the assessment otherwise, on its face and by virtue of the presumption of its regularity, valid. (Owens v. Dudley, 162 Cal. 422, 427, 122 P. 1087).

Petitioner lays great stress upon the reasoning in the case of Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 87 P. 102, in which the court announced that to justify the remedy of injunction to stay the hands of the tax collector in selling the lands to the state on account of the delinquency of taxes already assessed and levied it must appear that injunction is necessary to protect the rights of the landowner, or that the enforcement of the tax will throw a cloud upon the title of his lands, or lead to a multiplicity of suits, and that he has no adequate remedy at law. The court further held in that case that none of the acts complained of could have any such effect for the reasons that the sale to the state, making the entry "sold to the state" and issuing a certificate of delinquent tax sale, added nothing to the validity of the tax lien, but only had the effect of preserving the rights of the state and of starting the running of the period of five years within which redemption might be effected, at the expiration of which a deed might be issued to the state; also, that the taxpayer has complete protection against the creation of a cloud upon his title by enjoining the issuance of the deed, and that equity will not interpose to the extent of preventing the performance of those preliminary acts by the tax collector, the failure to perform which may result in prejudice to the state in the enforcement of its revenue laws.

In the case of Pierce v. City of Los Angeles, supra, it appeared that the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles was enjoined from imposing any penalty or making any sale on account of the failure of property owners to pay certain assessments declared against their lands for public improvements. Upon appeal the Supreme Court held that such proceedings are in invitum, and the very essence of the litigation is whether or not the steps necessary to acquire jurisdiction were followed by the board, and that the court must alternately determine the sufficiency or insufficiency of the proceedings by virtue of which the city and the board claimed jurisdiction to assess the costs of the improvement and to do the other acts contemplated by them; also, that a court of equity, in such a case, may stay the hands of the officers until it is finally and judicially determined whether or not they are seeking to deprive citizens of property without due process of law.

The holding in Crocker v. Scott, supra, was construed in the case of Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Preciado, supra, in which the plaintiff sought to enjoin the defendant from declaring delinquent certain void school taxes and from selling the taxed lands to the state. The court held that the taxing officers acted beyond the scope of their jurisdiction, that the tax lien was a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, that the deed, if issued, would not show that the assessment was void, that equitable consideration of a disturbance of revenues was absent, in that the assessment was not made by a competent authority which had irregularly exercised its power, and that the holding in Crocker v. Scott upon the facts in that case was correct.

However, in Crocker v. Scott, the trial court issued an injunction pendente lite upon verified complaint, and on appeal from that action the Supreme Court held that the complaint showed that the taxing authorities had fully complied with the law, that the tax was legally assessed and that the facts alleged were insufficient to support the injunction, while in the Las Animas and Pierce Cases it was held that the taxing officers acted without having acquired jurisdiction, and the injunctions were properly issued.

[12] In the proceeding before us, it appearing that the assessor and the board of supervisors proceeded not merely in an irregular manner but that they failed to acquire jurisdiction to assess or levy the assessments, and that further action on the part of the tax collector to sell the lands of the city to the state would result in uselessly adding to the cloud upon the title to the lands by imposing thereon additional apparent burdens of penalties, interest, and costs of sale, and the added threat of ultimate sale and deed by the state, based upon a void foundation, and that the city should not be compelled to suffer the cloud to remain on the title to its lands for five years (Spring Valley Water Co. v. Planer, supra; Hopkins v. Southern Calif. Telephone Co., supra; Pasadena Park Imp. Co. v. Lelande, supra; Pierce v. Los Angeles, supra; Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Preciado, supra), there is no reason why the court should not now exercise its equitable power.

Other contentions are made by the parties, but as the points above discussed arise only upon demurrer, and dispose of petitioner's application, we do not feel it necessary to consider them, but leave them for determination in the first instance by the trial court, should the district answer the complaint and raise appropriate issues of facts.

The writ is denied.

Guardianship of BRUEGGER.

PATTERSON v. BRUEGGER.

(Civ. 6095.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Oct. 30, 1928.

1. Guardian and ward ⇨13(4)—Evidence held to support judgment dismissing maternal grandmother's petition for appointment as guardian, on ground that child's father had abandoned her, and was not fit to have her custody.

Evidence held sufficient to support judgment denying and dismissing maternal grandmother's petition for appointment as general guardian of minor child, on ground that father had legally abandoned her, and was not fit and proper person to have her custody.

2. Parent and child ⇨17(2)—To "abandon" child, father must manifest intent to sever parental relationship.

In order to constitute "abandonment" of minor child by father, there must be an actual intent manifested to sever the parental relationship.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, Abandon; Abandonment.]

3. Parent and child ⇨3(1)—Parent need not compensate relative for voluntary support of minor child, in absence of agreement.

A parent is not obliged to compensate a relative for voluntary support of his minor child, in absence of an agreement for compensation.

4. Parent and child ☞2(3)—Parent's fitness for child's custody is controlling factor in guardianship proceeding by another, in view of policy to promote parental love and responsibility.

It being the policy of the law to awaken, encourage, and promote parental love and responsibility, rather than to interfere with, or discourage, love of offspring, fitness of parent for custody of minor child at time of guardianship proceeding by another is controlling factor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Petition by Ida Jane Patterson for appointment as general guardian of Agnes Patterson Bruegger, a minor, contested by Clinton Bruegger. From a judgment denying and dismissing the petition, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Rollin L. McNitt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment denying and dismissing a petition for the appointment of appellant as general guardian of Agnes Patterson Bruegger, a minor, and the daughter of Clinton Bruegger, the respondent. There were three proceedings pending in the trial court all having to do with the custody of this child, who at the time of trial was about seven years of age. One was a petition on the part of the appellant here to have it declared that her grandchild was abandoned by her father, and free from his care and control; another was a habeas corpus proceeding instituted by the father against the maternal grandparents; and the third was the proceeding which gives rise to this appeal. The three proceedings were tried at the same time; it having been stipulated that all of the testimony might be considered as testimony in the guardianship proceeding. By reason of the failure of counsel to agree to all the facts or to direct our attention to those portions of the transcript where we might find the testimony referred to by them in their briefs, we have assumed the burden of reading the entire testimony, a burden which counsel ought not to expect us to undertake, and which, except for the appealing character of this case, we might not have been willing to shoulder. This observation is inserted, not only as a warning, but also with the hope that counsel in the future will have regard for the number of cases with which the appellate tribunals are inundated, and endeavor to perform those tasks with which they are properly chargeable in such a way as to lighten the labors and save the time of those whose duty it is to review the records.

[1] The appellant advances two reasons why the judgment should be reversed, the first of which is that the testimony introduced in the trial court was sufficient to prove a legal abandonment, and the other that the testimony was sufficient to prove that the father was not a fit and proper person to have the custody of the child. Acting upon the assumption that appellant intended to state that the evidence was insufficient to support the opposite conclusions, we have culled from the record testimony which amply supports the result arrived at by the trial court.

Mrs. Bruegger is the second wife of the respondent. At the time of the death of his first wife, some time in 1920, the respondent and his daughter were living with the appellant and her husband. They continued to live there until June, 1921. Respondent married the present Mrs. Bruegger July 3, 1921, and built himself a modest yet substantial home in Eagle Rock, which has been very nicely furnished, and where the respondent has continued to reside. Agnes, being of very tender years, was allowed to temporarily remain with her maternal grandparents, but, when the respondent attempted to obtain the custody and control of his child, he was obliged, by reason of the refusal of the grandparents to surrender her, to secure his relief through a proceeding in habeas corpus, the petition for which writ was filed on December 30, 1922. Apparently affairs moved along well enough until October 29, 1925, at which time friction developed between Mr. and Mrs. Bruegger, and they both sought a divorce. During this temporary separation, which was healed by a reconciliation about five weeks later, since which time the parties themselves and neighbors testify they have lived together very happily, and on November 2, 1925, without the knowledge or consent of respondent, Mrs. Bruegger redelivered the child, as she says, for "just a little while," to the appellant. However, after the reconciliation, and on December 26, 1925, the respondent and his wife went to the home of appellant, and, when they attempted to secure possession of the daughter, the appellant resisted, and respondent was arrested by police officers of El Segundo called for that purpose, and charged with attempted kidnapping. Mr. and Mrs. Bruegger testify that they were warned by the city recorder and officers to stay out of El Segundo. They also testify that on several occasions when they drove to El Segundo, for the purpose of catching a glimpse of respondent's child, their automobile would be followed by one or two motorcycle officers until they were out of town; that at one time they drove by and saw the girl tied by a rope to the back porch. They also testify that they attempted on several occasions to telephone to Mrs. Patterson, but that she would invariably hang up the telephone as soon as she recognized the voice of either Mr. or Mrs. Bruegger. Testimony also appears in the record to the effect that, when Agnes was placed in the school at El Segundo by the appellant, she warned the principal not to permit any one to see the child except the grandparents. Shortly after one year from December 26, 1925, had elapsed, the appellant here sought the permission of respondent to the adoption of Agnes by herself and her husband, she confessing on the stand to some knowledge of the law concerning abandonment during the time she retained possession of the child. The father refused his permission, and the various proceedings were instituted. It should also be added that Mr. and Mrs. Bruegger are financially able to care for the child, and there appears no present reason why they are unfit.

[2-4] It cannot be doubted from the foregoing résumé of testimony supporting the judgment that it is amply sufficient, especially when we bear in mind that, in order to constitute abandonment there must be an actual intent manifest to sever the parental relationship (In re Snowball, 156 Cal. 240, 104 P. 444), and also that a parent is not obliged to compensate a relative for the voluntary support of his child, in the absence of an agreement for compensation (Matter of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 123 P. 283). It should also be noted that it is not the policy of the law to interfere with, or discourage, the love of offspring, but rather to awaken, encourage, and promote parental love and responsibility. Guardianship of Michels, 170 Cal. 339, 149 P. 587. With such object in view, it is apparent that the fitness of the parent at the time of the proceeding is, and should be, the controlling factor.

Having before us these principles of law and humanity, it is obvious that the judgment should not be disturbed.

Judgment affirmed.

CONWAY v. CITRUS BELT LAND CO. et al.
(two cases). (Civ. 5821.)★

District Court of Appeal. Second District,
Division 1, California. Oct. 27, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 19, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Trial court's finding, if supported by any substantial evidence, cannot be disturbed on appeal.

If finding of trial court is supported by any substantial evidence, it cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Corporations ⇨1—Generally, each corporation must be considered a separate entity, but equity may treat corporation as one or more corporations or as private individuals.

It is a general rule that each corporation must be considered as a separate entity, but equity has power to, and in the administration of justice it may, decree that situation of interested parties demands that fictitious and assumed corporate personalities of such corporation be regarded as one or more corporations, or even as private individuals of which such corporations may be composed.

3. Corporations ⇨575—Neither corporation nor stockholder who voted for refinancing were entitled to relief against distribution of stock of new corporation in carrying out refinancing.

Where assets of corporation were transferred to new corporation in order that its assets might be saved for stockholders, and part of stock of new corporation was distributed pro rata among shareholders of old corporation, part sold for cash to pay debts, and part given to one for his services in carrying out transaction, held that neither old corporation nor its stockholder who had notice of facts and who voted for resolutions authorizing directors to refinance corporation were entitled to relief therefrom in actions commenced long after transaction was completed.

4. Appeal and error ⇨169—Appellate court will not consider issue not presented by pleadings.

Issue not presented by pleadings cannot be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John L. Fleming, Judge.

Two separate actions by Adrian C. Conway against the Citrus Belt Land Company and others, which were consolidated for trial. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. C. Pyle and John M. Thomas, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. Broadly stated, the underlying and outstanding facts appertaining to the litigation upon which the appeal herein is predicated are as follows: The Citrus Belt Land Company, a corporation with an authorized capital stock of $250,000, was the owner of a tract of land approximating 5,000 acres which it proposed to improve, subdivide, and sell. In attempting to carry out such program the corporation became financially involved to the extent of about $293,000 in unpaid and overdue debts—the greater part of which being represented by bonded indebtedness and mortgages. While if given plenty of time to work out of its difficulties the corporation probably was financially sound and responsible, in the sense that it was unable to meet its obligations as they became due the corporation was insolvent. Section 3450, Civ. Code. Its various creditors were pressing for payment of the respective sums of money due them and were threatening foreclosure proceedings. After the corporation had exhausted all its credit, means and sources of raising money for the discharge of its obligations, and after each of the directors of the corporation had likewise exhausted his personal ability to refinance the corporation, through the efforts of one Rex B. Clark a proposition was presented by a bond company to the corporation to the effect that if the corporation would change its corporate name, increase its authorized capital stock to the sum of $300,000, and issue bonds to the amount of its new capitalization, or, as an alternative, organize a new corporation with the identical capitalization of $300,000, which would take over the assets of the old corporation, for which stock in the new corporation would be issued in payment, and have the new corporation issue bonds in the sum of $300,000, the bond company would buy the bonds at a discount, and thus funds would be made available for the immediate relief of the financial difficulties of the corporation. For reasons which seemed sufficient, and especially for the purpose of expediting the desired ultimate result, the latter course was selected, with the result that a corporation known as the North Corona Land Company was organized, which, with the active assistance and co-operation of the old company (Citrus Belt Land Company), proceeded to and did carry out the plan hereinbefore outlined. In so doing, 1225 shares of the capital stock of the North Corona Company were issued to the Citrus Belt Land Company in payment of its assets, and which shares of stock in the North Corona Company, in turn, were distributed by the Citrus Belt Land Company to its stockholders in the proportion which the shares of stock owned by each stockholder therein bore to the total number of outstanding shares of the Citrus Belt Land Company.

Shortly prior to the time when the negotiations were concluded, looking to the accomplishment of the refinancing of the affairs of the Citrus Belt Land Company, an agreement had been entered into between it and Clark by which the latter was to become the purchaser from the former of 1204½ shares of the unissued and treasury stock of the Citrus Belt Land Company at a price of $50 per share. By reason of the foregoing facts, so far as the Citrus Belt Land Company was concerned, the execution of that agreement became impracticable; but, as a solution of the situation, the North Corona Company was substituted in the place of the Citrus Belt Land Company and issued to Clark its certificate of stock for the 1204½ shares of its capital stock in the place and stead of that number of shares which, according to the aforesaid agreement, should have been issued by the Citrus Belt Land Company. In addition thereto, as compensation for services performed by Clark in refinancing the Citrus Belt Land Company as aforesaid, the North Corona Company issued to Clark 70½ shares of its capital stock. Thereupon each of the two actions which are the foundation for this appeal was commenced. The main ultimate purpose of each of the actions was to have declared the illegality of the distribution of the shares of the capital stock of the North Corona Company among the stockholders of the Citrus Belt Land Company, to the end that the latter company and each of its directors would be held liable for such assumed illegal act in accordance with the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code. In the second action, however, additional damages were sought as against the corporations and each of their directors for their alleged unauthorized and illegal acts in selling the 1204½ shares of the capital stock of the North Corona Company at $50 per share, as well as for transferring the 70½ shares thereof to Clark for services performed by him. By stipulation entered into by the respective parties, and on order made by the trial court, the two actions were consolidated.

Based upon voluminous findings of fact, the lower court ordered judgment for the defendants. On the appeal therefrom appellant presents numerous specifications of error, which, among other things, include attacks upon various findings of fact upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support the same. To herein set forth the several findings to which objection is made, as well as the evidence bearing thereon introduced at the trial of the action, would entail no inconsiderable labor and occupy a space not to be justified by any novelty of legal principle involved.

[1] It is a well-settled rule that on appeal, if an attacked finding be supported by any substantial evidence, it cannot be disturbed. As to those findings to which appellant has directed attention, it may suffice to state that, with such rule in mind, after a careful examination of each of the findings of which complaint is made, together with the transcript of the evidence, this court is convinced that the contention of appellant with reference to the lack of substantial evidence in its support cannot be sustained.

The contention on the part of the appellant to the effect that the distribution by the Citrus Belt Land Company among its stockholders of the 1225 shares of the stock of the North Corona Company was in violation of the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, is based upon the assumption that the two corporations were separate and distinct entities, and that the transfer by the Citrus Belt Land Company of its assets to the North Corona Company amounted to a sale between the two corporations, each of which was wholly disconnected from the other and dealing at arm's length one toward the other. With reference to the relations existing between the two corporations, the general findings by the trial court in substance were that the plan hereinbefore outlined was adopted solely for the purpose of refinancing the affairs of the Citrus Belt Land Company in order that its assets might be saved for the benefit of its stockholders. Specifically, the trial court found:

"That thereafter it was deemed by the parties best to carry out said plan through a corporation under a new name, instead of through the old corporation, and thereupon the Citrus Belt Land Company, for the purpose of performing and carrying out said accepted plan of refinancing its affairs and saving its assets, and for no other purpose, caused to be incorporated and organized in January, 1921, the defendant North Corona Land Company, and in February, 1921, the Citrus Belt Land Company transferred and delivered to the North Corona Land Company all its lands, personal property and other assets, including its office, books, etc., and thereafter all business was transacted in the name of the North Corona Land Company who had the same directors and officers as the old company, except defendant Rex B. Clark became a director and its president. * * *

"That the North Corona Land Company was not so organized as a new, independent, or outside corporation, nor was the transfer to it by the Citrus Belt Land Company of its assets a sale of such assets, nor was the distribution of the North Corona Land Company stock by the Citrus Belt Land Company among its stockholders an unlawful distribution of corporate assets among its stockholders in violation of section 309, Civil Code.

"But the court finds that the North Corona Land Company was only a reorganization and continuation of the Citrus Belt Land Company under a new name, and that it was so organized, the assets transferred to it, and its stock distributed to the stockholders of the Citrus Belt Land Company for the sole purpose of effecting and carrying out the plan of refinancing the affairs of the Citrus Belt Land Company in accordance with its agreement with William R. Staats Company, to pay its debt, and save its assets for the benefit of its creditors and stockholders, and that all of said proceedings and acts did result in saving said assets from loss by foreclosure and sale, and in preserving them for the benefit of the creditors and stockholders of Citrus Belt Land Company and no one was injured thereby.

"That all said proceedings were authorized by the resolutions adopted at meetings of stockholders of Citrus Belt Land Company held May 26, 1919, and January 15, 1920, referred to above in finding 'Fourth,' and by those resolutions plaintiff authorized, consented to and approved all said acts and proceedings of the board of directors and refinancing said corporation."

[2] Considered broadly and without reference to conditions surrounding the organization of any two or more corporations, it is a general rule that each of such bodies must be considered as a separate entity. But equity has the power to, and in the administration of justice it may, decree that the situation of interested parties demands that the fictitious and assumed corporate personalities of such corporations be regarded either as one or more corporations, or even as private individuals of which such corporations may be composed. Wenban Estate, Inc., v. Hewlett, 193 Cal. 675, 696, 697, 227 P. 723. And the rule has had its application not only in cases where the rights of creditors were involved, but as well in other cases where the rights of stockholders among themselves were presented for the consideration of the court. Chater v. San Francisco Sugar Refining Co., 19 Cal. 220; Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446; Cornell v. Corbin, 64 Cal. 197, 30 P. 629; Kohl v. Lillenthal, 81 Cal. 378, 20 P. 401, 22 P. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520; Hunt v. Davis, 135 Cal. 31, 66 P. 957; Wise Realty Co. v. Stewart, 169 Cal. 176, 146 P. 534.

In the course of the several opinions in the authorities to which attention has been directed such expressions as the following may be found:

"The truth is, the corporation, under our system, following such an agreement would be the mere agency of the associates created for the sake of convenience in carrying out the agreement, as between those who made the bargain—the different characters or forms in which or by which the bargain was made, and the order in which the several parts of it were executed, makes no substantial difference in the obligation." Chater v. San Francisco Sugar Refining Co., 19 Cal. 220, 247.

"Substantial justice can be administered in this case by treating the parties in the light of their agreements between themselves, independently of their incorporation, and in no other way that we have been able to discover can this be done." Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446, 450.

"The corporation was formed as a mere agency for more conveniently carrying out the agreements of the parties; and the relation sustained by it to them is 'substantially, if not technically, that of a trustee.' And, as in the case cited, it must be held that 'substantial justice can be administered in this case by treating the parties in the light of the agreements between themselves, independently of their incorporation, and in no other way.'" Hunt v. Davis, 135 Cal. 31, 34, 66 P. 957, 958.

"The complete answer to all of these matters is found in the familiar principle that equity will look through form to substance, and so looking, it is beyond controversy that these corporations were but the mere instrumentalities through which the associates acted. If the transactions between the associates themselves were fair, then, as there are no rights of independent and nonparticipating stockholders involved, the corporate irregularities, however serious, mean nothing. If it were necessary equity indeed would compel the corporations themselves so to adjust, remodel, and reform their transactions as to give them a legal validity commensurate with their equitable validity." Wise Realty Co. v. Stewart, 169 Cal. 176, 185, 146 P. 534, 538.

[3] In the instant case, it is obvious that the course adopted and pursued throughout the transaction and which saw its culmination in the allotment and distribution by the Citrus Belt Land Company of the 1225 shares of stock of the North Corona Company was nothing other than the original plan of the stockholders and directors of the Citrus Belt Land Company. If the entire assets of that company were to be taken over by the North Corona Company, in the circumstances, the only way by which the respective stockholders of the Citrus Belt Land Company could be compensated would be by distributing to them shares of stock in the North Corona Company in the proportion which their shares in the Citrus Belt Land Company bore to its outstanding stock. Neither the Citrus Belt Land Company as a corporation, nor any of its stockholders (other than plaintiff), appears to be in anywise dissatisfied with the manner in which the refinancing of the Citrus Belt Land Company was accomplished; indeed, each of them has accepted his shares of stock in the new corporation and ratified the entire transaction. That plaintiff received his full and proper allowance is undisputed, and on that score he has no just cause of complaint. Furthermore, the evidence conclusively shows that at the outset, at a stockholders' meeting of the Citrus Belt Land Company, on which occasion the financial distress of the corporation was the principal subject of discussion, plaintiff personally voted in favor of a resolution adopted at such meeting whereby the board of directors of the corporation was authorized to "refinance the corporation upon such terms and in such manner as they may in their best judgment see fit, and to sell the property in whole or in part at such prices and on such terms as they may be able to make." And again, at a later date, under similar conditions, plaintiff himself offered and moved the adoption of the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted, to wit:

"Resolved that the directors of this company be authorized and instructed to take such action as they deem best to raise the necessary moneys to pay the interest on the bonds and other current indebtedness by assessment of the stock or such other manner as they may deem expedient."

Considering the facts (among others) that long before either of the actions herein was commenced, the transaction of which complaint is made was entirely completed; that, as found by the trial court, plaintiff had either actual or constructive notice of each of the several steps leading up to the distribution of the shares of stock of which he complains; that plaintiff voted in favor of the several resolutions authorizing the board of directors of the Citrus Belt Land Company to "refinance the corporation upon such terms and in such manner as they may in their best judgment see fit"—it is clear that neither the Citrus Belt Land Company as a corporation, nor plaintiff, either as a stockholder, or in his individual capacity, is entitled to any relief.

With respect to the sale to Clark of the 1204½ shares of stock, it appears from the evidence, and is so found by the trial court, that several months before the Citrus Belt Land Company was reorganized and refinanced, at a stockholders' meeting at which 1127½ shares of the 1295½ shares then outstanding were represented, "a resolution was adopted by the vote of all stock present, except plaintiff voted 'no,' and 104 shares not voting, authorizing the board of directors to sell or otherwise dispose of all the unissued shares of stock in the treasury of the company at such price and on such terms as may seem best to said board." "That thereafter, as above found, it was determined to reorganize the company by the organization of a new corporation, which should take over the assets and issue the new bonded indebtedness, and after said North Corona Land Company had been formed and issued its bonded indebtedness, it was agreed that said Clark would take 1204½ shares of said North Corona Land Company in place of the shares of the Citrus Belt Land Company which had become of no avail; that said Clark did pay, as agreed, the sum of $50 per share, aggregating $60,225, which was applied on the debts of said Citrus Belt Land Company, and said Clark advanced said money before it became due to prevent the creditors from enforcing their claims by foreclosure of their liens, and to preserve the assets from loss."

As to the 70½ shares which were transferred to Clark in payment of his services, the trial court found:

"That the Citrus Belt Land Company, out of the shares of North Corona Land Company stock received by it, transferred to Rex B. Clark 70½ shares in payment of his services in aiding its officers to induce its creditors to defer enforcement of their claims, and to refinance the corporation by a plan which saved its assets from sale and loss. The court finds that said Clark did render such services, and that said stock was not an unreasonable compensation therefor."

[4] Plaintiff's contention that no consideration was paid by Clark for the 1204½ shares is completely answered by the finding of the trial court to which reference has been had. Regarding the claim now made by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding in effect that the services rendered by Clark were of the reasonable value of the 70½ shares of stock which were transferred by the corporation in payment of such services, it is sufficient to say that no such issue was presented by the pleadings.

While many other points are suggested by appellant in his brief as a reason for a reversal of the judgment herein, on consideration thereof it appears that each of them is subsidiary to and dependent upon a decision in favor of the contentions made by him as affecting the several points which hereinbe-fore have received the attention of this court. It would follow that none of such suggestions requires consideration at this time.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; YORK, J.

The trial was by the court without a jury and the court found that:

"Within two years last past plaintiff performed and rendered services for defendant at the instance and request of defendant, which services were and are of the aggregate and reasonable value of $2,250, no part of which has been paid."

Judgment accordingly was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

Defendant was incorporated under the laws of the state of Delaware, with an authorized capital stock of $5,000,000, for the "particular purpose of engaging in the brokerage business, handling bond and first mortgage issues particularly, operating at Santa Barbara and vicinity." Upon application to the state corporation department of the state of California, defendant, for the purpose of acquiring a working capital, was granted permission to sell and issue 25,000 shares of its preferred and 25,000 shares of its common stock in units of one of preferred and one of common, at and for the price of $125 per unit, "cash, lawful money of the United States," for the foregoing purposes "or in exchange for 40 per cent. in cash and the promissory note or notes of the purchaser payable on or before one year." For the purpose of facilitating these sales in 1924, one Mr. D. Binkhorst was appointed fiscal agent with power to sell stock and appoint agents for that purpose and receive as his compensation a commission of 20 per cent. on the sales. Later Mr. Binkhorst was elected president of the company, and Dr. J. Underwood Hall was appointed managing director, with offices in San Francisco. In January of 1925 the plaintiff was appointed to act as a sales broker for the company, and upon proper application was granted a license by the state corporation commission to act as such sales broker. In February of 1925, as the result of the services of the plaintiff as sales broker, Mr. Thomas H. B. Varney was induced to buy $5,000 worth of defendant's stock, and plaintiff received from the defendant the sum of $500, being the amount of his agreed commission for effecting such sale. Thereafter the plaintiff, with the knowledge and at the request of defendant, continued to solicit Varney to purchase more stock, and in the latter part of March plaintiff was informed that Varney had purchased $160,000 worth of defendant's stock and that the sale had been consummated at the offices of the company through the activities of the president, Binkhorst, and the managing director, Dr. Hall. Whereupon plaintiff made demand both upon Binkhorst and Dr. Hall for the amount of commissions which the company agreed to pay him in the event of his procuring purchasers of the company's stock. Plaintiff, however, failed to receive any satisfactory answer from either of these par-

LIST v. REPUBLIC BOND & MORTGAGE CO. (Civ. 6400.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 29, 1928.

1. Brokers ⇨58—Broker held not entitled to commission for procuring purchaser of stock on terms violating corporation's permit though he acted in good faith (Corporate Securities Act, § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9).

Licensed broker employed by corporation to sell its stock on commission held not entitled to commission for procuring purchaser on terms prohibited by permit under which corporation was permitted to sell its stock in state, and which under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 680) § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9, constituted a felony, even though he was not aware of this fact when he brought suit for commissions.

2. Brokers ⇨86(4)—Evidence held not to sustain finding purchase of stock resulted from broker's efforts, so as to entitle broker to commission (Corporate Securities Act, § 12, and section 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9).

Evidence held insufficient to sustain any presumed finding that purchase of stock resulted from broker's efforts for which broker was entitled to commission, but showed that transaction was consummated by purchaser solely to recover property which he had deeded to corporation in making prior purchase which was illegal under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 680) § 14, as amended by St. 1925, p. 970, § 9, and which property he feared he could not recover if he sued for return of property because of participation in unlawful transaction under section 12.

ties, and on May 11, 1925, commenced this action.

The evidence given by plaintiff shows that he had a clear understanding with the company that he was to receive 10 per cent. upon sales of stock effected by him, and his testimony further shows that it was he and he alone who first interested Varney in the purchase of stock, and that "but for" the plaintiff, Varney would never have become interested in the company. And the testimony further shows that up to the latter part of March plaintiff was constant in his efforts to sell to Varney stock in addition to the $5,000 worth that he had already sold him; furthermore, that plaintiff was, without doubt, acting in good faith in believing that Binkhorst and Dr. Hall had on behalf of the company, on or about March 19, 1925, effected a sale to Varney of $160,000 worth of stock, upon which he, the plaintiff, would be entitled to receive his commission of 10 per cent. But the evidence further shows that, as a matter of fact, no lawful sale of stock was at that time made. At the trial of the case it was conclusively shown that the terms upon which the sale was attempted to be made by Binkhorst and Dr. Hall were in violation of a penal statute of the state, enacted for the protection of corporations and the investing public. As already noted, the permit under which the corporation was permitted to sell its stock explicitly provided that the sales should be for cash or for 40 per cent. in cash and the balance in notes, secured by the purchased stock, and the permit further provided that the total commissions and all other expenses incurred in connection with the sale of shares "shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the amount of the selling price of each unit, provided that no part thereof shall be paid until 40 per cent. of the purchase price shall have been received by the company." And section 14 of the Corporate Securities Act of the state of California, as amended in 1925 (Stats. 1925, c. 447, p. 970), provides as follows:

"Every officer, agent, or employee of any company, and every other person, who knowingly authorizes, directs, or aids in the issue or sale of, or issues or executes, or sells, or causes or assists in causing to be issued, executed, or sold, any security, in nonconformity with a permit of the commissioner then in effect authorizing such issue, or contrary to the provisions of this act, * * * or who, directly or indirectly, knowingly applies, or causes or assists in causing to be applied, the proceeds, or any part thereof, from the sale of any security to any purpose contrary to the provisions of the permit authorizing the issue of such security, * * * in violation of any of the provisions of this act, sells or offers the same for sale, * * * or who, in any other respect, willfully violates or fails, omits, or neglects to obey, observe or comply with any order, permit, decision, demand, or requirement, or any part or provision thereof, of the commissioner under the provisions of this act, * * * is guilty of a public offense and shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in a county jail not exceeding two years, or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

[1] The evidence at the trial further shows that on or about March 19, 1925, there was issued and transferred to Varney 1,280 units of stock of the value of $160,000, but that the only consideration therefor received by the company, or intended at the time of the sale to be received by the company, was the sum of $10,000 in cash, and three pieces of real estate lying respectively in the counties of Santa Clara, Marin, and San Francisco, of the estimated value of $142,500, and the verbal promise on the part of Varney to pay $7,500. The transfer of the real estate was evidenced by deeds duly executed and recorded, and the cash was represented by the conversion of a loan in that amount to the company by Varney, which was applied on the purchase price. As stated by the trial judge at the trial:

"The note for $10,000 was part payment on the $160,000 stock purchase, the balance by the original agreement was in real estate. That is all there is to that * * * the court is not going to hold that the stock was paid for in cash; I cannot do that; it is not the fact."

It is true that for reasons best known to themselves the subscription for the stock as signed by Varney and the officers of the company, Mr. Binkhorst and Dr. Hall, did recite that the consideration of the stock was cash. But, as already noted, the evidence showed that no cash, except the sum of $10,000, was paid or intended at the time to be paid by Varney for the stock. Consequently the plaintiff cannot be permitted to collect a commission for procuring a purchaser to purchase upon terms which are, by statute, denounced as the commission of a felony. But, as already indicated, the plaintiff was not aware of this fact at the time he brought his suit, but, on the contrary, had no reason to believe that the officers of the company were attempting to sell the stock of the company in violation of the permit issued by the state corporation commission. This is the more evident because shortly before taking up his duties as sales agent of the company he was assured by the managing director of the company in his serial letter:

"To all members of sales staff: The most valuable thing that we possess is our good name. We are intrusting it to your care in the belief that you will guard it well. It would be easy to destroy it. We do not believe, however, that you in whom we place full confidence will be guilty of compromising that name in the least. It is our chief asset, and without it we would be poor indeed; * * * in other words, we do not want and will not have anything but clean business."

Notwithstanding, then, the good faith of the plaintiff in demanding his share of the commissions on what he believed was a legitimate sale, he cannot be permitted to recover for any services he may have rendered in even unconsciously aiding the officers of the company in consummating an unlawful or void sale, denounced by the statute as the commission of a felony. Atwater v. A. G. Edwards, etc., Co., 147 Mo. App. 436, 126 S. W. 823, 826; Volker v. Fisk, 75 N. J. Eq. 497, 72 A. 1011; Cone v. Keil, 18 Cal. App. 675, 679, 124 P. 548; Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., 189 Cal. 467, 209 P. 36; Smith v. Bach, 183 Cal. 259, 191 P. 14.

[2] But it is the contention of the respondent that the judgment of the court awarding to the plaintiff the sum of $2,250 should be sustained by reason of certain transactions had by Varney with the company after the commencement of the action, which resulted in July of 1925 in Varney subscribing to stock of the company to the extent of $45,000. It is respondent's contention that the procuring causes of the foregoing subscription were the services rendered by the plaintiff in soliciting Varney up to the time of the foregoing transaction of March 19th. And in this behalf learned counsel contend that the services of plaintiff were "the cause originating a series of events that without break in their continuity result in the accomplishment of the prime object of the employment of the agent." 4 Cal. Jur. 584. But as regards this contention the testimony clearly shows that there was a potent and sufficient cause entirely independent of the activities of plaintiff which of itself and without any assistance from plaintiff was the proximate cause of Varney's purchase of the $45,000 of stock in July, 1925. For the evidence shows that shortly after the illegal and felonious transaction of March 19th, that Varney became advised of the fact that he had no legal title to the 1,280 shares of stock. And this was not unwarranted advice, for section 12 of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, c. 532, p. 679) provides that:

"Every security issued by any company, without a permit of the commissioner authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void, and every security issued by any company, with the authorization of the commissioner but not conforming in its provisions to the provisions, if any, which it is required by the permit of the commissioner to contain, shall be void."

And, as already noted, Varney had divested himself of the legal title to his real estate of the presumable value of $142,500 and $10,000 in cash as the result of transactions in which it might be held he himself was in pari delicto. So that, had he brought suit for the return of his property after his stock certificate had been canceled he would be in danger of being left where he had placed himself by his participation in an unlawful transaction. Domenigoni v. Imperial Live Stock, etc., Co., supra; Tatterson v. Kehrlein (Cal.

App.) 263 P. 285; Parrish v. American Ry., etc. (Cal. App.) 256 P. 590.

"What started the investigation or the inquiry in regard to the irregularity of this deal? A. When I was at the directors' meetings or at the stockholders' meetings, or either, some very promiscuous talks were made there at the meetings which did not meet with my ideas. I became doubtful as to the standing of the company. I went to my attorney with the matter. Q. After you have made, after the stock had been issued to you, you became rather dissatisfied with it? A. More than rather. Q. In particular, with Mr. Binkhorst? A. Yes. Q. It was because of that dissatisfaction with Mr. Binkhorst that you rescinded or changed this agreement? A. It was because of the way the company was run. Q. You then went to your lawyers to see some way for you to get out of it? A. I went to my lawyer to see, to question him as to the transaction, and learn from him which was illegal, and naturally I wanted to make it legal, if I could. Q. You used that method; you used the claimed illegality of the sale or transaction to force a compromise? A. I act with my attorney; I don't know what to answer to that question, hardly. * * * Q. When you say you were dissatisfied, why were you dissatisfied; when you say you were dissatisfied by the way in which the company was run, why were you dissatisfied? A. From what I could see, the company was run for the sake of making commissions on the sale of stock; it was not run to build up the business."

As the result of negotiations between the attorneys for Varney and the attorneys for the company, the company accepted the proposal by way of compromise from Varney, that "with reference to the controversy as to the purchase of stock by me" the Republic Bond & Mortgage Company should cancel such subscription and should execute deeds to Varney of the three parcels of real estate deeded by Varney to the company, and that the company should issue to Varney a certificate for 360 units of stock in the company, and that Varney should pay to the company in cash the sum of $35,000 and that the company should retain the $10,000 formerly paid by Varney to the company.

Further testifying in regard to the transaction, Varney states:

"Q. Was the real estate to which I have referred, the Marin County property, the San Francisco property and the Santa Clara County property, ever returned to you? A. Yes. Q. Under what circumstances? A. It was returned to me because the sale of their stock to me for cash and the property was considered illegal. My attorneys told me that it was illegal, the sale. And the Republic Bond & Mortgage Company's attorneys also told me the sale was illegal, and another attorney told me the sale was illegal, and I wanted to get the matter straightened out. Q. Did you go to Los Angeles for that purpose? A. Yes. Q. There did you have conferences with the officers of the Republic Bond & Mortgage Company? A. Yes. Q. As a result of the conferences, was there any agreement reached?

A. Yes. Q. With reference to the transfer of your property, or the retransfer back to you of your property? A. Yes. Q. Was that expressed in writing? A. Yes."

Aside from the fact that this transaction was consummated more than two months after the commencement of the action, and at a time when Varney, so far from being a willing purchaser of the stock, was entirely distrustful of and dissatisfied with the company, and had apparently lost any enthusiasm for it that may have been engendered through his conversations with the plaintiff, and when his sole apparent motive was to recover the property which he had deeded without consideration to the company, it is sufficiently apparent that there is no evidence sufficient to sustain any presumed finding that the plaintiff, by any unbroken chain of circumstances, was the procuring cause of the acquisition by Varney in July, 1925, of the $45,000 of stock. Furthermore, there is no supplemental pleading upon which to base any such a finding.

Judgment will therefore be reversed.

2. Warehousemen $\S$ 24(4)—In absence of specific agreement, warehouseman does not become insurer of property against theft, and need only exercise ordinary care (Warehouse Receipt Act, $\S$ 21).

Under Warehouse Receipt Act (St. 1909, p. 441), $\S$ 21, in absence of specific agreement to contrary, bailee or proprietor of general warehouse does not become an insurer of property against theft, but he need only exercise ordinary care for protection of owner's property, such as would be used by owner himself under similar circumstances.

3. Warehousemen $\S$ 24(4)—What constitutes reasonable care on part of warehouseman against theft depends on circumstances and character of property (Warehouse Receipt Act, $\S$ 21).

What constitutes reasonable care on part of warehouseman against theft, under Warehouse Receipt Act (St. 1909, p. 441), $\S$ 21, depends largely on circumstances of case and upon value and character of property.

4. Warehousemen $\S$ 34(5)—Owner has burden of proving warehouseman was guilty of negligence, where goods were stolen.

Where goods in warehouse were stolen, owner has burden of proving negligence of warehouseman either in employment of servants or management of business, which negligence proximately contributed to loss of goods.

5. Warehousemen $\S$ 34(5)—Where owner has proved prima facie case against warehouseman where goods were stolen, burden is not on owner to establish warehouseman failed to operate business according to usual custom of warehousemen.

In action for damages for theft of goods in storage, where owner has proved prima facie case of negligence against warehouseman, burden is not on owner to establish fact that warehouseman failed to operate his business according to usual custom of warehousemen.

6. Warehousemen $\S$ 24(4)—Warehouseman must exercise ordinary care commensurate with value of goods stored and circumstances to protect property from theft from within and without.

Warehouseman must exercise due diligence and ordinary care commensurate with value of goods stored and circumstances of case to protect bailor's property from damage or theft from both within and without storehouse.

7. Warehousemen $\S$ 34(7)—Evidence supported finding that stored goods were stolen through warehouseman's negligence.

In action for damages for theft of goods in storage, evidence supported jury's findings that goods were stolen and that warehouseman was guilty of negligence in hiring and retaining employees and in conducting business which proximately contributed to theft.

8. Appeal and error $\S$ 1001(1)—Where evidence supports jury's verdict regarding warehouseman's negligence, its findings will not be disturbed on appeal.

In actions involving negligence of warehouseman, where there is substantial evidence supporting verdict of jury, its findings will not be disturbed on appeal.

9. Warehousemen $\S$ 24(7)—Warehouseman cannot limit liability for loss or damage so as to exempt itself from damages resulting from its negligence.

Warehouseman may not limit its liability for damage to or for loss of goods stored with them for hire so as to exempt itself from damages resulting from its own negligence nor to relieve itself from exercise of ordinary care, since effort on bailee's part to exempt itself from negligence is contrary to public policy.

10. Warehousemen $\S$ 24(7)—Where warehouseman was guilty of negligence resulting in loss of goods by theft, contract designed to limit its liability to \$25 per package was unavailing (Warehouse Receipt Act, $\S$ 21).

Where warehouseman was guilty of negligence which proximately resulted in loss of goods by theft, contract designed to limit its liability to $25 per package was unavailing under Warehouse Receipt Act (St. 1909, p. 441) § 21.

11. Warehousemen ⚡34(8)—Where warehouseman knew crates, later stolen through its negligence, contained liquor, warehouseman was liable for value thereof.

Where warehouseman knew that crates, later stolen as result of warehouseman's negligence, contained liquor, warehouseman was liable to owner for value of liquor.

12. Warehousemen ⚡34(8)—Where warehouseman did not know crates, later stolen through its negligence, contained valuable art goods, warehouseman was liable only for amount it had reason to suppose they were worth (Civ. Code, § 1840).

Where warehouseman did not know that boxes contained valuable art goods and boxes were stolen as result of warehouseman's negligence, warehouseman was liable only for $25 for each box, where contract provided that responsibility was limited to $25 unless value was made known, under Civ. Code, § 1840, providing that liability of depositary for negligence cannot exceed amount he is informed by depositor, or has reason to believe, thing deposited is worth.

13. Trial ⚡260(7)—In action for theft of goods, refusing instruction covered by instructions given held not error.

In action for damages for theft of goods in storage, refusal of instruction that burden was on plaintiff to show defendant failed to exercise due care in choice of employees and that fact that employee might prove to be dishonest was no evidence of negligence on employer's part, held not error, where it was fully covered by other instructions given.

14. Trial ⚡253(5) — Instruction that bailor, receiving warehouse receipt listing delivery of some packages, together with notice of limited liability, acquiesced in limitation of value as to subsequent boxes delivered, held properly refused because omitting element of negligence.

In action for damages for theft of goods in storage, instruction that bailor, receiving warehouse receipt on which was listed delivery of first packages, together with printed notice of $25 limitation of liability attached thereto, acquiesced in such limitation of value as to all subsequent boxes delivered because all goods were stored in same room, held properly refused because omitting element of negligence.

15. Trial ⚡194(11), 240—Instruction that bailor receiving warehouse receipt listing delivery of some packages, together with notice of limited liability, acquiesced in limitation of value as to subsequent boxes, held properly refused as argumentative and invading jury's province.

In action for damages for theft of goods in storage, instruction that bailor receiving warehouse receipt on which was listed delivery of several packages, together with printed notice of $25 limitation of liability attached thereto, acquiesced in such limitation of value as to all subsequent boxes delivered because all goods were stored in same room, held properly refused as argumentative and as invading province of jury.

16. Warehousemen ⚡34(10)—Instruction that warehouseman cannot limit its liability against its own negligence by contract held proper.

In action for damages for theft of goods in storage, instruction that warehouseman could not limit its liability against its own negligence by contract, and any contract to that effect would be void, held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action for damages for theft of goods in storage by George H. England against the Lyon Fireproof Storage Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment modified and, as modified, affirmed. Superseding 269 P. 459.

Howard S. Clewett, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ben F. Gray and Geo. S. Hupp, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment and verdict of $4,000 damages on account of the theft of goods while stored in the defendant's warehouse at Los Angeles. The defendant was engaged in warehouse business at that city. The plaintiff and his family were about to leave their residence in Los Angeles to travel abroad, and on December 10, 1920, he packed their household goods in various boxes and containers and hauled them to the warehouse of defendant for storage during their absence. These goods were received by the defendant, and the packages were consecutively numbered from 1 to 57, inclusive, and listed upon duplicate warehouse receipts, one of which was retained by the defendant and the other was delivered to the plaintiff. A few days later other boxes and packages of household goods and effects were also delivered to the defendant. This second consignment included seven cases of whisky, the contents of which were made known to the defendant. These goods were also numbered and listed on the back of defendant's original warehouse receipt, but a duplicate of this last list was not given to the plaintiff. The entire consignment of goods was stored in a separate room in defendant's warehouse, and the door to the room was securely locked. No other person's goods were placed in this same storeroom. Several employees of the defendant held pass-keys to all the rooms of the warehouse, including the room in which plaintiff's goods were stored. When the pass-keys became worn and failed to operate in the locks, new ones were procured and the old ones were carelessly thrown into the wastebaskets or rubbish. Upon other occasions liquor had been stolen from the warehouse, and once another storeroom had been burglarized. The president of the defendant corporation had been warned that a certain one of his employees was a bootlegger, and, while the president admitted that he had secured a detective to investigate the charge, he retained this man in his employ.

Upon plaintiff's return after three years' absence, he called upon the defendant to reclaim his property. On going to his storeroom, the employee who accompanied him fumbled with the lock and complained about the difficulty of opening it. Upon unlocking and entering the storeroom, however, he found three boxes opened, empty, and the contents missing, including a number of valuable pictures, hand-painted china porcelain and Dresden ware, bronze and ivory statues, bric-a-brac, rugs and laces of rare value, together with the entire stock of liquor. The liquor was stipulated to be worth $400. Suit was brought against the defendant for negligently suffering the theft of the goods, and a verdict of $4,000 was rendered against the defendant.

The defendant seeks a reversal of the judgment on the ground that (1) the boxes in question were received empty, and asserts that the theft never occurred; that (2) the judgment is not supported by the evidence, for the reason that there is a total lack of proof of negligence proximately contributing to the theft; that (3) the liability of the defendant was specifically limited by the provisions of section 1840, Civil Code, and the language of the warehouse receipt to $25 per package; and that (4) the trial court erred in giving and refusing certain instructions.

[1] Defendant's contention that the boxes in question were empty when they were delivered for storage, and that the theft did not occur, are without merit. The plaintiff himself testified to the packing and specific contents of these boxes, each item of which is mentioned in the complaint. He accompanied the van which hauled them to the warehouse, and went with them to the sixth floor and saw them packed in the storeroom. Defendant's manager accepted and listed on the warehouse receipt each of these boxes. The liquor was first brought to the warehouse wrapped in heavy paper and without the necessary government permit for removal. The defendant refused to accept it for storage in this condition, and it was returned and repacked in one of the boxes in question, and then brought back to the warehouse with the government permit, which was exhibited to the foreman. These three boxes, weighing about 200 pounds each, were then marked by the foreman Nos. 62, 63, and 65, respectively, and were listed by him on the warehouse receipt, in each instance as "box & con." This clearly implies that the boxes, when received by the defendant, were not empty. Upon the contrary, the indorsement on the receipt is an acknowledgment of the existence of "contents" of some sort, in the boxes. Plaintiff was present when the storeroom was first opened at the time when he went to reclaim his property, and immediately observed the broken and empty boxes and commented upon the theft to the employee. This furnishes ample evidence to support the loss of the goods.

[2-5] In the absence of a specific agreement to the contrary, a bailee or proprietor of a general warehouse does not become an insurer of property against theft. All that is required of him is the exercise of ordinary care for the protection of the owner's property such as would be used by the owner himself under similar circumstances. The question as to what constitutes reasonable care on the part of a bailee for hire depends largely upon the circumstances of the particular case and upon the value and character of the property intrusted to him. California Warehouse Receipts Act, Stats. 1909, c. 290, § 21; 25 Cal. Jur. 957, § 15; 27 R. C. L. 992, § 51; 6 C. J. 1121, § 61; 3 R. C. L. 96, § 23; Runkle v. Southern Pac. Milling Co., 184 Cal. 714, 195 P. 398, 16 A. L. R. 275; Webber v. Bank of Tracy, 66 Cal. App. 29, 33, 225 P. 41; Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Pacific Transfer Co., 120 Wash. 665, 208 P. 55, 26 A. L. R. 217, and note. Mere evidence of the theft of goods left in the custody of a bailee, even though they were stolen by his servant or employee, is insufficient to charge him with negligence and liability for their loss, and the burden is upon the owner to supply evidence from which it may be reasonably inferred that the bailee was guilty of negligence either in the employment of his servants or the management of his business, which negligence proximately contributed to the loss of the goods. 27 R. C. L. 993, § 51; 40 Cyc. 472, § 6; Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Pacific Transfer Co., supra, 120 Wash. 665, 208 P. 58, 26 A. L. R. 217; Exporters' & Traders' O. & W. Co. v. Schulze (Tex. Com. App.) 265 S. W. 133; Balice v. Erie Ry. Co., 208 App. Div. 427, 203 N. Y. S. 636. Where, however, the owner of the goods has proved a prima facie case of negligence against the warehouseman, the burden is not on the bailor to establish the fact that the bailee failed to operate his business according to the usual custom of warehousemen. In order that an owner may recover damages from a bailee for hire for the theft of his goods, it is necessary that the bailor should sustain the burden of showing acts, conduct, or omissions on the part of the warehouseman amounting to a lack of ordinary care of the property left in his custody, but this burden does not require the bailor to affirmatively prove the usual custom among warehousemen with relation to the operation of their business, as this is a matter of defense, the burden of which rests upon the bailee. Runkle v. Southern Pac. Milling Co., 184 Cal. 714, 721, 195 P. 398, 16 A. L. R. 275.

In 27 Ruling Case Law, 992, it is said:

"A warehouseman is bound to exercise reasonable care to avoid the theft of the stored goods. * * * Such a company is required to use that degree of care in the safe-keeping of property which is demanded from a bailee for hire in the keeping of valuable property. He must use such care in the protection of the property from thieves without and thieves within, in the selection of its employees, and in the supervision of their conduct." Cussen v. Southern California Savings Bank, 133 Cal. 534, 65 P. 1099, 85 Am. St. Rep. 221.

In the case last cited it was held that a bank was liable to the owner for a theft of valuable articles taken from a safe-deposit box, where it was shown that one of the duplicate keys to the box was left accessible to the employees of the bank, and where the vault had been placed in the custody of a 17-year old lad, employed without previous inquiry as to his honesty, and who was paid but $30 per month for his services, and remained in the service of the bank but three months. In sustaining a verdict of a jury in that case, it was said:

"The jury might well say that proper care was not exercised in the selection" or rejection "of this employee."

In that case Justice Garoutte quoted with approval from the case of Preston v. Prather, 137 U. S. 604, 11 S. Ct. 162, 34 L. Ed. 788, as follows:

"Persons, therefore, depositing valuable articles with them expect that such measures will be taken as will ordinarily secure the property from burglars outside and from thieves within, * * * and also that they will employ fit men, both in ability and integrity, for the discharge of their duties, and remove those employed whenever found wanting in either of these particulars. An omission of such measures would in most cases be deemed culpable negligence so gross as to amount to a breach of good faith, and constitute a fraud upon the depositor."

[6] It will thus be seen that a bailee for hire, who conducts a regular business of storing goods for hire, must exercise due diligence and ordinary care commensurate with the value of the goods stored and the circumstances of the case, to protect the bailor's property from damage or theft from both without and within the storehouse. He must provide buildings, storage apartments, and facilities for locking the doors and windows adequate to safeguard the goods with ordinary care against the depredations of thieves, and he must exercise due care in the employment and retaining of men about the storehouse of known honesty and ability.

[7, 8] In the present case it may be inferred from the verdict that the jury of necessity found, not only that the plaintiff's goods were stolen, but that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the hiring and retaining of employees and the conduct of his warehouse business which proximately contributed to the theft. These findings are supported by substantial evidence. Among the goods which were stored and stolen were seven cases of liquor. The defendant had previously lost by theft other consignments of liquor. It had been warned that a certain employee who worked about the storehouse was a bootlegger, which charge imputed dishonesty to the employee. The president of the corporation defendant was suspicious of this employee, and hired a detective to watch him, yet he was not discharged. The plaintiff's goods were stored in a separate room apart from all other goods, and the door to this room was securely locked. There was no occasion for any employee to visit this room or to have access thereto during the absence of the plaintiff, yet master keys which fitted all the rooms of this warehouse, were supplied to several employees. When these keys became worn so that they would operate in the locks with difficulty, new ones replaced them, and the old ones were carelessly thrown into a wastebasket or in the debris, where they were accessible to the employees or loafers about the place. We are of the opinion that this evidence furnishes substantial proof of negligence. In actions involving the negligence of a warehouseman, the usual rule applies with respect to what constitutes ordinary diligence for the protection of the owner's goods, and, where there is substantial evidence, in this regard to support the verdict of a jury, its findings will not be disturbed on appeal. 27 R. C. L. 1004, § 65; 40 Cyc. 482, § 8; Garrette v. Grangers' Business Ass'n, 58 Cal. App. 396, 208 P. 1010.

The case of Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Pacific Transfer Co., supra, is relied upon by appellant in support of its contention that the evidence in the present case does not uphold the findings of negligence on its part. The facts of that case, however, were radically different from those of the present case. The record discloses the fact that plaintiff rented a space in the defendant's warehouse in which to store a large quantity of automobile tires. This space was inclosed with a lattice partition which extended only to within three feet of the ceiling, thus leaving an aperture over which one could easily climb. The plaintiff was furnished keys to this inclosure and to the warehouse, and always had free access to both. It was not assumed by the parties that this inclosure was burglar proof. It was constructed and maintained as a mere convenience by means of which to keep plaintiff's tires separate from other goods which were stored in the warehouse. No goods had been previously stolen from the warehouse, and there was neither suspicion on the part of the defendant nor warning received regarding the dishonesty of its employees. Two of the defendant's servants did, however, steal the tires. The evidence was deemed to be insufficient to uphold a finding of negligence on the part of the defendant. The foregoing recital of facts readily distinguishes that case from the present one without the necessity of comment. It is therefore not authority for the reversal of this case.

The appellant claims that the damages for loss of the goods in question was limited by contract to the sum of $25 per package. It is true that when the first 57 packages were received and listed a duplicate warehouse receipt signed by respondent was given to him, and contained the following provision:

"It is agreed that said goods shall be stored at owner's risk of damage by moth, vermin, rust, fire, heat, leakage or injury to fragile articles that are not packed. * * * The responsibility of this warehouse for any piece or package, or its contents, is limited to the sum of $25, unless the value thereof is made known at the time of the storing, and receipted for in the schedule, and an additional charge made for the higher valuation. * * *

[9, 10] In the absence of negligence on the part of a bailee, the owner of goods who signs a warehouse receipt for their custody will ordinarily be bound by the express terms and conditions of his contract. 25 Cal. Jur. 962, § 18; 27 R. C. L. 997, § 57; Taussig v. Bode, 134 Cal. 280, 66 P. 259, 54 L. R. A. 774, 86 Am. St. Rep. 250; McMullin v. Lyon Fireproof Storage Co., 74 Cal. App. 87, 95, 239 P. 422; Cunningham v. International Comm. of Y. M. C. A., 51 Cal. App. 487, 197 P. 140; Wilson v. Transfer & Storage Co., 201 Cal. 701, 258 P. 596. But a warehouseman may not limit his liability for damage or loss of goods stored with him for hire, so as to exempt himself from damages resulting from his own negligence, nor to relieve himself from the exercise of ordinary care. The trend of modern authorities holds that such an effort on the part of a bailee to exempt himself from negligence is contrary to public policy. Dieterle v. Bekin, 143 Cal. 683, 688, 77 P. 664; Northwestern M. F. Ass'n v. Pacific W. & S. Co., 187 Cal. 38, 41, 200 P. 934; Taussig v. Bode, supra; Morse v. Imperial Grain & Warehouse Co., 40 Cal. App. 574, 181 P. 815; Langford v. Nevin (Tex. Com. App.) 298 S. W. 536; Carley v. Offutt, 136 Ky. 212, 124 S. W. 280, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1114, 136 Am. St. Rep. 207, 248, note; 40 Cyc. 437; 27 R. C. L. 997, § 57. Section 21 of the California Warehouse Act (Stats. 1909, p. 437) provides:

"A warehouseman shall be liable for any loss or injury to the goods caused by his failure to exercise such care in regard to them as a reasonably careful owner of similar goods would exercise."

From the verdict in the present case it must be presumed that the jury found the appellant guilty of negligence which proximately resulted in the loss of the goods by theft. There is substantial evidence to support this finding, and the contract designed to limit appellant's liability to $25 per package is therefore unavailing in that regard. Section 1840 of the Civil Code, however, provides:

"The liability of a depositary for negligence cannot exceed the amount which he is informed by the depositor, or has reason to suppose, the thing deposited to be worth."

Upon rehearing of the present case we are convinced that the record indicates clearly that the respondent failed to disclose to the bailee at the time of depositing his goods for storage, either the value or character of the contents of the three boxes involved in this suit, except the liquor therein contained, which upon the trial was stipulated to be worth $400. It appears that upon delivery of the first consignment of goods for storage the appellant refused to accept the liquor for the reason that it was not properly crated and because the respondent held no government permit to move the liquor. It was therefore taken away and subsequently returned crated with the art goods heretofore mentioned and accompanied with a proper permit for removal. The respondent testified in this regard:

"Q. You didn't tell anybody what was in those three boxes, did you? A. It wasn't necessary; they knew, * * * the foreman and the men that were—"

The court, interrupting, said:

"He asked you a question. A. Yes, I did. Q. Whom did you tell? A. I think it was the foreman. * * * Q. That was when you brought the three boxes in? A. Yes, I did as he suggested—I packed these cases and these boxes. * * * Q. But did you tell him when you came back, that you had packed these cases in these boxes? A. Yes. Q. You did? A. Yes, sir; I told him the same goods only boxed up. * * * Q. You don't know what position this man occupied with the company? * * * A. I judged at the time and have always been under the impression that he was the foreman; he seemed to have authority. Q. Now, just what did you say to him? A. Well, I brought back those goods, boxed up as he advised me. Q. You didn't tell him what there was in those boxes, except whisky? A. No, I did not. Q. You didn't tell anybody about the value (of what) you said was in those boxes? A. No, sir, I did not. * * * Q. You did not indicate by marks on the outside, that they contained treasure articles? A. No. * * * Q. Did any of the employees ask you what was in those boxes? A. Yes—No, they asked me if I had a license to move what was in them. * * * I told them I had sent to San Francisco to procure the license; I took it out and showed it to them; I told them I had sent for it because they suggested my doing so. * * * Q. Now, other than the conversation about whisky, at the time that you made the original deposit of the goods, was there any inquiry made by the defendant or any of its employees there, as to the character or the value of the goods you were then depositing? A. No."

[11, 12] It is apparent from the foregoing testimony that the appellant knew that these crates contained the liquor. He had frequently had liquor stored with him before, and had ample reason to know of its approximate value. At the trial it was stipulated to be worth $400. To this extent, at least, the appellant was bound to recompense the owner for the loss through its negligence. Concerning the contents of these boxes, other than the liquor, the evidence fails to show that the appellant had either knowledge of their identity or value. While the evidence does show that the respondent at first replied in response to the question: "You didn't tell anybody what was in those boxes, did you? A. It wasn't necessary, they knew. The Court: He asked you a question? A. Yes (I did tell them)," had reference only to the liquor contained in the boxes. From a fair construction of the testimony it must be conceded that the entire conversation was regarding the liquor, and that the remaining contents of these boxes was not disclosed. For this reason the limitation of liability fixed by section 1840, Civil Code, should prevail, and the judgment must therefore be reduced to the amount of the stipulated value of the liquor, plus the additional sum of $25 for each of the three boxes in question.

[13] Finally, the appellant assigns as error the giving and refusing of certain instructions by the court. Defendant's instruction No. 17, which was refused, charged the jury that:

"* * * An employer is presumed to have exercised due care in the choice of his employees, and the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that the defendant failed to exercise such care, and the mere fact that an employee may prove to be dishonest is no evidence of negligence on the part of the employer, or of failure to exercise due care in the choice of such employee."

The refusal of this instruction was not error, since it was fully covered by other instructions which were given. The court charged the jury that a bailee for hire was not an insurer of the safety of property intrusted to him, but was required to use only ordinary care to protect it from damage or loss such as a prudent man would exercise for the preservation of his own property. And the jury was further instructed:

That the defendant "was required to use such (ordinary) care in the selection of its employees and in the supervision of their conduct after they were employed."

And further that, "if it is established that the property was stolen * * * by the servants of the bailee, * * * it is then incumbent upon the bailor to introduce evidence from which the jury might legitimately infer that the loss or theft was due to lack of ordinary care on the part of the bailee."

And also that "the burden * * * is on the plaintiff to show that the defendant failed to exercise due care in the choice of its employees, and the mere fact that an employee may prove to be dishonest, is no evidence of neglect on the part of the employer, or of failure to exercise due care in the choice of such employee."

These and other instructions along this line, fully advised the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to prove the negligence of the defendant in the employment of dishonest servants before it could be held liable on that score.

[14, 15] The court also refused to give defendant's instructions numbered 2D, 13, 13A, and 15, to the effect that, by delivering to respondent the duplicate warehouse receipt upon which was listed the first delivery of packages numbered from 1 to 57, inclusive, together with the printed notice of a $25 limitation of liability thereto attached, he acquiesced in such limitation of value as to all subsequent boxes delivered, for the reason that all the goods were stored in the same room, and the plaintiff failed to disclose to the defendant the actual value of the property. The refusal to so instruct the jury was not error. The jury was specifically instructed, in the language of section 1840, Civil Code, that the amount of damages recoverable for the loss of goods through the negligence of a bailee was limited to the value thereof as disclosed by the owner, unless the bailee had reason to otherwise know of its value. The jury was also fully instructed that the right to recover depended entirely upon proof of the negligence of the bailee. These instructions were erroneous for the reason that they omitted the element of negligence and sought to limit the liability to $25 per package, regardless of the exercise of reasonable care on the part of the bailee. These instructions were also argumentative and invaded the province of the jury, which had the exclusive right to determine whether it was the intent of the parties that this contract, attempting to limit the liability of the bailee, should apply to the second consignment of goods, for the storing of which no receipt was issued or delivered.

[16] The court correctly instructed the jury that—

"The defendant cannot limit its liability against its own negligence by contract, and any contract to that effect would be void."

Moreover, the jury was fully, fairly, and correctly instructed regarding the measure of damages for the loss of goods resulting from the negligence of a bailee, as follows:

"It is an express provision of the law that the liability of a depositary for negligence cannot exceed the amount which he is informed by the depositor, or has reason to suppose the thing deposited to be worth." Section 1840, Civil Code.

And further that:

"If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff did not inform the defendant of the value of the contents of the boxes in question, its liability cannot exceed the amount which it had reason to suppose the contents of the boxes to be worth."

The jury was also further instructed that:

"If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff did inform the defendant that said boxes contained whisky, but did not inform the defendant that they contained any other valuable articles, and that the defendant did not have reason to suppose that they contained other valuable articles, then, even if you find the defendant was negligent, nevertheless, the liability cannot exceed the value of the whisky which was stipulated to be $400."

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is modified to allow damages only for the loss of the stipulated value of the liquor, plus the added liability of $25 per package limited by the provisions of section 1840, Civil Code, aggregating the sum of $475. As so modified, the judgment is affirmed. The appellant will recover its costs.

SCHLIMPER v. DOYLE et al. (Civ. 6131.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 2, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨771—Mere ignorance of rules requiring filing of briefs within 30 days of transcript is not alone sufficient to relieve appellant of default (Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal Rule 1, § 4; Rule 5, § 1).

Appellant's ignorance of Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal, Rule 1, § 4, and Rule 5, § 1, requiring appellant to file printed points and authorities within 30 days after filing of transcript on penalty of having appeal dismissed, is not of itself sufficient to relieve appellant from his failure to comply with rules, but such excuse may be available to one in default if sufficient mitigating circumstances in addition thereto are made to appear.

2. Appeal and error ⇨771—Alleged lack of employment and inability to pay costs of appeal held insufficient to relieve appellant of failure to timely file briefs (Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal Rule 1, § 4; Rule 5, § 1).

Appellant's alleged lack of employment and consequent inability to pay costs of appeal held not a valid excuse for his failure to comply with Supreme Court and District Court of Appeal Rule 1, § 4, and Rule 5, § 1, requiring appellant to file printed brief within 30 days after filing of transcript on penalty of dismissal of appeal, where employer's affidavit showed appellant had been continuously employed for several months immediately following filing of transcript, and in view of fact that appellant's brief when filed consisted of but four printed pages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harry R. Archbald, Judge.

Action by Paul Schlimper against Mary Doyle and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion granted.

Arsen Yeretzian, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George L. Greer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. Motion to dismiss an appeal on the ground that appellant's brief was not filed "within the time prescribed by law."

The record shows that the clerk's transcript and the reporter's transcript of the proceedings in the lower court were each filed with the clerk of this court on June 27, 1928, and that the notice of motion to dismiss the appeal was served on appellant and filed in the office of the clerk of this court on September 14, 1928, at which latter date no brief on behalf of appellant had been filed in the office of said clerk.

Section 4 of rule 1 of the Supreme Court and of the District Court of Appeal provides in effect that—

"Within thirty days after the filing of the transcript, the appellant shall file with the clerk his printed points and authorities. * * *

And by section 1 of rule 5 it is provided that:

"If the transcript of the record or appellant's points and authorities be not filed within the time prescribed, the appeal may be dismissed upon notice given, either on motion of the respondent or of the court in which the appeal is pending. If the transcript, or the points and authorities, though not filed within the time prescribed, be on file at the time such notice is given, that fact shall be sufficient answer to the motion. * * *

[1] Appellant's answer to the motion to dismiss the appeal is by way of affidavit to the effect that he "did not know that it was essential that said brief should be filed within certain period of time," in addition to which fact he had "lost his employment and has not been able to pay the costs of this appeal, except by borrowing small sums periodically, from friends. * * *" The reply to such defense consists of an affidavit from the employer of appellant to the effect that, for a period of eight months next preceding the date of the affidavit, appellant had been constantly employed by affiant at a salary ranging between $26 and $30 per week—to which statement of fact appellant has made no denial.

As to the first reason advanced by appellant as an excuse for his failure to file his brief within the time prescribed by the rules of this court, to wit, that he "did not know that it was essential," it may be noted that, aside from the bald statement of appellant's ignorance of the rule, the affidavit is silent concerning any facts which might tend to account for his being unaware of the legal requirements as to the time when his brief should be filed. In matters of this sort it is a principle of long standing that in itself ignorance of a rule will not suffice as a reason for relieving a party from his failure to comply with it. Before such excuse may be available to one in default, some sufficient mitigating circumstances, in addition to mere lack of knowledge, must be made to appear.

[2] Nor, in the circumstances here presented, may the asserted lack of employment of the appellant and his consequent inability to pay the costs of appeal be considered as a valid excuse for his failure to comply with the rule of court. In the first place, the affidavit by the employer of appellant shows beyond question that appellant was continuously employed for at least several months immediately following the date when the transcript of the record was filed with the clerk of this court. In addition thereto, since the date when the notice to dismiss the appeal was filed, appellant has filed his long-delayed opening brief. As it consists of but four printed pages, even if his statement were true with reference to his having been out of employment, it would seem unlikely that the cost of printing the brief would have been so great as to prevent him from complying with the rule of court.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

ROBINSON v. POTTER. (Civ. 5239.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 31, 1928.

1. Brokers ⚡86(1)—Broker's letter, over month after oral contract to divide commission, held not conclusive or exclusive evidence of contract terms.

In action between real estate brokers for half of commission, letter from plaintiff to defendant, more than month after alleged oral contract to divide commissions was made, was evidence of terms of contract, but not conclusive or exclusive evidence; it being trial court's duty to weigh it along with plaintiff's oral testimony and all facts and circumstances in evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⚡1010(1)—Appellate court cannot weigh evidence nor set aside trial court's fact finding sustained by substantial evidence.

It is not the province of the District Court of Appeal to weigh evidence, and it would not be justified in setting aside trial court's finding, sustained by substantial evidence, that facts were as alleged in complaint.

3. Appeal and error ⚡1008(1)—Appellant's contention that respondent knew of property before contracting to divide commission held immaterial, where trial court found that respondent was not required to acquaint appellant with property unknown to him.

Defendant's contention, on appeal from judgment for plaintiff in action between real estate brokers for half of commission under verbal agreement, which trial court found did not require plaintiff to acquaint defendant with property not already known to latter, that court should have found for defendant because of three witnesses' uncontradicted testimony that defendant knew of property involved before contracting with plaintiff, need not be considered; such question being immaterial.

4. Brokers ⚡86(1)—Admission that property was sold to broker and two others held not to sustain contention that he received no commission.

Plaintiff's admission, in action between real estate brokers for half of commission under verbal agreement, that sale was made to defendant and two others, defendant getting quarter of property, held not to sustain contention that defendant received no commission, in view of vendor's testimony that he was to pay defendant regular commission, and that such commission was deducted from purchase price.

5. Brokers ⚡66—That broker purchased only fourth of property held not to limit his liability to fourth of commission agreed to be divided with another broker.

That real estate broker, sued for half of commission agreed to be divided with plaintiff, purchased only fourth of property, which was sold to him and two others, who were not brokers nor entitled to any commission, did not limit his liability to fourth of amount of judgment for plaintiff; defendant being real estate broker as to all of property and his regular commission deducted from purchase price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by J. Robinson against A. H. Potter. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. T. Hankey and Wood, Janeway & Pratt, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas J. Pitts, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an action between two real estate brokers in which the plaintiff recovered judgment for one-half the commission under an alleged verbal agreement to divide it.

Appellant puts forward four contentions upon which he relies for reversal, and which are stated in his own language, as follows:

"(1) That the agreement is set out in the respondent's letter of June 22, 1923. (2) That the meaning of the agreement is that respondent was to share in any commission received by appellant if respondent made appellant acquainted with some property not already known to appellant. (3) That the appellant did not receive any commission. (4) That if appellant received any commission, he only received one quarter of the amount stated in the findings."

[1, 2] The respondent wrote a letter to the appellant on June 22, 1923, about a month after the alleged oral agreement was made, demanding his share of the commission, in which he set out his recollection of the agreement somewhat differently than as he testified orally in court. It is not contended that the oral testimony of the plaintiff did not substantiate the allegations of the complaint. It is contended that this letter is "much more likely to be the true version of the agreement," and "therefore it must be taken that this letter sets out the true agreement." The contract was oral, and was made more than a month previous to the writing of the letter. While the letter was evidence bearing upon the question of the terms of the contract, it was not conclusive nor exclusive, but was to be weighed by the trial court along with the oral testimony and all the facts and circumstances in evidence bearing upon the question. There was substantial evidence to sustain the allegations of the complaint; and the trial judge, out of his long experience on the bench, weighed the evidence, and resolved it in favor of the plaintiff, finding the facts to be as alleged in the complaint. It is not the province of this court to weigh evidence, and it would not be justified in setting aside the finding of the trial court in this regard.

[3] Appellant's second contention falls with the first, for the agreement as found by the trial court did not require the plaintiff to acquaint the defendant with property not already known to him. This also disposes of the contention made by appellant in his closing brief that the trial court should have found for him, because the uncontradicted testimony of three witnesses was to the effect that the defendant already knew of the property in question before he made his contract with the plaintiff. Whether or not the property was already known to defendant was a question which it was unnecessary for the trial court to determine.

[4] It is next contended that appellant did not receive any commission, and, further, that "it is admitted that no commission was ever paid to appellant." We are referred to no such admission in the record. The admission to which we are referred is only an admission that the sale was made to the appellant and two others; the appellant getting a quarter of the property. On the other hand, there is the testimony of the owner and vendor that his talk with the appellant was to the effect that appellant came to him as a real estate broker; that he was to pay appellant the regular commission; and that his said commission was deducted from the purchase price.

[5] It is the final contention of appellant that, in any event, he should be held for only one-fourth of the amount of the judgment because he was a buyer of the property to the extent of only one-fourth thereof. We are unable to follow appellant in this contention. While it is true that he was a buyer to the extent of one-fourth of the property, he was a real estate broker as to all of it, and his regular commission was deducted from the purchase price. Neither of the other buyers was a real estate broker, and neither was entitled to any of the commission. It is a reasonable inference from the evidence that appellant received all of it. And the finding of the trial court in this regard will not be disturbed.

94 Cal. App. 557

NATIONAL CITY FINANCE CO. et al. v. LYNCH. (Civ. 3585.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 29, 1928.

1. Pleading — 18—Complaint, alleging assignor's wrongful acts depriving assignee of use of stock sold to another, held demurrable for uncertainty.

Complaint alleging that defendant caused corporation officers' refusal to transfer on books stock sold by plaintiff, to whom assigned by defendant as security for note, with intent to injure plaintiff in its business and unlawfully recover possession of stock, thereby causing purchaser to stop payment of check, and, in collusion with purchaser, caused him to deliver stock to defendant without plaintiff's knowledge, thereby depriving plaintiff of its use and requiring him to devote much time to ascertainment of facts, employ counsel, and go to large expense, all to plaintiff's damage in stated sum, held demurrable for uncertainty as to theory of recovery.

2. Courts — 212—Right to recover merely $30 damages in superior court for loss of interest on stock need not be considered on appeal.

Contention that plaintiffs are entitled to damages in sum of $30 for loss of interest on corporation stock wrongfully obtained by defendant need not be considered on appeal from judgment of superior court dismissing action, if no other right of recovery is stated, as complaint in such case does not state cause of action of which such court has jurisdiction.

3. Damages ⇨142—Damages, other than lost interest, though deprivation of use of corporation stock assigned to plaintiff, held not natural consequences recoverable without special pleading.

Damages to assignee of corporation stock as security for note by injury to business, stoppage of payment of check by one purchasing stock from assignee, deprivation of use thereof as collateral, or for sale under power in note, and time devoted to ascertainment of facts, employment of counsel, and expenses incurred therein, in addition to loss of interest, held not natural, necessary consequences of assignor's alleged wrongful acts in causing corporation officers to refuse to transfer stock on books, causing purchaser to deliver it to assignor without assignee's knowledge or consent, and withholding it from assignee, and hence not recoverable under general allegations of damages, but required to be specially pleaded.

4. Trover and conversion ⇨16—Assignee's action against assignor for wrongfully obtaining corporation stock from plaintiff's vendee cannot be treated as for conversion.

Where complaint alleged that plaintiff sold and delivered stock, assigned to it as security for note, without indicating that it had taken or contemplated any steps to rescind sale or recover stock from purchaser, action against assignor for damages for causing corporation officers to refuse to transfer stock on books and obtaining it from purchaser by collusion cannot be treated as one in conversion, as purchaser acquired entire title to stock, and plaintiff, having no interest therein, could not maintain such action.

5. Replevin ⇨80—Trover and conversion ⇨54—Expenditures in ascertaining facts and employing counsel cannot be recovered, where facts alleged constitute no cause of action in replevin or conversion.

Where facts alleged in complaint are insufficient to constitute a cause of action in replevin or conversion, alleged expenditures in ascertainment of facts and employment of counsel to ascertain and protect plaintiff's rights cannot be recovered, though allegations thereof indicate intent to state such a cause of action.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; William Hazlett, Judge.

Action by the National City Finance Company, a trust, and the trustees, doing business under such name and style, against J. G. Lynch. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Conover, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Kemp, Partridge & Kemp, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The trial court sustained the defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint of the plaintiffs without leave to amend, and about two months thereafter, no request for leave to amend being made, judgment was entered dismissing the action. The plaintiffs have appealed from the judgment.

[1] The complaint alleges:

That on or about January 20, 1926, the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff finance company his promissory note for $2,030, payable three months after the date mentioned and "as security for the payment of said note assigned in blank by his indorsement in writing and delivered to said National City Finance Company, 75 shares of preferred stock and 75 shares of common stock in the Credit Finance Company, * * * and agreed in said note that the said National City Finance Company may * * * sell or assign the shares and securities or any part thereof, its only obligation in respect thereto being to return to said defendant on payment of the above note on the date of maturity thereof, an equal number of shares of stock of the same class in said company. * * * That said note or any part thereof has not been paid, and will be due on or about the 19th day of April, 1926. That on or about the 21st day of January, 1926, the plaintiff under and by virtue of the authority given in said note sold and delivered to Bob Feinstein * * * 50 shares of said preferred stock and 50 shares of said common stock, in consideration of which the said Bob Feinstein * * * made and delivered to the plaintiff his check for the sum of $4,498. * * * The said defendant ordered, caused and procured the officers of said Credit Finance Corporation to refuse to transfer the said 50 shares of preferred and 50 shares of common stock upon the books of the corporation to the purchaser thereof * * * with the intent to injure the plaintiff in its business, and * * * with the intent and purpose of unlawfully repossessing himself of said * * * stock. * * * On account of said unlawful acts on the part of the defendant the said Bob Feinstein * * * did then and there stop the payment of said check, * * * by reason of which said check has not yet been paid and the price for which said stock was sold has not been received by the plaintiff." The defendant "unlawfully, wrongfully and in collusion" with Feinstein caused the latter to deliver the 50 shares of preferred stock and 50 shares of common stock to the defendant, "without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff thereto, and that said defendant has since that time unlawfully retained the full possession and control of said preferred and common stock * * * and has unlawfully withheld the same from the plaintiff and has thereby wrongfully deprived the plaintiff of the use of said * * * stock * * * and has unlawfully deprived the plaintiff of the use of the money and the interest and profits thereon, for which said * * * shares * * * of stock were sold as aforesaid, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum hereinafter mentioned. * * * The said defendant by reason of said unlawful acts above mentioned, has caused and required the plaintiff to devote a large amount of time to the ascertainment of the facts above alleged * * * and to employ counsel to ascertain and protect his rights and to go to large expense therein, to wit, the sum of $500. All to the damage of said plaintiff in the sum $5,000.

"Wherefore, plaintiff prays judgment against said defendant for the sum of $5,000 and for his costs in this action incurred and for such other and further relief as to the court may seem just and equitable in the premises."

The original complaint was filed April 16, 1926, and the amended complaint May 7, 1926.

The defendant demurred to the complaint on general and on many special grounds of uncertainty.

The complaint is uncertain as to the theory upon which the plaintiffs claim the right to recover. In the brief of appellants, their theory of the case is stated as follows:

"The intermeddling of the defendant in the transaction of the said securities on the books of the corporation and his collusion with said Bob Feinstein, in obtaining the same and withholding them from the plaintiff * * * has deprived the said plaintiff of the use of either said securities or the money for which they were sold * * * during the period elapsing between the date when the sale of said securities was made * * * and the date of maturity of said note. The least amount of damages that might be collected for the use of said money would be interest thereon at the rate of 7%, amounting to the sum of $30. * * * A greater element of damages, however, than the nominal monetary damages, is the interference with the contract obligation and duty which the defendant owes the plaintiff under the terms of said note and the annoyance and inconvenience caused by such violation of the rights of the defendant (plaintiffs?) thereunder. * * * The rights of the plaintiff were interfered with by the defendant, causing him the loss of the stock for its alternative use either (1) as collateral or (2) to sell under the power of sale given in the note. Since the power of sale in the note was exercised and the stock sold, the plaintiff was deprived of the purchase price and/or its use as collateral through the unlawful acts of the defendant."

[2, 3] The contention that the plaintiffs are entitled to damages in the sum of $30 on account of loss of interest may be dismissed from consideration because, if no other right of recovery is stated, the complaint does not state a cause of action of which the superior court has jurisdiction. Consolidated Adjustment Co. v. Superior Court, 189 Cal. 92, 94, 207 P. 552. Other elements of damage stated in the complaint or referred to in appellants' brief are not the natural and necessary consequences of the alleged wrongful acts, and cannot be recovered under general allegations of damages, but must be specially pleaded. Yoakam v. Hogan, 198 Cal. 16, 20, 243 P. 21; Judson Manufacturing Co. v. Lutge, 174 Cal. 566, 163 P. 1017; Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 251, 116 P. 513; Shaw v. Southern Pacific Co., 157 Cal. 240, 242, 107 P. 108; Mallory v. Thomas, 98 Cal. 644, 647, 33 P. 757; Mitchell v.

Clarke, 71 Cal. 163, 11 P. 882, 60 Am. Rep. 529; McCready v. Bullis, 59 Cal. App. 286, 290, 210 P. 638. Appellants seem to admit that the profits which they might have made by the use of the money for which shares of stock were sold to Feinstein "are too uncertain and remote to be susceptible of expression in monetary damages."

[4] The action cannot be treated as one in conversion, because the complaint alleges that the finance company sold and delivered the shares of stock to Feinstein. By this transaction Feinstein acquired the entire title to the stock. Fowles v. National Bank of California, 167 Cal. 653, 140 P. 271. There is nothing in the complaint to indicate that the finance company has taken, or contemplates taking, any steps to rescind the sale to Feinstein or to recover the stock from him. Having no interest in the stock, it has no standing to maintain an action for the conversion thereof.

[5] The allegation that the finance company has expended $500 in the "ascertainment of the facts," alleged in parts of the complaint, and the employment of "counsel to ascertain and protect" its rights, indicates that the intention was to state a cause of action in replevin or conversion, but, since the facts alleged are insufficient to constitute either of such causes of action, no grounds appear for the recovery of such expenditures.

The appellants having pointed out no logical theory upon which the complaint can be held sufficient, it is not deemed incumbent on the court to search further for such a theory.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLARK v. CLARK et al.

(Civ. 6096.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 11, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Assignments ⚡8—Heir may transfer his inheritance, though there is will or purported will in existence.

Heir has right to transfer his inheritance, even though there is will or purported will in existence.

2. Descent and distribution ⚡74, 86—Wills ⚡229—Father who was son's sole heir had property right, at instant of son's death, assignable for consideration, and right to contest son's will (Civ. Code, §§ 654, 655).

Father who was sole heir of son's property had property right in son's estate, at instant of son's death, which he could assign or transfer or surrender for consideration acceptable to him, and statutory right, which is property right, to contest will under Civ. Code, §§ 654, 655.

3. Husband and wife ⇨248½—Father's right as sole heir in son's property, vested in him prior to second marriage, held his separate property (Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164).

Under Civ. Code, §§ 163, 164, right of father to inherit son's property, vested in father prior to second marriage, held separate property of father.

4. Husband and wife ⇨248½—Property acquired by testator, who was sole heir of predeceased son, in compromise settlement of contest of son's will, held separate property of testator, though settlement was made after remarriage.

Where testator, who was sole heir of estate of his predeceased son, contested in good faith purported will left by son and after remarriage entered into compromise whereby testator received one-half of son's estate and permitted son's will to be probated, property acquired by testator as result of compromise was separate property of testator, though compromise was made and money received after remarriage.

5. Descent and distribution ⇨74—Expectancy of heir is changed into vested interest in property on death of ancestor.

Though mere expectancy of heir is not usually regarded as property, expectancy changed into vested interest in property on death of ancestor.

6. Wills ⇨225, 229—Contest of will goes to establish violation of contestant's right to property, and right to contest is transferable (Civ. Code, § 954; Code Civ. Proc. § 1307).

Contest of will goes to establish on part of contestant that his right to property has been violated, and right of action to contest will may be transferred by owner under Civ. Code, § 954; Code Civ. Proc. § 1307.

7. Wills ⇨82—Will excluding only person who was natural object of decedent's bounty is unnatural will.

Will excluding, by its provisions, the only person who was the natural object of bounty of decedent, is unnatural will.

8. Wills ⇨205—Will, until admitted to probate, is of no value as evidence of title.

Will, though valid, is of no value as evidence of title until it is admitted to probate.

9. Wills ⇨225—Contestant's good faith in bringing will contest should be determined by circumstances existing when stipulation settling contest was entered into, and not by subsequent record.

In determining good faith and probable cause of will contest, contestant should be bound by facts and circumstances existing when stipulation for settlement of controversy was entered into, and not by record subsequently made as contemplated in stipulation.

10. Contracts ⇨68—Promise to compromise suit brought bona fide on probable cause is valuable consideration, though suit should be held unfounded.

When suit is brought bona fide on probable cause, promise to compromise is valuable consideration, even though suit should be held to be unfounded.

11. Husband and wife ⇨249—Property acquired by compromise is separate property if right compromised, which is consideration for property obtained, is separate.

Property acquired by compromise is separate property if right compromised, which is consideration for property obtained by compromise, is separate.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Charles C. Haines, Judge.

Petition by Dillard H. Clark, Jr., and others against Eliza S. Winn Clark for partition of the estate of Dillard H. Clark, deceased. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Crouch & Sanders and John W. Willmott, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for respondents.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of San Diego county, rendered on the 26th day of October, 1927, by which a large part of the estate of the decedent, Dillard H. Clark, was distributed under the terms of his will, as separate property, to his two children, Dillard H. Clark, Jr., and Alice Clark Myers, petitioners there and respondents herein. The appeal is upon the judgment roll and presents to this court the question whether the said judgment is supported and warranted by the findings.

The question for decision is whether certain moneys and property in the estate were community property, or were the separate property of the decedent. The question arose in the trial court upon the petition of the children for partial distribution of the estate under the will, and the answer or response of the widow; the latter alleging that a large part of the estate belonged to the community, and that she was entitled to one-half of all such community property.

The findings of fact were substantially as follows: The decedent, Dillard H. Clark, a major on the retired list of the United States Army, was by his first marriage the father of three children, Edwin Howard Clark, Dillard H. Clark, Jr., and Alice Clark Myers. On July 29, 1923, his son, Edwin Howard Clark, died, but his other two children survived him. On August 11, 1923, or about two weeks after the death of Edwin Howard Clark, Major Clark was married to Eliza Simpson Clark; and thereafter, on February 12, 1926, he died, a resident of San Diego county, Cal., leaving her as his widow. Said decedent left no other heirs at law except his said two children and his widow.

During or about the year 1922 oil was discovered on a tract of land in Noble county, Okl., then belonging to Major Clark. After enjoying the revenue for a time, he conveyed his mineral right in said land to his three children, all of whom were then living, so that each became the owner of one-third of such rights. These mineral rights continued to yield large revenues and, to a considerable though diminishing degree, still do so.

Major Clark would have inherited the entire estate of his son, Edwin Howard Clark, had the latter died intestate. Said estate consisted chiefly of such mineral rights as Major Clark had conveyed to his son, and the revenues from the same, which were and are of large value. Edwin Howard Clark, however, left a document, purporting to be a will, which was offered for probate as an original proceeding both in Noble county, Okl., and in San Diego, Cal. In this document nothing of consequence was left by the decedent to his father, Major Clark; the entire estate, excepting only a few articles of personalty of inconsequential value, being bequeathed to other persons. Probate of this writing was contested by Major Clark, both in the county court of Noble county, Okl., and in the superior court of San Diego county, Cal. It was denied probate in the county court of Noble county, Okl., and an appeal was taken by the proponents to the district court of said county, where the law provides for trial de novo in such cases. In the superior court at San Diego, Cal., on the other hand, said will was, over the protest of Major Clark, admitted to probate, from which action Major Clark took an appeal to the Supreme Court, which appeal has never been formally determined.

Such proceedings were in due time had in the district court of Noble county, Okl., that the contest there was about to be tried by the district court, or was in fact partially tried, when a compromise was reached between Major Clark and the proponents of his son's will, the terms of which compromise were embodied in a contract of settlement dated April 17, 1925, which, in so far as it affects this case, follows:

"The contestant shall and does now hereby dismiss his contest with prejudice to the institution of any other contest. * * *

"The executor of this will, subject to the approval of the court, hereby and now agrees that of the present cash assets of said estate he shall pay a full and just one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) portion (to) Dillard H. Clark, Sr., and in such manner as shall be by the court approved, shall make over and transfer, convey and assign to Dillard H. Clark, Sr., a full one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) portion of the entire interest of the deceased, Edwin Howard Clark, in certain royalty and oil, gas mineral rights, and in an oil lease covering land in Noble county, Oklahoma (describing it).

"The said contestant, Dillard H. Clark, Sr., shall, out of his portion hereby given him from said estate pay all just, legal, valid taxes assessable, to be levied, or collected on that portion of the estate by this compromise to him assigned and transferred, including inheritance taxes. * * *

"Said will, sought to be probated by the proponent, shall be probated in this court as of this date, said contest having been withdrawn as above stated."

Upon the filing of said contract of settlement in said cause in the district court of Noble county, Okl., that court, on the 23d day of May, 1925, entered its final judgment and decree in said cause, which, in so far as it is pertinent, follows:

"And thereupon in pursuance of said stipulation, the contestant now withdraws and dismisses his said contest.

"And thereupon the court, upon a full examination in open court, finds that there was a bona fide controversy between the parties to said probate and contest, and that the said settlement and compromise of the same is free from fraud or duress, and in the opinion of the court to the best interests of all of the persons in interest, and all beneficiaries under the will * * * and hereby now approves the same. * * *

"And thereupon the court finds that the sole heir at law of said deceased is and was Dillard H. Clark, Sr., of San Diego, California, * * *

"That at the time of the death of the deceased he was a single and unmarried man, never having had any lineal descendants, was over eighteen years of age, and of sound mind, and by said will disposed of all his estate, both real and personal. That the will proposed for probate was subscribed at the end thereof by the testator himself, and that said subscription was made in the presence of the attesting witnesses, that the testator at the time of subscribing the same declared to the attesting witnesses that the instrument was his will, and that there was two attesting witnesses each of whom did sign his name as a witness at the end of the will, at the testator's request, and in his presence, and in the presence of each other.

"Said will is hereby admitted to probate, and is hereby probated as the last will and testament of Edwin Howard Clark, deceased; and now George M. Gillet, Jr., is hereby appointed to be sole executor thereof, and is hereby ordered to immediately recognize, distribute and pay to Dillard H. Clark, Sr., as sole heir at law of the deceased, the exact one-half of all the estate reduced to money, and also to assign to Dillard H. Clark, Sr., a full one-half interest in all of the said mineral rights; and duly and fully perform all the other things by him agreed to be done in the said compromise; and the benefits therein named are hereby accepted by Dillard H. Clark, Sr., upon each and all of the conditions of said compromise, which are hereby accepted by him in all of its parts in open court."

Pursuant to said compromise, and during the year 1925, and up to the time of his death, February 12, 1926, Major Clark received in excess of $150,000 after the payment of all expenses in connection with said compromise, which said sum constituted a part of his estate which at his death passed into the hands of his executor.

Major Clark himself left a will which, by decree which is now final, has been admitted to probate by the superior court of San Diego county in this proceeding, the terms of which make provision for his wife, as follows: A trust fund for her benefit, whereby she is to receive during her life the income from securities of the approximate value of $40,000, leaving the bulk of his property to his surviving children.

By proper instruments Mrs. Eliza S. Winn Clark waived and relinquished all rights under the will of her husband, and elected to take that portion of his estate to which under the law she might be entitled.

All of the property of the estate, except that received by Major Clark as the result of the compromise of the will contest, as hereinbefore explained, was property or the proceeds of property owned by him prior to his marriage with appellant, and was his separate property.

Thereupon the court rendered the judgment appealed from, finding the property to be separate and distributing it to the two children under the will.

It is the contention of appellant that, as a matter of law, the facts found do not justify the conclusion that the property thus acquired is separate property. This is the sole question for the determination of the court.

Separate property and community property are defined in the Civil Code as follows:

Sec. 163. "All property owned by the husband before marriage, and that acquired afterwards by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, is his separate property."

Sec. 164. "All other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife, or both, including real property situated in this state, and personal property wherever situated, * * * is community property. * * *"

The Supreme Court has construed the definition of separate property contained in section 163, Civil Code, to include "property taken in exchange for, or in the investment, or as the price of the property so originally owned or acquired." Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 247, 73 Am. Dec. 538; Smith v. Smith, 12 Cal. 216, 73 Am. Dec. 533.

In case the will was held to be invalid, Major Clark was the sole heir of his son, and his right to contest the will was cast upon him immediately upon the death of his son. He claimed that his son's will was not a valid will. In this contention he had been sustained by the county court of Noble county, Okl. By way of compromise, however, he consented to the dismissal of his contest and to the admission of the will to probate. The terms of the compromise contemplated, however, that in consideration of withdrawing his contest, Major Clark should receive the half of his son's estate. It is this property and the profits thereof which are involved in this litigation. Had the will been rejected, he would have received all of his son's estate, and beyond doubt it would have been his separate property. The question is whether what he did receive is any the less his separate property because it came to him through the compromise that was effected. It would not be questioned that if, instead of acquiring a clear title to half of his son's estate by withdrawing his contest to the will, Major Clark had adopted the method of having the appeal dismissed and the will denied probate, and then transferring to the legatees and devisees one-half of the property, this property would be his separate property.

Did Major Clark transfer to the devisee under the will a property interest in return for that which was received by him under the terms of the compromise?

Property is defined by our Civil Code as follows:

Section 654: "The ownership of a thing is the right of one or more persons to possess and use it to the exclusion of others. In this code, the thing of which there may be ownership is called property."

Section 655: "There may be ownership * * * of rights created or granted by statute."

[1-4] The right of an heir to transfer his inheritance, even though there is a will or purported will in existence, is recognized by our courts. At the instant of his son's death Major Clark had a property right which he could assign or transfer or surrender for a consideration acceptable to him, and also the statutory right, which of itself is a property right, to contest his son's will. In re Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 150 P. 989. This right was a right vested in him prior to his marriage, and therefore was his separate property. The property involved in this litigation came to Major Clark in exchange or in payment for such property, and was likewise his separate property.

[5, 6] It is the contention of appellant that the right of action to contest a will is not assignable, nor the subject of conveyance, and that it is not property. Such is not the law of California. Our law specifically provides that "any person interested" may appear and contest a will and includes "heirs" as among these interested. Code Civ. Proc. § 1307.

"Broadly speaking, a contest of a will is in its essence an action for the recovery of property unlawfully taken or about to be taken from the ownership of the contestant." In re Baker, supra.

While the mere expectancy of an heir is not usually regarded as property, the moment the ancestor has died, that expectancy is changed into a vested interest in property. It becomes thus vested by virtue of the death.

The contest of a will therefore goes to establish upon the part of the contestant that his right to property has been violated. This right is such as the Civil Code, § 954, declares upon:

"A thing in action, arising out of the violation of a right of property, * * * may be transferred by the owner." Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 150 P. 989.

Much reliance is placed by appellant upon the case of Pancoast v. Pancoast, 57 Cal. 320. This case involved a situation where a man before his marriage intruded, without any right, on certain land, and after his marriage made a deed and gave up possession of a portion of the same to the rightful owner, in consideration whereof the owner conveyed to the trespasser the rest of the tract in fee. In this case the court held that as the trespasser had nothing before marriage except the mere ability to give trouble and cause expense to the true owners, the title which the latter conveyed to him after his marriage was something wholly new and did not fall within any of the classes of new acquisitions enumerated in the statute as being separate property, and was in law community property. There are some features of the case which are similar to the instant case; but there is this difference: That in the Pancoast Case the occupation does not appear to have been founded on any claim of right at all, but was a naked trespass, and the court refused to recognize a mere trespass as property; whereas Major Clark's claim to his son's estate was made in good faith on a bona fide contention that his son's will was invalid, and the Oklahoma court approved the settlement and found that it was free from fraud and duress and was for the best interest of the proponents of the will. In other words, that the contest was brought on probable cause. But above the good faith and above the probable cause, as steadfast as the rock of Gibraltar, stands out this element of differentiation—that his contest was the assertion of a statutory right amounting to property.

[7, 8] It is the contention of appellant that the will was declared to be a valid will by the Oklahoma court, and that it was therefore a valid will ab initio. The facts are that at the time of the settlement the will had not yet been declared to be a valid will; that it was the subject of a contest brought by Major Clark, a contest which the statute specifically authorized him to bring; that the will was an unnatural will in that it excluded by its provisions the only person who was the natural object of the bounty of the decedent; that the contest had been successful in the county court, and it was only by the prosecution of an appeal that the executors and legatees would have been able to obtain anything out of the estate; that no order of a probate court of Oklahoma had yet been entered admitting the will to probate; and that a will may be ever so valid, but until it is admitted to probate it is of no value as evidence of title. Roberts v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 307, 142 P. 1080; Estate of Patterson, 155 Cal. 626, 102 P. 941; Estate of Christensen, 135 Cal. 674, 68 P. 112. Thereafter the will was admitted to probate after the only person who was adversely interested had withdrawn his contest.

[9] As regards the good faith and probable cause of his contest, Major Clark should be bound by the facts and circumstances as they existed when the stipulation was entered into, not by the record as it was afterwards made as contemplated in the stipulation.

[10] When a suit is brought bona fide on probable cause, a promise to compromise it is a valuable consideration, even though the suit should be held to be unfounded. Union Collection Co. v. Buckman, 150 Cal. 159, 88 P. 708, 9 Cal. R. A. (N. S.) 568, 119 Am. St. Rep. 164, 11 Ann. Cas. 609.

[11] If it is true that the property in litigation was acquired by Major Clark during the time he was married to appellant, but it was acquired by way of the compromise of a statutory right which was in itself property and which he owned prior to his marriage. Property acquired by compromise is separate property if the right compromised is separate. The right compromised is the consideration for the property obtained by the compromise, and the principle is the same as where property is purchased with separate funds. 31 Cor. Jur. 24, § 1099.

PRATT et ux. v. BERETTA. (Civ. 6304.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 27, 1928.

1. Contracts $\S$ 40—Separate writings constitute single contract, where minds of parties meet and terms are identical.

Separate writings, each signed by one of the parties, constitute single contract, which should be considered and construed together, where the minds of the parties meet and the writings are identical as to subject-matter, terms, and conditions.

2. Exchange of property $\S$ 3(1)—Separate contracts by which principals employed common agent to exchange properties, with promise to convey on acceptance of agreement, held not binding contract between principals, where neither offer was accepted.

Separate agency contracts identical in form, by which the principals separately authorized and employed common agent to exchange their property with promise to convey on acceptance of agreement, held not to constitute a binding contract between the principals for an exchange of real properties, but merely separate offers, where there was no formal act of acceptance on part of either party of the offer of the other.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by William T. Pratt and wife against Mary A. Beretta. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Dozier, Kimball & Dozier, of San Francisco, for appellants.

J. B. Feehan and Joseph Farry, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued for the specific performance of an alleged contract for the exchange of real properties. The cause was tried before the court, sitting without a jury, and resulted in a judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiffs have appealed on a typewritten record.

The alleged contract upon which the cause of action is founded consists of two written documents, each executed separately by the respective parties at different times of the same day and without the presence of the other party. Each document is in form and substance a contract between the signer and a common real estate agent employing such agent to effect the exchange of real property owned by the signer for other designated real property upon specified terms. The action was defended upon the grounds that the contract executed by defendant was obtained through misrepresentation and fraud upon the part of the real estate agent, and that the two contracts did not constitute an enforceable agreement between the plaintiff and the defendant. The trial court found against defendant upon her charge of misrepresentation and fraud, and found that there was no contract between the parties to this suit. It is this question alone which arises on this appeal—whether the two contracts with the common agent constitute an enforceable contract between the parties to the suit.

The two agency contracts were practically identical in form. They both "authorize and employ Trevor & Co., a corporation, as our agent in our behalf, to exchange" property, and authorize said agents "to enter into an agreement or agreements of exchange of said property in our name and in our behalf." Both contracts give to these agents the exclusive right for a period of six days to effect the exchange, and both provide that "upon the acceptance of this agreement we further agree to convey said property," etc. The contract signed by the defendant contained stipulations not found in the other, reserving to the seller definite time within which to vacate, and providing a condition that if she found a cash buyer for her property during the period the contract should be null and void. Neither contract was accepted by the other party in express terms, and, so far as appears from the record, knowledge of the signing of either was not conveyed to the other party.

The contention of the appellants is that the two contracts express all the terms and conditions necessary to effect the exchange, and that they should be deemed to constitute one contract of exchange, within the rule of Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 229 P. 327, and other cases citing and following that rule. The respondent contends that the minds of the parties never met, that all she agreed to was the employment of a common agent who was authorized to make the exchange and to enter into a contract for that purpose.

[1] The question to be determined in cases of this kind is whether the minds of the parties met upon the essential terms and conditions of the undertaking. "When the minds of the parties meet, that is to say, when the respective writings match one another as to subject matter, terms, and conditions, a contract comes into existence between the parties, and when such terms and conditions are stated in writings which are signed by the respective parties the contract is none the less a contract in writing merely because each of the respective writings is signed by but one of the parties. Such a contract in writing fully satisfies the statute of frauds. Frost v. Alward, 176 Cal. 691, 169 P. 379; Merkeley v. Fisk, 179 Cal. 748, 178 P. 945; 12 Cal. Jur. 904, and cases cited. In construing such a contract the separately executed instruments are to be considered and construed together as one contract." Tuso v. Green, 194 Cal. 574, 581, 229 P. 327, 329.

[2] In the Tuso case the parties had met and had orally agreed upon the terms of sale. They had then gone to the escrow holder and had signed identical escrow instructions containing all these terms and conditions. These papers constituted the memorandum of the oral agreement within the statute of frauds. Here the papers signed by the respective parties were in the nature of an offer to exchange—not a memorandum of a prior oral contract to exchange. They both contemplated a formal acceptance before either party should be bound. Such acceptance could have been made by either party, but neither party executed an acceptance of the offer of the other. On August 18, 1922, Trevor & Co., purporting to act under Exhibit A, executed a written acceptance for the first owner. But neither Exhibit A nor Exhibit B expressly gave Trevor & Co. such authority. On the contrary, each exhibit contains words indicating that the right to execute "an acceptance" remained vested in each owner. It is written that "notice of such acceptance" would fix the date on which the acceptor should commence to search the title of the other owner. It is also written that the right of Trevor & Co. to demand compensation arose only "upon acceptance." Without some formal act on the part of the respective owners indicating an acceptance of the offer of the other the trial court correctly found that the minds of the parties had not met, and that, accordingly, no contract had been made between them. Judgment affirmed.

SPARLING v. SPARLING. (Civ. 6184.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Oct. 30, 1928.

1. Divorce ⇨284—Defendant's appeals from orders directing payment of alimony, where accompanied by undertakings to stay execution, deprived superior court of jurisdiction to enforce payment, or punish defendant for contempt.

Where defendant appealed from orders directing payment of alimony and counsel fees, and gave undertakings to stay execution, superior court was deprived of jurisdiction to require payment under the orders, or to punish defendant for contempt, and defendant was entitled to writ of supersedeas to restrain superior court's enforcement of the orders.

2. Appeal and error ⇨986—Trial court's determination of sufficiency of appellant's undertaking is conclusive on reviewing court.

Trial court's determination of question of sufficiency of appellant's undertaking to stay execution, in direct issue in which right to stay is involved, will not be reviewed by appellate court.

Application by Raymond Walter Sparling for writ of supersedeas to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County to restrain, pending appeal, the enforcement of decrees in favor of Marguerite Sparling for payment of alimony and counsel fees. Writ granted.

Maurice C. Sparling and Courtney A. Teel, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. An interlocutory decree of divorce was granted in favor of the respondent, directing that the petitioner pay forthwith a specified amount of money, alimony each month thereafter, and attorney's fees, from which decree the petitioner appealed on December 22, 1927, and filed an undertaking in the sum of $8,800, as fixed by the trial court, to stay execution. On February 8, 1928, pursuant to an order to show cause why the petitioner should not pay the alimony formerly ordered, or be held in contempt of court, and also $200 per month pending appeal, and attorney's fees for services in connection with said motion, an order was entered directing that he pay these latter moneys. From this order petitioner also appealed and filed an undertaking in the sum of $5,000 to stay execution thereof. Thereafter, and on April 18, 1928, pursuant to a similar order to show cause, a hearing was held, and on July 20, 1928, a like order was made requiring payment of $200 per month to respondent, commencing as of April 3, 1928, and attorney's fees for services rendered in connection with the motion last mentioned. Petitioner appealed from that order, filing an undertaking in the sum of $5,000 to stay its execution. On August 13, 1928, petitioner was again ordered to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court for failure to comply with the prior orders, and why he should not pay the respondent $200 per month pending appeal, and fees of her attorney for services rendered in connection with this third order to show cause.

[1] The petitioner herein, defendant below, prays a writ of supersedeas restraining enforcement of the decree and orders appealed from, asserting that said appeals and undertakings deprived the superior court of jurisdiction to require payment of either of said amounts, or to punish him for failure to comply with the mandates from which he appealed. Respondent avers that she is without income, and has not sufficient funds with which to maintain herself in the station of life to which she has been accustomed, or to pay her counsel and defend her action upon appeal. It is also alleged that the defendant, petitioner herein, is in possession and control of the community property, which he threatens to sequester and waste, and that the undertakings upon appeal are insufficient to protect her interests therein.

The question here presented was decided by the Supreme Court in the recent case of Smith v. Smith, 201 Cal. 217, 256 P. 419, wherein it was said:

"The defendant's right to stay execution of an order such as we are considering here, pending the determination of the appeal involving the main issue, has been settled in this state since the elaborate consideration given to the subject in the case of Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 199, 7 P. 456, 635, 8 P. 709."

[2] The facts there presented were identical with those of the instant case, except that but one order subsequent to the decree was under consideration. The only remaining point argued by respondent in opposition to the issuance of a writ herein is that of the sufficiency of petitioner's various undertakings in the respective appeals. Such questions are determined by the trial court upon a direct issue in which the right to a stay of proceedings is involved (Gutierrez v. Hebbard, 104 Cal. 103, 37 P. 749), and appellate courts will not review the conclusion of the lower tribunal in this particular (Jameson v. Chancellor-Canfield Midway Oil Co., 173 Cal. 612, 160 P. 1066).

It is ordered that the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Los Angeles, desist and refrain from enforcing, or attempting to enforce, the said decree or either of said orders of February 8, 1928, July 20, 1928, or August 13, 1928, or any of the terms or provisions of either of them, and that all proceedings of the said superior court on said decree and upon each of said orders be, and the same hereby are, stayed until the further order of this court.

PEOPLE v. McGRATH. (Cr. 1485.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 27, 1928.

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 189(1)—To be "necessarily included" in offense charged, lesser offense must be part of greater in fact (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1159).

Under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1159, authorizing jury to find defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in offense with which he is charged, to be "necessarily included" in offense charged, lesser offense must not only be part of the greater in fact, but it must be embraced within the legal definition of the greater as a part thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Necessarily Included.]

2. Indictment and information $\S$ 189(1)—Defendant charged with driving while under influence of intoxicating liquor could not be convicted of reckless driving (Vehicle Act 1927, $\S$ 112; Vehicle Act 1923, $\S$ 121; Pen. Code, $\S$ 1159).

Under information charging defendant with driving automobile along public highway while under influence of intoxicating liquor, in violation of Vehicle Act, $\S$ 112 (St. 1927, p. 1436), defendant could not be convicted of reckless driving under section 121 (St. 1923, p. 557), on theory that latter offense was included within crime of driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor within Pen. Code, $\S$ 1159.

3. Indictment and information $\S$ 189(1)—Test in determining whether one crime is necessarily included within another is whether conviction or acquittal of one bars prosecution for other (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1159).

One of legal tests to be applied in determining whether one crime is necessarily included within another, within Pen. Code, $\S$ 1159, is whether a conviction or acquittal of one crime operates as a bar to prosecution for the other.

4. Criminal law $\S$ 902—Court having erroneously given instruction, over objection, authorizing conviction for reckless driving under information charging driving while intoxicated, defendant's counsel, in subsequently proposing two forms of verdict, did not waive objection (Vehicle Act 1927, $\S$ 112; Vehicle Act 1923, $\S$ 121).

Where court, over defendant's objection, erroneously instructed that jury might find defendant, charged with driving automobile while under influence of intoxicating liquor in violation of Vehicle Act, $\S$ 112 (St. 1927, p. 1436), guilty of reckless driving in violation of section 121 (St. 1923, p. 557), defendant's counsel, in subsequently requesting instruction that jury must base verdict on charge in information, and proposing two forms of verdict based on question whether defendant was driving while under influence of intoxicating liquor, and whether he was driving in reckless manner, did not waive defendant's right to take advantage of erroneous instruction, even if such error could be waived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

James F. McGrath was convicted of reckless driving of an automobile, and he appeals. Reversed.

W. S. Robenson, of Richmond, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted in the superior court of a misdemeanor and has appealed from the judgment of conviction, urging as ground for reversal that he was found guilty of an offense with which he was not charged and upon which he was not tried.

The charge set forth in the information was that he drove an automobile over and along the public highway "while then and there under the influence of intoxicating liquor." He entered a plea of not guilty thereto and was subsequently placed on trial before a jury. After deliberating upon its verdict for some time, the jury returned into court for further instructions, and one of the questions propounded to the court by the foreman was whether it was permissible for the jury "to bring in a verdict of reckless driving." The court referred the question to the attorneys, but they were unable to agree upon the proposition; the district attorney contending that such a verdict could be legally rendered, and counsel for appellant insisting to the contrary. After considerable discussion, the court of its own motion instructed the jury as follows:

"* * * That the crime of reckless driving is included in the information in this case and that when a charge embraces two or more degrees of crime and there is reasonable doubt in the minds of the jurors as to which degree he is guilty, it is the duty of the jury to convict the defendant of the lesser of the two degrees."

Whereupon counsel for appellant requested the court to instruct the jury also "that if they convict of the lesser they must acquit of the higher crime," and that there be submitted to the jury two separate forms of verdict based upon the following questions:

First, "Was the defendant at the time of the happening of the offense—of the accident charged—driving and operating a motor vehicle upon a public highway within this state under the influence of intoxicating liquor?" And, secondly, "Was the defendant driving and operating a motor vehicle upon a public highway in this state in a reckless manner so as to endanger the life and the limb and the safety of person or property?"

The court granted the requests, and thereafter the jury agreed upon and returned two verdicts, the first finding appellant "not guilty of driving an automobile * * * while under the influence of intoxicating liquor," and the second finding him "guilty of the crime of driving an automobile upon a public highway without precaution and in such a manner as to endanger the life and property of other persons."

[1] Section 1159 of the Penal Code provides that the "jury may find the defendant guilty of any offense, the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, or of an attempt to commit the offense"; and this section has been construed to mean that "to be 'necessarily included' in the offense charged, the lesser offense must not only be part of the greater in fact, but it must be embraced within the legal definition of the greater as a part thereof." People v. Kerrick, 144 Cal. 46, 77 P. 711. Therefore, the question presented for determination is whether the crime of reckless driving is necessarily included within the crime of driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor and is embraced within the legal definition of the latter.

[2] The California Vehicle Act contains a number of penal provisions, but only two of them are pertinent here. Section 112, which is evidently the section upon which the charge set forth in the information is grounded, reads as follows:

"It shall be unlawful for any person * * * who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor * * * to drive a vehicle on any public highway within this state"—the penalty fixed for violation thereof being imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison, at the discretion of the jury, or a fine. Stats. 1927, p. 1436.

And section 121, which is the section upon which the verdict and the judgment of conviction are based, provides:

"Any person who knowingly and willfully drives any vehicle upon a public highway, either without due caution and circumspection or in such manner as to endanger the life, limb, or property of any person, shall be guilty of reckless driving and upon conviction shall be punished by imprisonment in the county jail * * * or by a fine * * * or by both such fine and imprisonment." Stats. 1923, p. 557.

The Penal Code also contains a section providing that any person operating or driving a motor vehicle who becomes or is intoxicated, and by reason of such intoxication does any act or neglects any duty imposed by law which results in the death of, or bodily injury to, any person, is guilty of an offense for which he may be punished by imprisonment in the state prison or the county jail, or a fine, or by both fine and imprisonment (section 367e, Pen. Code); but manifestly this Code section has no bearing upon the question at issue here, because nowhere in the information was it alleged that appellant injured or caused the death of any person as a result of driving while intoxicated, the charge being confined strictly to the language employed in section 112 of said act. The Penal Code contains another section (section 367d) which in substance declares that any person operating or driving an automobile, who becomes or is "intoxicated" while so engaged in operating or driving such automobile, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor; but, as above suggested, the wording of the information indicates that the charge therein was based upon section 112 of the Vehicle Act.

Therefore, directing our attention to the two sections of the Vehicle Act above mentioned, it will be observed that the single act denounced as a crime by section 112 consists of driving an automobile upon a public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. It is not essential, therefore, to the existence of such an offense that the driver be so intoxicated that he cannot drive safely, nor is it any defense to such crime that he may have exercised due care to avoid injuring other travelers. The expression "under the influence of intoxicating liquor" has been held to cover not only all well-known and easily recognized conditions and degrees of intoxication, but any abnormal mental or physical condition caused by the indulgence in any degree in intoxicating liquor which impairs, to an appreciable degree, the ability of the driver to operate his car in the manner that an ordinarily prudent and cautious person, in full possession of his faculties, would operate a similar vehicle, under like conditions. People v. Dingle, 56 Cal. App. 445, 205 P. 705; Berry on Automobiles (4th Ed.) § 1750; Needham v. State, 107 Neb. 389, 186 N. W. 336; State v. Rodgers, 91 N. J. Law, 212, 102 A. 433; People v. Ekstromer, 71 Cal. App. 239, 235 P. 69. The determining factor in the trial of a case prosecuted under section 112 of said act relates, therefore, to the mental and physical condition of the driver, that is, his ability to operate his car, and not to the manner in which the car is being actually driven, nor the result of its operation. The commission of the crime is complete when such person engages in the act of driving an automobile upon the public highway while under the influence of intoxicating liquor as that term is defined by the decisions of this state (People v. Dingle, supra), even though there are no other travelers on the highway at that time (State v. Rodgers, supra), or, if there are, that he has driven his car in such manner as did not in fact endanger their safety. The section was designed, said this court in People v. Ekstromer, supra, "to protect the public from the menace of automobiles operated upon the public highway with inadequate or no efficient control, in a world of traffic difficult of management under normal conditions. * * *"

On the other hand, evidence of indulgence in intoxicating liquor is wholly unessential to the establishment of the crime of reckless driving, as it is defined by section 121 of said act; that is, a person may be guilty of driving without due caution and circumspection, or in such manner as to endanger the safety of others, even though he has not indulged at all in intoxicating liquors. The two crimes are therefore not only distinct in law but in fact, for each crime pertains to a separate state of facts.

[3] One of the legal tests to be applied in determining whether one crime is necessarily included within another is whether a conviction or an acquittal of one crime operates as a bar to a prosecution for the other. People v. Majors, 65 Cal. 138, 3 P. 597, 52 Am. Rep. 295. If the pleas of autrefois convict or autrefois acquit may be successfully interposed as a bar to the second prosecution, then the two offenses are considered part of each other (People v. Ny Sam Chung, 94 Cal. 304, 29 P. 642, 28 Am. St. Rep. 129; People v. McDaniels, 137 Cal. 192, 69 P. 1006, 59 L. R. A. 578, 92 Am. St. Rep. 81); but if such pleas are not available, then the offenses are distinct (People v. Kerrick, supra; People v. Helbing, 61 Cal. 620; People v. McDaniels, supra). As pointed out, each of the crimes under consideration relates to a separate state of facts; consequently it is possible for a person to commit, and therefore be legally charged with, and if found guilty be punished for, both crimes. That being so, a plea of autrefois convict would not lie in bar of a prosecution for the second crime. Moreover, a comparison of the wording of the two sections is sufficient to show that the elements constituting one of these crimes are not embraced within the legal definition of the other. For the reason above assigned it would seem obvious that the crime of reckless driving is in no sense included within the crime of driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor. Consequently the situation presented is one which did not fall within the purview of section 1159 of the Penal Code, and, accordingly, the verdict finding appellant guilty of reckless driving and the judgment pronounced thereon are void.

In order to prove a case under one of the sections above mentioned, it may be necessary, and doubtless is at all times permissible, to introduce evidence which may tend to establish guilt of the other offense; that is, where a person is charged with driving an automobile while under the influence of intoxicating liquor and it is shown that he has been indulging in such liquor, evidence that he was driving recklessly may in itself constitute proof of his inability to operate his car in the manner that an ordinarily prudent and cautious person, in full possession of his faculties and under like conditions, would operate it; or if he be charged with reckless driving, evidence that he was at the time under the influence of intoxicating liquor may be proof of the fact that the reckless acts were not committed as a result of an emergency with which he was suddenly confronted and for which he would be legally excusable, but were attributed wholly to a lack of self-control caused by intoxicants. But these are considerations relating to evidentiary matters and have nothing to do with the question of the elements constituting the respective offenses under discussion. Whether or not a person charged, under section 367e of the Penal Code, with having operated or driven a motor vehicle while intoxicated which has resulted in the death or injury to any person, may be found guilty of the offense declared by section 112 of said act, that is, driving while under the influence of intoxicating liquor, is a question not involved on this appeal, and consequently we do not presume to pass upon it.

[4] Respondent contends in support of the judgment that appellant acquiesced in the proceedings which resulted in the rendition of the two verdicts, and that therefore he is not in a position to complain of their effect. We are unable to sustain the point. The assignment of error is based upon an erroneous instruction given to the jury by the court of its own motion to the effect that the crime of reckless driving was necessarily included in the charge set forth in the information and that the jury might find appellant guilty of that crime; and the record shows that prior to the giving of the aforesaid instruction counsel for appellant earnestly contended that such was not the law and that an instruction to that effect should not be given. The error committed in giving the instruction and the prejudicial effect thereof are therefore matters about which appellant may rightfully complain. Moreover, even though it be assumed, as respondent seems to contend, that counsel for a defendant may stipulate that the jury has the power to bring in a verdict against his client for the commission of an offense with which the latter was not charged, and upon which he had not been tried, we are of the opinion that in the present case, since the court had already erroneously instructed that the jury might find appellant guilty of reckless driving, the action of counsel for appellant thereafter in requesting the court to instruct the jury that nevertheless it must find a verdict based upon the charge set forth in the information, and in proposing the forms of the two verdicts for such purpose, did not amount to a stipulation to that effect nor operate as a waiver of appellant's right to take advantage of the erroneous instruction already given.

The judgment is reversed.

94 Cal. App. 543

PEOPLE v. MEDALGI. (Cr. 1502.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 29, 1928.

As Modified on Denial of Rehearing Nov. 28, 1928.

1. Intoxicating liquors ☞236(6½)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of possessing intoxicating liquor.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor.

2. Intoxicating liquors ☞238(2)—Whether defendant placed liquor under floor of dog house in his yard was fact question for jury.

Whether intoxicating liquor found under floor of dog house in defendant's yard had been placed there by him was a question of fact for the jury, in trial for unlawful possession thereof.

3. Criminal law ☞1134(1)—That inference of innocence might reasonably be drawn from circumstances also justifying inference of guilt does not present law question for appellate court.

Where circumstances are such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt as found by jury, fact that inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review by appellate court, which will interfere only where evidence obviously does not warrant inference of guilt.

4. Criminal law ☞1036(2)—Defendant, not assigning misconduct below to witness' answers to certain questions on cross-examination, cannot complain of prejudicial effect on appeal.

Defendant not objecting or excepting to, moving to strike, nor assigning as misconduct, police officer's answers to questions on cross-examination as to when he had visited defendant's premises before raid resulting in discovery of intoxicating liquor for possession of which defendant was convicted, cannot complain on appeal of prejudicial effect of answers stricken on his motion, in absence of assignment of misconduct therein, as, to warrant reversal for misconduct, record must show that proper assignments of error were made at the time.

5. Criminal law ☞789(2)—Giving of additional instruction amplifying statutory definition of reasonable doubt is not error (Pen. Code, § 1096 as amended, and § 1096a as added by St. 1927, p. 1039).

Pen. Code, § 1096a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1039, providing that court may read to jury section 1096 as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, and that no further instruction on presumption of innocence or defining reasonable doubt "need be given," does not restrict court to reading of definition in section 1096, and giving of correct additional instruction amplifying such definition is not error.

On Application for Rehearing.

6. Intoxicating liquors ☞236(6½)—Mere proof of possession of intoxicating liquor does not establish offense of unlawful possession.

Mere proof of possession of intoxicating liquor is not sufficient to constitute offense of unlawful possession thereof, without further proof that it was possessed for unlawful purposes.

7. Criminal law ☞1172(1)—Instruction that mere doing of act is sufficient to constitute offense held not prejudicial, where evidence showed conclusively that defendant's possession of intoxicating liquor was unlawful.

Where there was no pretense that defendant had intoxicating liquor lawfully or for lawful purpose, his sole defense being that he did not have possession thereof, and circumstances proved showed conclusively that his possession was unlawful, instruction that mere doing of act is sufficient to constitute offense was not prejudicial, if erroneous as meaning that mere proof of possession was sufficient to constitute offense of unlawful possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Tony Medalgi was convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Lindsay & Gearhart and Carl E. Lindsay, all of Fresno, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KNIGHT, J. Appellant was charged with having unlawfully possessed intoxicating liquor and with having been previously convicted twice of like offenses. He entered a plea of not guilty to the present charge, but admitted the prior convictions, and upon trial the jury found him guilty. He has appealed from the judgment of conviction, and the first point urged for reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict.

[1] The main facts upon which the verdict is grounded are as follows: On the afternoon of April 4, 1928, two police officers of the city of Fresno, accompanied by a private detective, and acting under the authority of a search warrant, visited appellant's premises in Fresno for the purpose of searching the same for illicit liquor. After knocking at the front door and receiving no response, they forcibly entered the house wherein they found three women, two men, and some children. Appellant was not there at that time. Upon searching the premises the officers found a pint flask partly filled with liquor, under the steps attached to the rear of the house. One of the women present in the house at the time, but who resided next door, asserted that the liquor belonged to her. Continuing their search, the officers discovered a gallon demijohn and a pint flask filled with an intoxicating liquor called "jackass brandy," hidden underneath a movable floor of a dog house to which a dog was tied, located in the yard about ten feet to the rear of the dwelling. Before the officers left the premises, appellant drove up in his automobile, but he denied ownership of the liquor or that he knew that it was there. At the trial he admitted owning and occupying the premises, also that he parked his car in the yard thereof, but denied ownership of the dog or the dog house, stating that they belonged to "somebody else." Evidence was adduced to show, however, that appellant, assisted by a man named Helmuth, built the dog house less than two weeks prior to the discovery of the liquor underneath the floor thereof; and other evidence was introduced tending to prove that appellant owned the dog. It appears also from the testimony that prior to the discovery of the liquor under the dog house appellant was arrested on several occasions, and Helmuth once, for "bootlegging" on these same premises. The foregoing evidence, when considered with the other incidental circumstances disclosed by the record, is legally sufficient, in our opinion, to sustain the verdict.

[2, 3] Appellant cites the rule announced by several federal cases to the effect that possession of liquor, as of other instruments and fruits of crime, involves the elements of knowledge, dominion, and control, with plenary power of dispossession in the alleged possessor; and in this connection he contends that none of those elements were established, it being argued with respect thereto that anybody, including any one of the five adults found in the house at the time of the "raid," might have placed the liquor under the floor of the dog house. But as said in People v. Buttulia, 70 Cal. App. 444, 233 P. 401, "Whether or not the liquor had been placed there by the defendant was a question" of fact "for the jury, * * *" and as stated in People v. Martinez, 20 Cal. App. 343, 128 P. 952, afterwards quoted approvingly in People v. Mitsunaga (Cal. App.) 266 P. 1020:

"Where the circumstances are such as to reasonably justify an inference of guilt, as found by the jury, the fact that an inference of innocence might likewise be reasonably drawn therefrom does not present a question of law for review by an appellate court any more than does a verdict based upon direct conflicting evidence; * * * and it is only where the evidence obviously does not warrant the inference of guilt that the court will interfere."

Conceding, therefore, that appellant's denial of the ownership of the liquor, if believed and accepted by the jury, would have been enough to exonerate him, still the facts and circumstances above related, upon which the jury's verdict was mainly grounded, are not, in our opinion, so wanting in persuasive force nor so inherently weak as to justify this court in declaring, as a matter of law, that the conclusion reached by the jury as to appellant's guilt is devoid of any reasonable support. People v. Hay, 74 Cal. App. 464, 241 P. 275. The facts of the present case are not only similar to but even stronger than those of People v. Buttulia, supra, wherein the defendant was charged with the illegal possession of illicit liquor and the judgment of conviction was affirmed, for there the liquor was not found upon the defendant's premises but was found buried on a vacant lot adjoining his house; whereas here the liquor was found on premises admittedly owned and occupied by appellant, hidden under the movable floor of a dog house which appellant had personally constructed a short time prior to the finding of the liquor. In the case last cited, "the prosecution introduced evidence of numerous sales, some of them on the day charged in the information, from which the jury was asked to infer that defendant possessed the liquor, exercised control over it and did so for an illegal purpose." And with reference to the admissibility of such evidence, the court said:

"It is clear that if the defendant was making a practice of selling liquor, that fact would tend to show that he was responsible for placing the liquor where it was found, adjoining his home, and would also tend to prove that his constructive possession of such liquor was for an illegal purpose."

It would appear, therefore, that the evidence in the present case to the effect that appellant had been arrested more than once for "bootlegging" on these same premises would tend to prove the criminal ingredients above mentioned.

[4] The testimony establishing the fact that appellant had been arrested before for like offenses committed on the same premises, and that the place had been previously "raided," was developed on the cross-examination of one of the police officers, in response to questions propounded by counsel for appellant in an endeavor to ascertain when prior to the present "raid" the officer had visited the premises, and appellant contends that the answers thus given were not only inadmissible, but that the giving of the same constituted prejudicial misconduct. Under the ruling in People v. Buttulia, it would seem that the testimony was proper, but aside from the question of its admissibility, the record discloses that with but few exceptions appellant allowed the answers to stand without objecting or excepting thereto, or without asking that the answers be stricken out or assigning the giving of the same as misconduct; and that in a few instances where motions were made to strike out objectionable answers no assignment of misconduct was made, and the court promptly granted the motions and ordered the testimony stricken out. Even though it be assumed, therefore, that the answers to which appellant at the time did object were improper, appellant is not allowed to complain of the prejudicial effect thereof for the first time on appeal, because it has been repeatedly held that to warrant a reversal for misconduct the record must show that proper assignments of error were made at the time the asserted misconduct occurs, so as to enable the trial court to remedy the matter by appropriate instructions. People v. Buttulia, supra, and cases therein cited.

[5] At respondent's request the court gave to the jury an instruction amplifying the definition of reasonable doubt as set forth in section 1096 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1039); and appellant contends that the effect of said amendment and of the new section, 1096(a), enacted at the same time, was to preclude the trial court from giving any instruction upon the subject of reasonable doubt or presumption of innocence other than to read the definition embraced in said section 1096. It is doubtless true, as appellant asserts, that prior to the changes in the Code above mentioned it had been the usual practice for the trial court to give elaborate instructions upon the doctrine of reasonable doubt and presumption of innocence, which often resulted in confusion and error; and that it was to relieve such burdensome situation that the Legislature in 1927 defined reasonable doubt and enacted section 1096(a), which provides that in "charging a jury, the court may read to the jury section 1096 of this Code, and no further instruction on the subject of the presumption of innocence or defining reasonable doubt need be given" (italics ours). But it will be observed that the provisions of the section last above quoted do not declare that no further instructions "shall be given," merely that no further instructions "need be given"; and consequently said section does not restrict the trial court to a reading of the definition given in section 1096. In other words, it is optional with the trial court whether or not it will give further instructions. Therefore, since appellant does not question the correctness of the amplifying instruction given herein, the fact that it was given in addition to the definition set forth in said section 1096 did not constitute error.

[6, 7] Appellant assigns as error the giving of the following instruction:

"You are instructed that in this class of offenses the intent is presumed from the doing of the act, that is, the mere doing of the act is sufficient to constitute the offense."

If by said instruction the court meant that mere proof of possession of intoxicating liquor was sufficient to constitute the offense, without further proof that it was possessed for unlawful purposes, the instruction was erroneous. People v. Silva, 67 Cal. App. 351, 227 P. 976; People v. Mattos, 67 Cal. App. 346, 227 P. 974; People v. Arnarez, 68 Cal. App. 645, 230 P. 193; People v. Mullaly, 77 Cal. App. 60, 245 P. 811. However, as in People v. Mullaly, supra, there was no pretense at the trial that the appellant had the liquor lawfully or for a lawful purpose. His sole defense was that he did not have possession of the liquor at all, and the circumstances proved were such as to show conclusively that, if he did have the liquor, his possession thereof was unlawful. The instruction, therefore, could not have affected the result of the trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

94 Cal. App. 530
CALIFORNIA BOND & MORTGAGE CO.
v. WASHBURN et al. (Civ. 6305.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 27, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨842(1)—Laches is question of fact to be determined in trial court on all circumstances of case.

Laches is question of fact to be determined in trial court on all facts and circumstances of case.

2. Appeal and error ⇨901, 948—Question of laches barring recovery, to be raised on appeal, requires showing that trial court's finding was unsupported by evidence and that it abused discretion.

To raise on appeal question of laches barring right to recover, it is necessary to show that finding of trial court that party was not guilty of laches was not supported by evidence and that there has been abuse of discretion.

3. Novation ⇨1, 12—Novation is new contract which must be proved like any other contract (Civ. Code, § 1530).

Under Civ. Code, § 1530, novation is new contract which must be proved like any other contract.

4. Novation ⇨7—Substitution of new vendor and new vendee under contract to sell land without intention to substitute new debtor did not affect novation releasing original purchaser (Civ. Code, § 1531).

Where new vendor and new vendee were substituted under contract for sale of land, but there was no intention to substitute new debtor in place of original purchaser, with intent to release original purchaser, as required by Civ. Code, § 1531, there was no novation releasing original purchaser.

5. Licenses ⇨39—Contention that corporation purchasing contract for sale of land could not enforce contract because paying stock and not cash therefor in violation of Corporate Securities Act held not sustained under evidence.

In action to recover balance of purchase price of real property, contention that plaintiff corporation acquiring contract of sale from original vendor did not come into court with clean hands because it acquired contract contrary to permit from corporation commissioner by paying stock and not cash therefore could not be sustained, where findings to contrary were supported by evidence that corporation purchased contract as investment and sold stock to its assignor through broker for cash, and since contention stated crime under Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673) and court presumes crime was not committed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Action by the California Bond & Mortgage Company against W. K. Washburn and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Edward R. Eliassen and C. Leonard Rosenberg, both of Oakland, and Sheridan Downey, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Strother P. Walton, of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover the balance of the purchase price of certain real property, for a lien for the amount of the judgment, and for a deficiency judgment against the two defendants. The cause was tried before the court without a jury and resulted in a decree in favor of plaintiff for the relief prayed. From this judgment the defendant Washburn alone has appealed on a typewritten transcript.

On February 20, 1920, one Schougaard sold the property in suit to the defendant Washburn under a conditional sale agreement, which he assigned to his codefendant, Pipig, on February 23, 1921. On November 2, 1923, Schougaard deeded all his interest in the premises to the plaintiff and at the same time assigned to plaintiff the contract of sale in which Pipig appeared as assignee of the Washburn interests. On July 23, 1925, after notices of default had been given to both defendants, this action was commenced.

[1, 2] On this appeal it is argued that the respondent was guilty of laches and should not recover from the appellant for that reason. The argument is based upon the statement that the respondent looked solely to Pipig for the performance of the condition of the contract, treated appellant as being out of the transaction because of his assignment to Pipig, and failed to give appellant any notice of default by Pipig in the payments called for by the contract. The trial court found that none of these facts was true, and then concluded that the plaintiff was not guilty of laches. The evidence fully supports the findings and the appellant does not show so much as a conflict. Laches is a question of fact to be determined in the trial court upon all the facts and circumstances of the case (10 Cal. Jur. p. 526), and to raise the point on appeal it is necessary to show from the evidence that the finding of the trial court is not supported by the evidence and that there has been an abuse of the discretion reposed in that court.

[3, 4] The appellant argues that, by the substitution of a new vendor and a new vendee, a novation resulted which released him from further obligation under the contract. The argument is that, because the respondent recognized Pipig as the vendee after the assignment, the court should imply on the part of respondent a consent to release appellant from his obligations. But novation is a new contract (section 1530, Civ. Code), which must be proved like any other contract. Here there was no evidence of any intention to substitute a new debtor in place of the old one with intent to release the latter. Section 1531, Civ. Code. The evidence is all to the contrary and the trial court so found.

[5] The point is made that the respondent does not come into court with clean hands because it acquired the interest of Schougaard contrary to the terms of its permit from the state commissioner of corporations. The whole argument is based upon the assumption that the respondent delivered to Schougaard shares of its corporate stock in consideration of the deed and assignment alone, whereas the permit issued by the corporation commissioner called for payment in cash of at least 40 per cent. of the purchase price of stock issued. Here again the trial court found adversely to the appellant and the finding is attacked by printing the portions of the testimony most favorable to appellant. The respondent has printed evidence to show that it purchased the sales contract as an investment and sold the stock to Schougaard through a broker for cash. The transaction which appellant claims might have taken place would have been a crime under the Corporate Securities Act (St. 1917, p. 673), and, when we employ the presumption that crime was not committed, and consider this with the testimony outlined by the respondent, we find sufficient evidence to support the finding. Judgment affirmed.

NITTLER et al. v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO. et al. (Civ. 6375.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 26, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Brokers ⇐ 4—Complaint alleging broker received price of gasoline station which he refused to pay over held not demurrable, in action on bond, for failure to show real estate transaction (Real Estate Brokers' Act, §§ 2, 9a, as amended).

In action on real estate broker's bond under Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252).

§ 9a, as amended by St. 1923, p. 93, complaint alleging that defendant, acting as licensed real estate broker, received sum of money paid as purchase price of gasoline station sold by plaintiffs which he refused to pay over, held not demurrable for failure to show that transaction involved real estate within terms of section 2 as amended in 1925 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925, Act 112) defining "real estate broker."

2. Brokers ⇐4—Complaint on broker's bond, alleging that broker acted as licensed real estate broker, held not demurrable for failure to charge broker acted for compensation (Real Estate Brokers' Act, §§ 2, 9a, as amended).

In action on bond of real estate broker under Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252) § 9a, as amended by St. 1923, p. 93, complaint based on broker's refusal to account for moneys paid him for purchase price of property held not demurrable for failure to show that broker was acting for compensation, where it was alleged that defendant was acting as licensed real estate broker, since section 2, as amended in 1925 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925, Act 112), defines "real estate broker" as one buying or selling real estate for compensation.

3. Brokers ⇐4—Broker's sale of gasoline station and lease covering land on which station was located held within statute, "transaction" (Real Estate Brokers' Act, §§ 2, 9a as amended).

Sale of gasoline filling station under bill of sale, and sale of lease to realty on which station was located, held to constitute transaction within Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252), § 2, as amended in 1925 (Deering's Gen. Laws Supp. 1925, Act 112), defining "real estate broker" as one who "leases or offers to lease, or negotiates the sale, purchase or exchange of leases," thus creating liability on broker's bond under section 9a of act as amended by St. 1923, p. 93, where broker refused to account for proceeds.

4. Appeal and error ⇐907(2)—Where appellant fails to print evidence or findings attacked, reviewing court must assume findings were based upon competent evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

Where appeal is taken under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, relative to ordering and preparation of transcript, reviewing court, on appellant's failure to print any of the evidence or findings attacked, must presume in support of trial court's judgment that its findings are based upon competent evidence, and will not search typewritten record to discover error.

5. Brokers ⇐4—Liability of real estate broker for nonpayment of moneys received, came within bond, where moneys were misappropriated after bond became effective (Real Estate Brokers' Act, § 9a, as amended by St. 1923, p. 93).

In action on real estate broker's bond under Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252) § 9a, as amended by St. 1923, p. 93, liability of broker for refusal to account for moneys received on sale of principal's property came within terms of bond, where court found that broker's misappropriation and conversion of money occurred after bond became effective.

6. Brokers ⇐4—Loss sustained, due to broker's refusal to turn over moneys collected on sale of principal's property, held within real estate broker's bond (Real Estate Brokers' Act, § 9a, as amended by St. 1923, p. 93).

Refusal of licensed broker to account for proceeds of sale of gasoline station and lease for his principal constituted failure to perform duty incumbent upon him as broker, creating liability under bond under Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252) § 9a, as amended by St. 1923, p. 93, permitting recovery on bond by any person injured by failure of broker to perform his duties or comply with provisions of act.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. D. Murphey, Judge.

Action by J. T. Nittler and another against the Continental Casualty Company and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Sterne, of Oakland, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs sued to recover damages for the breach of R. C. McKinney, a licensed real estate broker, and joined as a party defendant the Continental Casualty Company, the surety upon the bond of McKinney under the Real Estate Brokers' Act (St. 1919, p. 1252). The cause was consolidated for trial with that of Carroll v. McKinney et al., an action brought to recover for a similar breach, and which upon the submission of this cause upon the appeal was dismissed upon the stipulation of the parties. The cause was tried before the court without a jury and judgment was rendered in favor of the Nittlers and against the defendant McKinney and the Continental Casualty Company in the sum of $1,058 and against the defendant McKinney in the additional sum of $262. From this judgment the defendant Continental Casualty Company has appealed upon a typewritten record.

The complaint alleged that on the 19th day of March, 1927, the defendant McKinney, while acting as a licensed real estate broker, received for plaintiffs the sum of $1,320 paid to him as the purchase price of a gasoline service station sold by plaintiffs to the purchasers by and through the defendant McKinney acting as a real estate broker; that on the 28th day of March, 1927, plaintiffs made demand upon McKinney to pay over to them the said sum of $1,320, but that McKinney refused to pay over the same or any portion thereof and appropriated the whole sum to his own use; that on the 14th day of March, 1927, McKinney and the Continental Casualty Company executed a certain broker's bond under the terms of the Real Estate Brokers' Act, the obligation of which was that the broker would faithfully perform every undertaking entered into by him as a licensed real estate broker; that said bond expressly insured to the benefit of any person injured by the failure of the broker to perform his duties and gave a right of action to such person against the surety for the recovery of damages sustained by the failure or omission of the broker to perform his duties or any of them, or to comply with the provisions of the act; that the said bond was filed with the real estate commissioner, and in pursuance thereof McKinney received his license as a real estate broker under said act.

[1] The Continental Casualty Company demurred generally upon the ground that the complaint was insufficient because the sale alleged to have been made by McKinney was not a real estate transaction requiring a real estate broker's license, and because the complaint did not allege that McKinney was acting for compensation in that transaction. On the first point the argument is that because the complaint alleges that the transaction consisted of the sale of a gasoline service station, we must assume that it did not include any of the transactions referred to in section 2 of the Real Estate Brokers' Act as amended in 1925 (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 112), and which defines a real estate broker as:

"A person * * * who, for a compensation, sells, or offers for sale, buys, or offers to buy, or negotiates the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or who, for compensation, negotiates loans on real estate, leases, or offers to lease, or negotiates the sale, purchase, or exchange of leases, rents, or places for rent, or collects rent from real estate, or improvements thereon, for others as a whole or partial vocation."

There is nothing on the face of the complaint to show that this particular gasoline service station was held under a title separate from the title to the land upon which it was situated, and the court could well assume that the usual course of business had been followed and that the transaction included either a transfer of the real property upon which the station was situated, or a lease upon such real property.

[2] The argument that the complaint is insufficient because it fails to show that in this particular transaction the broker was acting for a compensation is without force, because the allegation that the defendant was a licensed real estate broker under the state statute, and that while acting as such real estate broker he made the sale and received the purchase price, is sufficient to bring him within the terms of the act, which itself defines a "real estate broker" as one who acts for a compensation.

[3] Upon the trial it developed that the plaintiffs owned a gasoline service station, a small chicken ranch, a store, and sandwich shop, which they operated upon leased premises, and which they placed in the hands of defendant McKinney for sale. Acting under this authority, McKinney on May 26, 1926, sold the property to Martinez, from whom he collected the purchase price. The property was turned over to the purchasers under escrow instructions through which McKinney was authorized to retain the purchase price in the event of a controversy arising until an adjudication of the controversy by a court. With these escrow instructions McKinney received from the plaintiffs a bill of sale of the personal property and a lease to the real property assigned by them to the purchasers, and these two documents were authorized to be delivered to the purchasers by the escrow holder upon the expiration of the notice of sale if no controversy arose. The trial court found that at the time these documents were delivered to McKinney he was acting as a real estate broker for a compensation and commission agreed to be paid to him by the plaintiffs; that he retained possession of the money under the escrow instructions until the controversy which arose over the right of the plaintiffs herein to assign their lease to the property had been determined; that in an action brought for that purpose in the superior court it was judicially determined that these plaintiffs were entitled to assign all their right to the said lease to the purchasers; that they had executed such an assignment and delivered it to McKinney; and that the plaintiffs herein were entitled to receive from McKinney the sum of $1,320, which was the balance left in his hands after deducting his commission and other expenses, and as a part of the same transaction the purchasers were entitled to have delivered to them the bill of sale of the personal property, together with the assigned lease covering the real property.

From the facts in the record and the findings of the trial court it appears that the transaction in dispute consisted of the sale of personal property located upon real estate and of the negotiation for and exchange of the lease of the real property upon which such personalty was located. The transaction, therefore, under the facts and findings comes directly within the terms of section 2 of the Real Estate Brokers' Act defining a "real estate broker" as one who "leases, or offers to lease, or negotiates the sale, purchase, or exchange of leases." The question which is presented on this appeal is whether the sale of personal property, to which the sale or exchange of a lease of the realty upon which the personal property is located is an incident, is to be treated solely as a sale of personal property and not within the Real Estate Brokers' Act. This is the contention of the appellant, and in support of the argument he cites Weingast v. Rialto Pastry Shop, Inc., 243 N. Y. 113, 152 N. E. 693, and Salisbury v. Alskog, 144 Wash. 88, 256 P. 1030. The New York statute involved in the Weingast Case defines a "real estate broker" as any person who for compensation "buys or rents, or offers or attempts to negotiate a sale, exchange, purchase or rental of an estate or interest in real estate." The court held that this language did not include one who made a specialty of procuring purchasers for restaurants, stores, and like going concerns where a lease simply goes with the place as a part of the good will. In the Salisbury Case the Washington statute defined a real estate broker as one who negotiated for the purchase, sale, exchange, lease, or rental of real estate or an interest therein. The Washington court interpreted the statute to apply to a transaction where the broker leased or rented real property, and held that it did not apply to one who sold a lease or leasehold interest in real property. The two cases are on a line with Pike v. Psihogios, 68 Cal. App. 145, 228 P. 722, where it was held under the original Real Estate Brokers' Act of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1252) that the definition of a real estate broker in that act did not include one who negotiated the sale of a lease to real property. As a result of the Pike decision, the Legislature, at its next session amended this section of the act so as to expressly include within the definition of a real estate broker one who negotiated for or sold or exchanged a lease in real property. The cases cited by appellant are therefore not applicable to the California statute as amended. In fact, the real argument of appellant, is not that our statute does not include such a transaction but that in the case at hand the interest in the lease was merely incidental to the interest in the personality sold, and that therefore that part of the transaction should be disregarded. But it is significant that the interest in the lease was of such importance that the transaction was delayed for more than a year until it could be judicially determined that the respondents were entitled to assign the lease to the purchasers, and that, if this could not be done, the whole sale would have been canceled.

[4, 5] The point is raised that the transaction upon which the liability is predicated did not come within the term of the bond. The argument is that, because the bond did not become effective until March 14, 1927, it was incumbent upon the respondents to prove that the breach occurred during its term. The trial court found that on March 27, 1927, McKinney misappropriated the money entrusted to him and converted it to his own use. This finding, the appellant states, is not supported by the evidence, but the appellant has taken its appeal under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, and has failed to print any of the evidence or the findings which it attacks. We must therefore assume, in support of the judgment of the trial court, that its findings were based upon competent evidence, and we will not search the typewritten record to discover if error has occurred. Estate of Berry, 195 Cal. 354, 358, 233 P. 830.

The evidence upon which the respondents rely is that the sale was made on May 27, 1926, and the purchase price delivered to McKinney in escrow to be held by him in the event of a controversy "until adjudication by a court of jurisdiction." A controversy actually arose over the right of the respondents to assign to the purchasers the lease covering the premises upon which the service station was located. On June 1, 1926, the purchasers notified McKinney not to turn over the money because of this controversy, and on June 7 of the same year the respondents filed an action in the superior court to have these rights adjudicated. On January 20, 1927, judgment was entered in favor of these respondents in that action decreeing that they had the right to assign the lease involved. After the entry of this judgment a demand was made upon McKinney for the balance of the purchase money, but he refused to turn it over to them upon advice of counsel that the adjudication referred to in the escrow instructions meant a final judgment, and that he should therefore hold the money until the expiration of 60 days after the entry of the judgment in the case referred to. When the 60 days had expired, the respondents again demanded of McKinney that he turn the money over to them, but he refused, stating at the time that he had used it for other purposes. This demand, it is claimed, was made on March 27 or 29, 1927, within the period covered by the term of appellant's bond.

[6] Finally, it is argued that the breach for which recovery was had does not come within the terms of the bond. Section 9a of the Real Estate Brokers' Act, as amended in 1923 (St. 1923, p. 93), calls for a bond conditioned for the faithful performance by the broker of any undertaking as a licensed real estate broker under the act. The same section provides that any person injured by the failure of the broker "to perform his duties, or comply with the provisions of this act" has a right of action against the broker and the surety for the recovery of damages sustained by the failure of the broker to perform his duties or to comply with the provisions of the act. The bond which was given pursuant to the terms of the act is in the same language. It will be noted that the breach for which recovery may be had may arise either from a failure of the broker to perform his duties as such or from his failure to comply with any of the provisions of the act. In this respect the act differs from the Corporate Securities Act, prior to its amendment in 1925, which required a bond conditioned for the "compliance with the provisions of law." This language was held, in Blumenthal v. Larson, 79 Cal. App. 726, 730, 248 P. 681, to relate to a compliance with the terms of the Corporate Securities Act alone. The same ruling was made in Mitchell v. Smith (Cal. Sup.) 267 P. 540, where the court commented upon the amendment to the Securities Act in 1925, which extended the liability of the surety under bonds given pursuant to the act. The language of the Real Estate Act, like this amendment of 1925, is so much broader than the language of the original Securities Act that the cases cited are not applicable to the case presented here. If the act intended to limit the application of the bond to a failure to perform duties specified in the act itself, there would have been no need of adding the alternative—the failure on the part of the broker to perform his duties as a licensed broker. It cannot be doubted that, when a licensed broker has obtained the proceeds of a sale of property belonging to his principal and refuses to turn over such proceeds to his principal, he has failed to perform the duty incumbent upon him as such broker or agent irrespective of any provision of the act requiring him to do so.

Judgment affirmed.

In re IVEY'S ESTATE.★

BROWN et al. v. NELSON et al.

(Civ. 6094.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 30, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 19, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 27, 1928.

1. Trial ⚡139(1)—Wills ⚡326—Nonsuit may be granted in civil actions, including will contests, only where plaintiff's case is entirely unsupported by evidence.

In civil actions, including will contests, nonsuit may be granted only where plaintiff's case is entirely unsupported by evidence, or where no evidence has been presented on some indispensable averment of complaint, and, if different conclusions reasonably may be drawn from evidence, or even if any doubt exists as to whether evidence is sufficient, nonsuit should be denied.

2. Wills ⚡50—Testator has "testamentary capacity" if able to understand nature of his act, nature and situation of property, and relations to persons having claims on his bounty.

A testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory if, at time of making will, he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, to understand and recollect the nature and situation of his property, his relations to persons who have claims on his bounty, and whose interests are affected by provisions of instrument.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Testamentary Capacity.]

3. Wills ⚡21, 53(2)—"Testamentary capacity" depends on whether testator was of sound mind at instant of execution of will, but circumstances before and after execution may be considered.

In determining testamentary capacity, the ultimate question is whether, at very instant will was executed, testator was of sound mind, but testamentary capacity may be indicated by circumstances and conditions surrounding testator both before and after execution of will.

4. Wills ⚡324(2)—Evidence held sufficient to take issue of testatrix' testamentary capacity to jury.

In will contest, evidence of testatrix' testamentary capacity at time of execution of will held sufficient to require submission of issue to jury, and court erred in granting nonsuit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Proceeding by Pearl L. Brown and another against Maud L. Nelson and another, executrices of the estate of Anna M. Ivey, deceased, and others, to contest the will of deceased after probate. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellants.
R. D. McLaughlin and J. B. McLaughlin, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. From the record it appears that Anna M. Ivey made her will by which she devised and bequeathed the greater part of her estate to her two living daughters. Following her decease, and after her will had been admitted to probate, two of her grandchildren, who were children of a deceased daughter of the testatrix, instituted a contest of the will on each of the grounds of insanity and of undue influence. On the trial, at the close of the evidence introduced by contestants, on motion made by the proponent of the will, the trial court ordered a nonsuit as to each of the issues presented by the contest, and judgment was entered accordingly. It is from such judgment that this appeal is taken.

While the notice of appeal purports to be taken from "the whole" of the judgment, the only point presented for consideration of this court is "whether or not Mrs. Ivey at the date of the execution of the will was of sound mind."

In substance, it appears that the evidence adduced by the contestants on the trial of the action showed the following state of facts: At the time the will was executed Mrs. Ivey was 92 years of age. She was nearly blind, and, because of her infirmities, was constantly under the care of an attendant. On account of her defective sight, she was unable to read, and could write her name only when her hand was placed in position to do so. Covering a comparatively short period of time preceding the execution of the will, which occurred 17 days before the demise of Mrs. Ivey, as well as subsequent to the date on which the will was signed, and up to the time of her death, the physical and mental condition of Mrs. Ivey was described by various witnesses. For the greater part, the following are excerpts taken from the testimony of five different witnesses:

"She looked very bad. * * * She was very weak. * * * Failing. * * * There were times when she was very rational and there was times when she was anything but right. * * * At times she seemed rational; then again she did not. * * * She was physically very weak and very feeble, and mentally in one sentence she was fairly rational; the next she would contradict it and be absolutely irrational. * * * One minute she did (appear to know what she was talking about) and one minute she did not. * * * At times she seemed perfectly rational in her talking, and at other times she would appear to repeat, and so forth. * * * She talked irrational; I would say she was irrational for a year before she passed away, not at all times; she had periods of being rational, and then again she was absolutely irresponsible. * * * The last visits (within a week of Mrs. Ivey's death) she was very much excited and was not clear in just what she was saying. * * * A few weeks before her death she seemed very bad, very irrational."

Furthermore, with reference to the instability of mind of Mrs. Ivey, the following statements were also made by different witnesses:

"She would make statements and then she would contradict them in the same breath, and she said a great many things about her daughters' girls, things that were out of all reason to say against anybody. * * * Quite frequently (she contradicted herself). * * * She said things and contradicted things and made statements that I knew were not so."

A witness narrated the following incident as a part of a conversation which took place between her and Mrs. Ivey at a time when Mrs. Ivey was quite ill, and about one week before she died:

"Well, she told the lady she had housekeeping for her to go and get her sweater. She said Mr. Nelson had given her a sweater and she wanted me to see it, and the lady went and got it, and she says, 'Now, this is purple, isn't it? I can't see whether it is purple, or what, but they tell me it is purple.' I said, 'Yes, it is purple.' She said, 'Do you know what I want you to do?' I said, 'No.' She said, 'I have some white feathers. I want you to take them white feathers over home and color them purple like this sweater.' I said, 'What are you going to do with them?' She said, 'I am going to have a bonnet made.' I said, 'Are you going to take a trip?' She said, 'Yes, I am going to Sacramento. I want those feathers colored purple to put on my bonnet and I am going to take a trip.'"

As to her memory, the following appeared in evidence:

"Well, when I went there she seemed to be very poorly, but as she grew older, and as long as I was there, she was getting very poor and her memory was failing a good deal. * * * She was very forgetful. * * * At times she had no memory. * * * I would say she rambled a good deal, what I mean by that, she would talk about things and switch about to other things and contradict herself. In other words, she would not stay put on any one subject only for a moment or two. * * * She would ask a question and then before you could give her an answer she would repeat the question, and if you gave her an answer she would say, 'Oh, never mind, never mind.' * * * She talked the same thing over and over again. * * * She would talk it (the same subject) over several times during the day. * * * She would go from one thing to another. * * * One thing she would say which there was no truth or sense in, she just said, 'I have done something I shouldn't.' I said, 'What have you done?' She said, 'Oh, I don't remember. I just don't remember; I just don't remember.' That is all I could get out of her."

It also appeared in evidence that Mrs. Ivey talked to herself; that she would talk as though she were conversing with persons who were not present. Some months preceding her death a pet dog owned by Mrs. Ivey died. After the death of the dog, while lying in her bed, Mrs. Ivey "talked to this dog, purporting to pet it, and instructed her nurse or attendant about the care of the dog, and she would then call for the dog to have it brought to her bed and attempt to converse with him." A half dozen times a day she would call for this dead dog. With reference to another purported hallucination of the testatrix, the evidence included the following conversation, which took place between Mrs. Ivey and one of the contestants:

"She said to me one day, 'Pearl, what is that across the street?' I said, 'Where do you mean, grandma?' She said, 'Up in that window, isn't somebody standing over there?' I said, 'No.' She said, 'Look again, I think there is somebody in the window.' I said, 'No, grandma, there is only the lace curtain and the shade in the window.'"

It further appears that Mrs. Ivey was in the habit of hiding rather large sums of money about the house where she lived, and that on one occasion, perhaps wrongfully, she accused some one of stealing same.

Shortly before her death Mrs. Ivey was "very much upset. She looked to me, looked like as though she had been harassed and driven to death. * * * She slept most of the time, and seemed to be in a daze. She would mumble. * * * Her conversation was not coherent and clear. She would mumble. * * * She would be sitting there and just doze off like she was going to sleep. She told me one time, 'I think I have sleeping sickness, I sit here and I go to sleep all the time.' * * * She would talk awhile and then she would stop talking and she would mumble something. I couldn't understand what she said. * * * Wouldn't say a word for perhaps twenty minutes. * * * She would take naps in the day time. * * * She appeared to be very drowsy and very weak. * * * She was inclined to be drowsy. * * * Seemed downhearted; she couldn't hardly talk. * * * She would cry and then she would talk and then she would cry. * * * She appeared to be rational * * * then she got into a terribly nervous state and began to cry. * * * She would cry a good deal. She often said, 'Oh, I wish I was dead.' About three weeks before her death she was lying in bed. * * * Then she seemed to lapse into sort of a coma, something of that kind. * * * I thought she was dying."

Based upon at least some of the foregoing circumstances, each of five different witnesses, who were intimate acquaintances of the deceased, expressed the opinion that she was of unsound mind.

[1] Broadly speaking, the rule is well established that in civil actions a motion for nonsuit may be granted only where the plaintiff's case is entirely unsupported by evidence, or where no evidence has been presented upon some indispensable averment of the complaint. More particularly, an order of nonsuit should not be made when the plaintiff has produced any evidence, or, as sometimes stated, any substantial evidence which, freed from conflicts, contradictions, or inconsistencies therein, and viewed in its most favorable light, together with all legal inferences and presumptions deducible from such evidence, would tend to support the plaintiff's case and a judgment in his favor. If different conclusions reasonably may be drawn from the evidence so interpreted, or even if any doubt exist as to whether such evidence be sufficient, the motion for a nonsuit should be denied. 9 Cal. Jur. p. 558, and cases there cited. Among the several authorities supporting the foregoing declarations of the law may be found the following statements:

"A nonsuit should be denied when there is any evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's case, without passing upon the question as to the sufficiency of such evidence." Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 77, 43 P. 408, 409.

"It is elementary that a motion for nonsuit is not to be granted where there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences favorable to the plaintiff, would support a verdict or finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true." Burr v. United Railroads, 163 Cal. 663, 665, 126 P. 873, 874.

"* * * In order to sustain a motion of this kind the defendant is bound to make a case so free from doubt that the court can say that there is no reasonable ground upon which it can continue to entertain the case or put the defendant to his defense. If there is any question of doubt left, the court is bound to leave the parties to their proof and final hearing." Wehner v. Bauer (C. C.) 160 F. 240, 245.

"It is the duty of the court if there be any doubt to let the case go to the jury." Bush v. Weed Lumber Co., 55 Cal. App. 588, 590, 204 P. 24, 25.

In Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 158 Cal. 596, 599, 112 P. 53, 54, the following is quoted with approval from Kramm v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 3 Cal. App. 606, 609, 86 P. 738, 739:

"The motion for nonsuit admits the truth of plaintiff's evidence, and every inference of fact that can be legitimately drawn therefrom, and upon such motion the evidence should be interpreted most strongly against the defendant. * * * If there is any evidence tending to sustain plaintiff's action the nonsuit should be denied, without passing upon the sufficiency of such evidence, * * * and where there is a conflict in the evidence, some of which tends to sustain the plaintiff's case, a motion for a nonsuit should not be granted. * * *

See, also, Goldstone v. Merchants' Ice etc., Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 P. 776.

And in Bush v. Wood, 8 Cal. App. 647, 651, 97 P. 709, 710, it is said:

"From the foregoing it is clear that it makes no difference, where the motion for a nonsuit is made on the close of plaintiff's case, whether the court itself believes the testimony presented or not, for, as is obvious, the material facts which the evidence tends to prove must be assumed to be true for the purposes of the motion, just the same as the material facts alleged in a pleading must be so treated in the consideration of a demurrer to such pleading. * * *

Nor is the principle limited to the ordinary civil case. It has its similar and complete application in a case involving the contest of a will; and in applying the rule no court of appellate jurisdiction is warranted in drawing any distinction between different classes of civil cases.

In Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 149, 155 P. 631, 632, it is said:

"* * * The rules of evidence and the weight to be accorded to the evidence are the same in a contested will case as in any other civil case, and those rules apply when the question goes to the sufficiency of the evidence to justify its submission to the jury. * * *

In Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 586, 82 P. 252, 253, in discussing the question involved in a motion for nonsuit, in part the court used the following language:

"* * * In determining whether or not in a proceeding to contest a will, the evidence produced by the contestants is sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury the same rules apply as in civil cases. Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the contestants. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the contestants. All the evidence in favor of the contestants must be taken as true, and if contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of the contestants all the facts necessary to make out their case, they are entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on the merits." Vermont, etc., Co. v. Declez, 135 Cal. 579, 67 P. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143; Freese v. Hibernia Savings & L. Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 P. 172; Hanley v. California, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 237, 59 P. 577, 47 L. R. A. 597; Ferris v. Baker, 127 Cal. 522, 59 P. 937; Goldstone v. Merchants', etc., Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 P. 776; Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 P. 408; Pacific M. L. Co. v. Fisher, 109 Cal.

566, 42 P. 154; O'Connor v. Hooper, 102 Cal. 528, 36 P. 939.

And in Estate of Newhall, 190 Cal. 709, 719, 214 P. 231, 235 (28 A. L. R. 778), where a similar question was before the court, the rule is thus stated:

"It is, of course, the general and well-understood rule that ordinarily upon a motion for a nonsuit, in civil cases generally, every inference favorable to plaintiff's case deducible from the evidence and every favorable presumption resulting fairly from the evidence must be taken in favor of plaintiff's case. This rule applies with equal force to cases of contests of wills. Of course, if the evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if several inferences may reasonably be made from the evidence as a whole, it goes without saying that the view most favorable to the contestant must be taken. And further, all of the evidence in favor of the contestant must, as against a motion for a nonsuit, be taken as true, and contradictory evidence, if any, must be disregarded. This having been done, if there is any substantial evidence tending to prove the fact necessary to make out the contestant's case, the motion for a nonsuit must be denied and the case given to the jury"—citing cases.

Likewise, In re Ross, 173 Cal. 178, 159 P. 603, where the following language in Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 459, 117 P. 532, 536, is quoted with approval:

"The rule is well established that in contests of wills, as in other civil actions, in determining whether the evidence presented was sufficient to take the case from a jury, the entire evidence presented is to be viewed from a point most favorable to the contestant. Disregard is had of any contradictory evidence. All facts supporting the case of contestant must be taken as true and all presumptions from the evidence and all reasonable inferences susceptible of being drawn therefrom must be considered as facts proven in his favor. * * *

Ordinarily, it may be said that on the contest of a will on the ground of insanity of the testator the particular issue to be submitted for the determination of the jury is whether, at the time of the execution of the will, the testator was possessed of testamentary capacity. Naturally, the contestant of a will is rarely able to produce any evidence favoring his contention, excepting that which relates to conditions surrounding the testator either before or after the will was executed. If the will be holographic, direct evidence of the condition of mind of the testator is practically impossible of production. If executed before witnesses who in writing probably have attested the soundness of mind of the testator, such witnesses may scarcely be presumed to be willing to stultify their former solemn declarations. And so it happens that, in the nature of things, what transpired at the exact moment when the testator affixed his signature to the document and when the witnesses, if any, certified to the facts required by the statute, are facts ordinarily extremely difficult of production by the contestant, or, if such facts be within his ready power to produce, are quite in conflict with the other evidence by which the contestant may hope to sustain his theory of the case. Consequently for the support of his cause the contestant must rely upon a showing of conditions existing either preceding or following, or both preceding and following, the precise moment when the testator signed his purported will.

[2] Testamentary capacity may be manifested by the present ability of the testator to grasp and to hold within his mental faculties all conditions necessary to the future disposition of his property. Assuredly, he must realize the nature, extent, and effect of his act, not only as relates to the property itself, but, as well, to both the persons who are to be pecuniarily benefited thereby, and those who stand in such a relation to the testator as naturally to have claims upon his bounty, and also such of the latter class who are either entirely omitted from the beneficial provisions of the will, or who are subjected to adverse discrimination thereby. More concise, and perhaps more nearly accurate, is the statement contained in Estate of Sexton, 199 Cal. 759, 764, 251 P. 778, 780, that:

"A testator is of sound and disposing mind and memory if, at the time of making his will, he has sufficient mental capacity to be able to understand the nature of the act he is doing, to understand and recollect the nature and situation of his property and to remember, and understand his relations to, the persons who have claims upon his bounty and whose interests are affected by the provisions of the instrument"—citing cases.

While the rule in the abstract may not be so difficult in its formulation, its application to concrete facts presents some obstacles. Measured by such a rule, it is obvious that the legal requirements imposed upon an aged multimillionaire, possessed possibly of dozens or hundreds of different kinds of properties, each having a value differing from each of the others, having several living sons and daughters, some grandchildren who are children of a deceased son or daughter of the testator, numerous dependent brothers, sisters, cousins, or other relatives, close friends, faithful employees, trusted servants, partners and associates in business, presenting many difficult and complex financial situations and complications arising from or incident to the disposition of a vast fortune, necessarily would present a severe test upon testamentary capacity; whereas a widower with two living sons and no other living relatives, whose sole possession is $500 in cash, and who is confronted with none of the attachments or situations ordinarily surrounding a man of great wealth, will suffer comparatively little mental strain in qualifying for the legal ordeal. It results that, viewed superficially, the law does not appear to bear impartially, or uniformly, or with equal severity, upon all persons. If, perchance, on a given date, measured by the rule of thumb, the man of immense wealth, though wishing to make a will, and understanding perfectly the nature of the proposed act, be unable to remember and to carry in his mind the various details concerning the nature, situation, and extent of his numerous properties, together with the number and names of his relatives, friends, employees, servants and business associates (assuming that each of them has some claim upon his bounty), and consequently be to that extent of "unsound mind"—but by reason of some turn of the wheel of fortune, or by reason of some great catastrophe, his vast wealth be swept away in one night, and all his servants, employees, friends and relatives, other than two sons, be killed, and thereby he have remaining but a comparatively small pittance for testamentary disposition, with no one other than two living sons having a claim upon his "bounty"—however deep and abiding his grief, or how intense his anguish, if then, in his altered circumstances, and on the day following such determination of his lack of testamentary capacity, he still desire to make his will, and can but correctly remember that his sole possession consists of $500 in cash, and that of all his former relatives, friends, etc., his two sons are the sole survivors, on that instant his late "unsoundness of mind" will be completely cured, and his "testamentary capacity" be perfectly restored. The brain of the millionaire may be unsound; but the same brain, transferred to the comparatively impecunious individual, unquestionably will be capable of complying with all legal requirements. It thus becomes apparent that, tested by the rule of law to which reference has been had, memory, and not necessarily brain power, or even superintelligence, is the all-important and essential prerequisite to legal ability to dispose of property by will.

[3, 4] As hereinbefore suggested, while the ultimate question always is whether, at the very instant the will was executed, was the testator of sound mind, nevertheless testamentary capacity may be indicated by circumstances and conditions surrounding the testator both before and after the execution of the will, respectively, just as certainly, clearly, and unmistakably as by evidence of what was the general conduct and condition of the testator at the very instant that the testator affixed his name to the instrument. Evidence of whims, fantasies, vagaries, hallucinations, or delusions in the mind of the testator at a time shortly preceding the execution of the will, and also at a time closely following its execution, would constitute a foundation for an inference that the condition of mind of the testator was at least unstable at the very moment when the signature of the testator was affixed to the instrument. Just so, abnormally advanced age, weakened physical condition, "terribly nervous state," excitability, repeated periods of weeping, "very much upset," presenting the appearance of having been "harassed and driven to death," irrationality, irresponsibility, incoherency, mumbling, rambling, talking to persons not present, contradictions or inconsistencies in speech, inability to carry the thread of a conversation, repetition of statements, the making of improbable or palpably untrue statements, general loss of memory, downheartedness, wishing he were dead, drowsiness, sleeping most of the time, in a daze, and, finally, coma in the testator, together with the respective opinions of several of his intimate acquaintances to the effect that the testator was of unsound mind—would constitute some substantial evidence that the testator was not entirely normal in either mind or body, or possessed of testamentary capacity. Universally it is conceded that evidence of such facts as heretofore have been set forth herein is admissible for the very purpose of tending to prove the unsoundness of mind of the testator.

It is manifest that, unless such facts tend to prove unsoundness of mind, they are wholly irrelevant to the issue, and consequently inadmissible in evidence. Unless relevant, they would be utterly useless, and have no legitimate place in the evidence. Being clearly pertinent to the inquiry, the conclusion is irresistible that they furnish some substantial evidence relating to the testamentary capacity of the testator. The authorities to which attention has been directed herein are to the effect that if any substantial evidence be adduced by the contestant, based upon which reasonable men might differ as to whether the testator was of sound mind, a motion for a nonsuit may not be legally granted. It would seem so clear as to be beyond controversy that one reasonable man might differ from another as to the effect of the evidence herein regarding the question of the unsoundness of mind of the testatrix. At least, the correct determination of the question is not "free from doubt." Considering that according to the evidence, which, freed from inconsistencies or contradictions, shows conclusively that as to the testatrix each of the conditions referred to herein was present, both practically immediately before and, as well, closely following the time when the will was executed, we are constrained to hold that the requirements as to the quantum of evidence essential to the submission of the question to the jury were presented by the contestant, and, consequently, that the motion for nonsuit should have been denied. In so ruling this court is not unmindful of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of this state which may seem to indicate that the ruling by the trial court was proper. But in none of such cases was the evidence anything like as great in volume or in quality as it was in the instant case. After all that may be said or written affecting any particular case, the law as therein laid down has its application more peculiarly to that one case; and, while the principle of law therein announced may have its application to other cases, the decision of each case must ultimately rest upon its own facts.

The judgment is reversed.

94 Cal. App. 602

JONES v. STEVENS et al. (Civ. 3563.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Oct. 30, 1928.

1. Escrows ⇨14(1)—Evidence held to justify finding that contract was delivered to contractor by escrow holder in violation of defendants' instructions, requiring its retention while contractor secured rentals and loan.

In contractor's action to recover on contract placed in escrow pending contractor's securing rentals and loan for carrying on work, evidence held to sustain trial court's finding that contract was delivered to contractor by escrow holder against defendants' instructions.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's determination of conflicts in evidence is conclusive on appeal.

Trial court determines conflicts in evidence, and its determination is conclusive on appeal.

3. Escrows ⇨3—One whose agency extends merely to procuring contract cannot receive contract in escrow for conditional delivery to his principal (Civ. Code, §§ 1056, 1057, 1627).

Delivery of contract in escrow may be made to general agent of party to whom a conditional delivery is intended to be made, but contract cannot be delivered in escrow if the proposed escrow holder is agent merely for the purpose of procuring the contract under Civ. Code, §§ 1056, 1057, 1627.

4. Contracts ⇨350(2)—Evidence held to sustain findings that contractor suing for compensation for erecting apartment house had agreed to secure rentals and procure loan for financing building.

In contractor's action to recover compensation under contract for erection of apartment house, evidence held to sustain findings of trial court that contractor agreed to secure rental from tenants of proposed apartment building in the sum of $4,500 and to secure advance for defendants to finance building.

5. Contracts ⇨321(1)—Contractor's breach of agreement to secure advance rental and procure loan to finance erection of apartment building precluded recovery of compensation under contract.

Failure of contractor to secure advance rental from tenants of proposed apartment building, and failure to secure loan for defendants upon property to enable them to finance erection of apartment building, as agreed, held to preclude recovery of compensation under contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Victor R. McLucas, Judge.

Action by R. V. Jones, Jr., against Maye D. Stevens and husband. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for the alleged breach by the defendants of a building contract.

The cause was tried by the court, sitting without a jury, and judgment passed for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals upon a record prepared in accord with sections 953a and 953b of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The nature of the contract upon which this action is founded is in substance well explained in the complaint as follows:

"On or about the 11th day of December, 1923, at the City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, State of California, plaintiff and defendants made and entered into a contract in writing dated the 11th day of December, 1923, wherein and whereby plaintiff, therein designated as contractor and architect, agreed to furnish and provide necessary labor and materials, tools, implements and appliances, and to do and perform in a good and workmanlike manner, the preparing and drawing of plans and specifications and the construction of an apartment house in accordance therewith upon that certain real property owned by said defendants in the City of Los Angeles, County of Los Angeles, State of California, described as follows, to-wit:

"East Half of Lot Four (4), Block Nine (9), of Los Angeles Homestead Tract. Said lot being 52.75 x 177 feet.

"Construction work to commence on or about the 1st day of March, 1924, and said defendants promised and agreed to pay plaintiff therefor, as contractor in the construction of said Thirty-two-room apartment house, the actual net cost of materials furnished and labor performed by plaintiff thereunder in the construction of such building, plus a profit of Ten (10%) per cent. thereof, and said defendants further promised and agreed to pay plaintiff as compensation for services in drawing such plans and specifications and the performance of services as architect as might be required on and in the construction of said building an additional sum of Five (5%) per cent. of the estimated cost of construction, which said estimated cost was fixed at the sum of Thirty-two Thousand ($32,000.00) Dollars, which Five (5%) per cent. was to be paid to said plaintiff in addition to the sums otherwise provided to be paid to plaintiff for his services as contractor in building and constructing said building and appurtenances, and it was further provided that such compensation to be so paid to said plaintiff by said defendants as contractor should not, in any event, exceed the sum of Thirty-Two Hundred ($3,200.00) Dollars, and his compensation for services as such architect should not exceed the additional sum of Sixteen Hundred ($1,600.00) Dollars."

The complaint alleges that, upon the making of said contract by the plaintiff and the defendants, the former forthwith entered upon the performance of the terms thereof, "and between the 11th day of December, 1923, and the 23d day of February, 1924, drew and prepared plans and specifications for the building and appurtenances described in said contract." It is alleged that, at all times from the date of the making of said contract, the plaintiff has been "and now is" ready, willing and able to fully and punctually perform all the covenants on his part to be performed, as set forth in said contract, but that he has been prevented from so doing by the "defendants' failure, neglect and refusal to perform said contract on their part; and their refusal to allow plaintiff to further perform the same on his part"; that defendants were notified in writing of their refusal to proceed with the performance of the contract on the 25th day of March, 1925; that the acts of the defendants in refusing to perform their obligations under said contract and in thereby preventing plaintiff from carrying out his part of the convention, were without cause or excuse, "in violation of the terms of said contract, and against the will and without the consent of plaintiff." The aggregate damages claimed are segregated and listed in the complaint as follows:

"In the sum of Three Thousand Two Hundred ($3,200.00) Dollars, being Ten (10%) per cent. of the estimated cost of construction of said Thirty-two-room apartment house described in said contract, the amount of the compensation provided therein for the services of plaintiff as contractor, and in the further sum of one Thousand Six Hundred ($1,600.00) Dollars, being Five (5%) per cent. of the estimated cost of construction of said Thirty-two-room apartment house described in said contract as compensation for plaintiff's services as architect, and

"In the further sum of Twenty ($20.00) Dollars expended and laid out by plaintiff in causing the real estate described in said contract to be surveyed."

The contract in its entirety is by the complaint expressly made a part thereof.

At this point, it may parenthetically be stated that the testimony of both the plaintiff and the defendant, Mrs. Stevens, was that, notwithstanding that the contract bears date of December 11, 1923, it was not in point of fact signed by the former and the latter until some time in the month of January, 1924; the plaintiff testifying that he and Mrs. Stevens signed the instrument at some time between the 15th and 20th of January, 1924, and Mrs. Stevens testifying that she and plaintiff subscribed their names thereto on the 24th day of January, 1924.

The answer denies specifically each of the averments of the complaint, and then alleges:

"That plaintiff represented to the defendant that he, the plaintiff, could and would, upon the execution of the contract involved in this act, if signed and delivered by the defendants, secure for the defendants an advance rental from tenants in the sum of $4,000; that thereupon these defendants were to advance the sum of $2,000 and the plaintiff was then to secure a loan upon said property in a sufficient amount to complete said building, said loan to bear not to exceed 7% interest; that plaintiff has failed, neglected and refused to do any of the things above mentioned, but did specifically agree with the defendants on January 14, 1924, and subsequent to the date of the contract upon which this suit is brought, as follows:

"January 14, 1924.
"Maye D. Stevens, 1111½ W. 17th St., Los Angeles, Calif.

"Dear Madam: In regards to your proposed apartment building to be built on Lot 4 Block 9, Los Angeles Homestead Tract, will state that if we are unable to secure you a loan there will be no charge made for plans and specifications.

"We further agree to find a party to lease said building at Seventeen ($17.00) Dollars a room.

"Yours truly, R. V. Jones, Jr."

Proceeding, the answer charges that—

The plaintiff "has totally failed and refused to secure a tenant for said building who would either pay the sum of $17.00 per room or the sum of $4,000 in cash; that he has failed to secure a loan on said building or to place a loan with the funds available to these defendants, or to do any of the things in said contract, except to present plans and specifications upon which these defendants refused to proceed," etc.

As a special defense, the defendants by their answer reallege the promise of plaintiff that, to promote and facilitate the construction of the proposed apartment house, he would, secure an advance cash rental for the rooms or apartments in the proposed apartment house, and that he (plaintiff), upon an advance of $2,000 by the defendants, would secure a sufficient loan on the building to complete its construction, and the refusal and failure of the plaintiff to carry out said promise. The answer then proceeds:

"That at the time of the execution of said contract, it was delivered by them, after its signature, to the agent of the plaintiff to wit, one — Gregg, with the distinct understanding and agreement that the said Gregg would hold the contract, as the agent of these defendants, until such time as the said R. V. Jones should well and truly execute and deliver to the defendants a written agreement under the terms of which it should be specifically agreed on his part to do the things herein mentioned, to wit, to secure the loan, to secure the tenants, and to do the other things herein mentioned; that the said Gregg, without the consent or knowledge of these defendants, and in violation of the instructions given to him, and in collusion with the plaintiff, delivered said contract and secured back only the statement under date of January 14, 1924, to which reference is herein made, and these defendants allege that the plaintiff has not performed even the agreements and covenants mentioned in said statement of January 14, 1924. Defendants further allege that the said contract should not have been delivered and was never intended to be delivered to the plaintiff until such time as he should have arranged to do the things agreed by him that he would do, and that for this reason there was no consideration for the execution of said contract, even though the same had been delivered," etc.

The court, among other things, found (finding 6) that the plaintiff represented to the defendants that if they would sign and deliver to him the contract pleaded, he could and would, upon such signing, secure for the defendants the sum of $4,000 for the purpose above explained, that he could and would secure for defendants, upon an advance to him by the latter of the sum of $2,000, a loan sufficient to complete the construction of the building, that thereupon defendants did advance said sum of $2,000, but that plaintiff "failed, neglected and refused" to do those things; that the defendant Maye D. Stevens, under the circumstances, and upon the condition and with the instructions and understanding as alleged in the answer, and which are hereinbefore set forth, gave the contract to one Gregg, under specific instructions and with the distinct understanding that the instrument was not to be delivered into the manual possession of the plaintiff until the latter should have complied with the conditions as explained above, but that said Gregg, in violation of said instructions, "and in collusion with the plaintiff," delivered said contract to the latter, "and secured back only the statement under date of January 14th, 1924" (being the writing hereinabove reproduced from the answer); "that it is true that plaintiff has not performed even the agreements and covenants mentioned in said statement of January 14, 1924; that it is true that said contract should not have been delivered and was not intended to be delivered to the plaintiff until such time as he should have arranged to do the things agreed by him that he would do; and that for this reason there was no consideration for the execution of said contract or the delivery thereof by these defendants. The court further finds (finding 9) that the plaintiff did not, in order to promote the construction of said apartment house, secure for the use or benefit of defendants the sum of $4,000 advance rental; that he did not secure a loan on said building to bear interest at the rate of not in excess of 7 per cent. per annum."

[1, 2] Both findings 6 and 9 derive ample support from the evidence. The testimony of the defendant Mrs. Maye Stevens was that her husband was in Arizona when he signed the contract, she having by mail sent the instrument to him before she or the plaintiff signed it. This testimony of Mrs. Stevens was corroborated by that of her husband. Her testimony further verified the allegations of the answer relative to the placing by her of the contract, after it was signed by her and her husband, in the hands of O. M. Gregg (referred to in the above findings as "one Gregg"), with specific instructions to Gregg that he was not to deliver the instrument to the plaintiff until the latter had executed and delivered to her and her husband a written promise or agreement that he would secure the rentals mentioned and a loan of sufficient money upon the property to complete the construction of the building and also the allegation as to the delivery by Gregg to plaintiff, contrary to said instructions, of said contract, or in making such delivery without first having obtained from plaintiff for the defendants such agreement. This testimony supports the finding as to the matter of the delivery of the contract against the instructions of Mrs. Stevens, although, it is to be said, there was other testimony apparently tending to contradict or at least discredit the testimony of Mrs. Stevens regarding that transaction. It was, of course, for the trial court to determine the evidentiary conflict, and its decision in favor of the defendants upon the question of the delivery of the contract is conclusive upon appeal. The defendants contend that the delivery of the contract by Gregg to the plaintiff under the indicated circumstances was neither in law nor in point of fact a delivery, and that therefore the minds of the parties never met on the terms and the covenants of the agreement; that hence no contract for the construction of the building was ever entered into between them.

[3] The undisputed testimony discloses that Gregg was an agent of the plaintiff for the very purpose of procuring building contracts. The scope of his authority as plaintiff's agent was circumscribed to the securing of contracts for his principal from persons desiring or intending to or contemplating the erection of buildings upon their real property or to conduct preliminary negotiations which would lead to the bringing of such parties and the plaintiff together with the view of securing such contracts. He was, in other words, a special agent whose authority as such was restricted to the performance of a particular kind of duty. The rule now seems to be settled that, while a delivery of a contract in escrow may be made to the general agent of the party to whom a conditional delivery is intended to be made, such delivery cannot be so made if the agency is, as here, for the purpose of procuring the contract. 10 R. C. L. 631; 10 Cal. Jur. 586; Civ. Code, §§ 1056, 1057, and 1627. There are, of course, conceivable circumstances under which the deposit of a contract in escrow with such special agent, to be delivered to his principal upon the happening of a specified condition, could and properly would be sustained, as, for illustration, where the possession of the contract by the agent as such "escrowee" is obtained by the fraud either of the agent or the principal or by both acting in unison to accomplish the fraudulent purpose. But it is not necessary further to consider this branch of the controversy between the parties, since upon another consideration the judgment must be upheld.

[4] As has been stated, the answer alleges (and the court finds) that, for the purpose of promoting the construction of the building, the plaintiff agreed that he would secure for the defendants the sum of $4,000 advance rental and also a loan on the property in a sum sufficient to complete the construction of the apartment house; that plaintiff failed and refused to procure such rental and such loan. In support of these allegations, the defendant introduced in evidence the letter or document set forth hereinabove as a part of the answer of the defendants, which is dated January 14, 1924, and signed by the plaintiff. From that document it is clear that the plaintiff agreed to procure the sum of $4,000 as advance rental for apartments in the building, and, further, it is clearly to be implied therefrom that he also agreed to procure a loan on the property of a sufficient sum of money to complete the construction of the building. There was also introduced in evidence a letter, addressed to plaintiff by Mrs. Stevens, and signed by her, and dated at Somerton, Ariz., January 24, 1924, which is in the following language:

"Will accept your offer for lease on proposed Apt. House. Will lease for 5 years or more at $17.00 per room with $4,000.00 in advance to be applied to construction building."

That letter, together with the one to the defendants from plaintiff dated January 14, 1924 (hereinabove set forth), and the contract, dated December 11, 1923, but executed January 24, 1924, must be construed as one document, or the two letters mentioned read as a part of the contract of date December 11, 1924. As so read, and as is made clear from the parol testimony properly received for the purpose of explaining and establishing their connection with each other, there is left no reasonable ground for doubting that the finding that the plaintiff did promise to secure the advance rental and the loan referred to as the necessary means for promoting the financing of the work of constructing the apartment house rests upon a sound evidentiary foundation. This testimony came not alone from Mrs. Stevens but also from the plaintiff himself. We need not repeat herein the testimony of Mrs. Stevens as to that phase of the transaction, and only so much of the testimony of the plaintiff as will unquestionably show that he did make such an agreement and that it was a part of the contract for the erection of the building. He testified that—

"When we first started talking to her (Mrs. Stevens) I told her we could procure a loan for the amount she required, and also lease the apartment house. * * * I told her that we would secure whatever money that she needed for financing the apartment house. * * * I told her I would take a first mortgage for $25,000.00 and a second mortgage for $7,000.00."

Proceeding, the plaintiff said that he had arranged to secure the money from R. V. Jones & Co., a corporation, of which he was secretary, and in which his father practically owned all the capital stock. But it is made by the testimony perfectly plain that the plaintiff had never made any such arrangements for securing the loan from the corporation or his father as would or did place him in the position of one ready and able to procure the loan, even if he was willing to do so. Mrs. Stevens testified that, having been assured by the plaintiff that he had made definite arrangements for securing the loan from the Jones corporation, she insisted that the money so acquired should be placed in escrow—that is, placed in the hands of some disinterested third party—so that it would be readily available as payments on the work of construction from time to time fell due, but that the plaintiff replied that his father would not stand for such an arrangement, or words to that effect. But it is perfectly clear from the evidence that the plaintiff at no time was able to provide the loan which he agreed to procure to finance the construction of the building. In fact, his own testimony, as well as the records of the corporation from which he represented to the defendants he could secure such loan, shows that he had obtained no agreement or promise from the corporation or from his father for the loan of the money which could be enforced in law. It was admitted by the plaintiff through his counsel that there was nothing on the minutes of the corporation or any of the records of its transactions showing that any such loan had been asked from or considered by the corporation. It is true that the plaintiff testified that he applied to the corporation for the loan, and that, after he and his father (in December, 1923) went to and inspected the premises, the latter said to him (plaintiff) that he (the father) would make the loan and directed the plaintiff to prepare the necessary documents to effect the transaction, but the loan was not made, nor were any proper documents prepared, so far as the record shows, looking to the consummation of the loan, or any showing that there was any intention on the part of the corporation of making it. It also appears that in June, 1925, the corporation addressed a letter to the plaintiff, stating that it would make the loan; but that letter and the proposition it contained were prepared, sent to and received by the defendants a trifle over a year after the present action was commenced, and they were therefore wholly without any legal force. Thus it is plain that the plaintiff was not at any time in the course of the negotiations involving the construction of the proposed building able and ready to furnish or procure a loan of a sufficient sum of money necessary to the financing of the construction of the building or any loan for that purpose at all. This loan, as is obvious, constituted the dominant feature or element of the consideration upon which the defendants were induced to sign the contract for the erection of the proposed apartment house. Nor did the plaintiff at any time procure the $4,000 advance rental which he promised to secure. In this connection, it should be stated that there was received in evidence, at the behest of the plaintiff, a letter dated March 12, 1924, and signed by him and addressed to the defendants, in which he "guaranteed" to secure a tenant "for you before your building is complete, and in case we are not able to secure a lease, we will at once lease it upon completion and furnish it ourselves, for ten (10) years and Four Thousand Dollars ($4,000.00) advance rent." Mrs. Stevens testified that neither she nor her husband ever received or saw such a letter. The trial court, as is necessarily to be implied from its findings, accepted Mrs. Stevens' testimony as verity regarding that matter, and so this court must accept it.

[5] The findings (particularly findings 6 and 9), as has been above pointed out, being of facts alleged in the answer, and, as likewise shown, being strongly bolstered by the evidence, disclose a complete defense to plaintiff's action. Merzozian v. Kludjian, 183 Cal. 422, 428, 191 P. 673; Pellaton v. Brunski, 69 Cal. App. 301, 304, 231 P. 583; Tashjian v. Krikorian, 55 Cal. App. 160, 164, 202 P. 956; McCarthy v. Grider, 72 Cal. App. 393, 402, et seq., 237 P. 751. In the last-named case (an action for the rescission of a contract), an offer in writing was made by the vendee to the vendor under said contract, which was for the purchase and sale of lands, to pay the balance of the purchase price, provided the vendor could and would tender and give to the vendee a merchantable title to the property. It was shown that the vendee did not himself have the money necessary to make good the offer, but the vendee or offerer testified that he had sought a loan of sufficient money from a bank to cover the amount to be paid, and that the bank agreed to let him have the loan if he furnished personal security in the person of a certain other party, who had promised the vendee that he would become a surety on the note for the loan. The evidence showed that the proposed surety was under no legal obligation to indorse or become a surety on the note—that the promise of the proposed surety to become such was a mere naked promise or without consideration. Under this state of facts, it was held, of course, that the offer was not a valid one because the vendee or offerer was not ready and able to make the offer good. The court said:

"In actions by brokers to recover commissions for procuring a purchaser of property, it is requisite, to support such actions, that it be shown that such proposed purchaser is ready, able, and willing to make the purchase, and where it appears in any such action that the purported ability of the purchaser to make the purchase is wholly dependent upon the verbal promises of a third party, without consideration, to assist him in securing the money necessary to make the purchase, then the latter is not shown to be able to make such purchase, and the broker is hence not entitled to recover. He has not shown that he produced a purchaser either able or ready to purchase. (Merzozian v. Kludjian, 183 Cal. 422, 191 P. 673, per Lawlor, J.; 4 Cal. Jur. 591; note, 1 A. L. R. 528.) The principle thus stated is, of course, applicable to any case where, as here, an offer to perform an act carries with it the necessity for the payment of money to make good the offer of performance as a condition to the performance of a concurrent condition by him to whom the offer is made."

The other cases above cited hold to the same principle.

For the reasons hereinabove given, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

JENSEN, State Director of Department of Institutions, v. McCULLOUGH, County Treasurer. (Civ. 6427.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Oct. 19, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 17, 1928.

1. Mandamus $\Rightarrow$ 154(10)—Clerical error in reciting wrong year appearing on face of petition may be corrected.

Where petition to require county treasurer to pay state treasurer moneys claimed to be due alleged certain sums were due in 1927, and that county treasurer refused to pay sum in 1926, clerical error on face of petition in reciting year 1926 instead of 1927 may be corrected.

2. Mandamus $\Rightarrow$ 154(7)—Ordinarily, mandamus petition must allege demand and refusal, unless duty is public or demand would have been useless.

In ordinary cases of mandamus, petition must allege that demand was made on respondent to perform act, and that he refused to comply, except when act is mere public duty affecting public at large and in which petitioner has no immediate benefit, or when attitude of respondent shows that demand would have been refused if made.

3. Mandamus ☞154(7)—In mandamus to compel county treasurer to pay moneys due state, allegation of specific demand is not necessary (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In petition for mandamus to compel county treasurer to pay moneys due state, brought under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, for benefit of state and without any private or personal interest by petitioner in subject-matter, law itself stands in lieu of demand, and it is not necessary to allege that specific demand has been made.

4. Mandamus ☞154(7)—Mandamus to compel county treasurer to pay moneys due state did not require allegation of demand, where county treasurer asserted continued resistance against claim (Pol. Code, § 2192).

Where county treasurer in his brief stated that he resisted and would continue to resist all efforts to compel him to pay money in unauthorized manner as attempted, and that for 30 years county has contended that it could not be compelled to make payments under Pol. Code, § 2192, mandamus petition to compel county treasurer to pay money due state did not require allegation of specific demand.

5. Mandamus ☞154(7)—Petition to compel county treasurer to pay state money due, alleging treasurer refused to pay on order of controller, if insufficient to allege demand, showed treasurer was not prejudiced.

Petition to compel county treasurer to pay state money due, alleging that county treasurer refused to pay on order of controller, if not sufficient as allegation that demand was made, was sufficient to show that county treasurer was not prejudiced by failure to more specifically allege demand.

6. Mandamus ☞154(4)—Mandamus to require county treasurer to pay moneys due state, alleging treasurer refused payment on order of controller, sufficiently raised issue of county treasurer's duty (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, 4101, subds. 6, 7).

Petition to require county treasurer to pay moneys due state under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, alleging that at time of settlement with state, county treasurer refused to pay, on order of controller, amounts found due to state, did not fail to show amount had ever been found due state, but was sufficient to raise issue of county treasurer's duty under section 4101, subds. 6, 7, requiring county treasurer to pay money on warrants or "as otherwise provided for by law."

7. Mandamus ☞15—That amount demanded of county treasurer was not in fact due is matter of defense in proceeding to require payment (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In mandamus petition to require county treasurer to pay state money due under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, fact that amounts demanded are not in fact due is matter of defense and is one of issues to be tried in proceeding.

8. Mandamus ☞15—Auditor in determining from records amount due by county treasurer for commitments to state home does not exercise judicial function, and failure to do so is no defense to recovery of amount due (Pol. Code, § 2193).

Under Pol. Code, § 2193, authorizing director of department of institutions to require county treasurer to pay state, on order of controller, all amounts found to be due by reason of commitments from county to state home, auditor in determining amount due need only compute fixed charge on basis of number of commitments made, based solely on public records, without exercising discretion or independent judgment, and does not exercise any judicial function, so that auditor's failure to comply with statute is no defense against payment of amount to state treasurer.

9. Insane persons ☞47—Statute authorizing director of institution to require county treasurer to pay money due state held not invalid as conflicting with statute regulating payments by county (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, 4041, 4101).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, authorizing director of department of institutions to require county treasurer to pay state treasurer, on order of controller, all amounts found due state for commitments from county to state home, held not invalid as conflicting with sections 4041, 4101, authorizing supervisor to pass on all claims against county, except such as are authorized by law, and providing for disbursements on warrants of auditor or as otherwise provided by law.

10. Constitutional law ☞55—Mandamus ☞2—Statute authorizing mandamus against county treasurer to recover moneys due state held not void as relieving state of alleging there were funds applicable to claim (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193; Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 3).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, authorizing director of department of institutions to require county treasurer by writ of mandamus to pay state treasurer amounts due for commitments from county to state home, held not void as relieving state from necessity of alleging that there were funds in county treasury applicable to payment of claim as required by the Code of Civil Procedure, and therefore contrary to Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 3, prohibiting special laws regulating court practice.

11. Statutes ☞85(1)—Statute authorizing mandamus against county treasurer to recover money due for commitments to state home held not void as local or special law (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, authorizing director of department of institutions to require county treasurer by writ of mandamus to pay state treasurer amounts due for commitments from county to state home, held not contrary to Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 9, prohibiting local and special laws regulating county business.

12. Mandamus ☞3(2)—Adequacy of legal remedy is determinable by court to which mandamus application is made.

In mandamus proceedings, question of speed and adequacy of legal remedy is matter determinable by court to which application is made.

13. Mandamus ☞1—Mandamus proceedings will be more liberally entertained when question is of state-wide concern, involving construction of general state statute.

When question presented in mandamus proceeding is one of state-wide concern, involving construction of general state statute, courts have been more liberal in entertaining proceedings.

14. Mandamus ⇨3(5)—Refusal, because of adequacy of legal remedy, to entertain mandamus to compel county treasurer to pay moneys due state pending for many months and fully heard, would be abuse of discretion (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

Where application for mandamus to require county treasurer to pay money due state for commitments from county to state home, as required by Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, was pending in court for many months, and was defended on ground that statute was unconstitutional and was fully heard and briefed, it would be an abuse of discretion to refuse to entertain petition on ground that petitioner had speedy and adequate remedy at law.

15. Counties ⇨24—Act charging county for support of insane wards held not contrary to Constitution prohibiting tax on county for county purposes (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193; Const. art. 11, § 12).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, making charge against county for support of its insane wards payable by county to state treasurer, held not in violation of Const. art. 11, § 12, prohibiting Legislature from levying tax on county for county purposes.

16. Counties ⇨24—Statute making charge on county for support of its insane wards held not unconstitutional as levying tax (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193; Const. art. 13, § 14).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, making charge against county for support by state of insane wards of county, does not purport to levy tax, and is not in violation of Const. art. 13, § 14.

17. Counties ⇨153½—Act making charge against county for support of county's insane wards held not unconstitutional as appropriation of county funds for support of state institution (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193; Const. art. 13, § 14).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, making charge against county for support by state of insane wards of county, held not in violation of Const. art. 13, § 14, on ground that act attempts to appropriate county moneys for support of state institution, since act makes direct charge against county for support of patient, and whether state requires county to maintain home within its borders for feeble-minded, or whether it requires county to pay proportionate share of expenses of maintaining feeble-minded in state home, is not concern of county, which is mere agency of state and subject to direction of state in such matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, County.]

18. Counties ⇨153½—Act directly charging county for commitments to state home for insane held not unconstitutional as making gift to persons who might be liable therefor (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193; Const. art. 4, § 31).

Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, making charge against county for support by state of county's insane wards direct charge against county from which commitment to state home is made, held not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 31, as making gift to undisclosed donee who might be liable for maintenance of person committed.

19. Constitutional law ⇨26—State Constitution is limitation on Legislature's powers, not grant of power.

State Constitution is limitation on powers of Legislature, and not grant of power.

20. Counties ⇨3—Legislature, if not limited, has inherent right to subdivide state into political subdivisions and provide for government thereof.

In absence of limitation of power, Legislature without express grant has inherent right to subdivide state into political subdivisions and to prescribe mode of government, powers, duties, and obligations of each subdivision and officers and employés created for governmental functions of subdivisions.

21. Constitutional law ⇨81—Legislature has inherent power, in exercise of police power, to provide for care and maintenance of its citizens.

Legislature has inherent power, in exercise of its police power and for general welfare of state at large, to provide for care and maintenance of its citizens.

22. Counties ⇨24—Legislature may place entire burden of maintaining dependent classes on political subdivisions, or may share portion of burden with subdivisions.

In absence of some limitation on power of Legislature, entire burden of care and maintenance of dependent classes can be placed by Legislature on political subdivision of state, and Legislature may provide that portion of burden be born by political subdivision and portion of state as a whole.

23. Constitutional law ⇨70(3)—Courts cannot determine wisdom of legislative action within powers of Legislature.

Where Legislature acts within its powers, question of wisdom of its action is not for courts to determine.

24. Insane persons ⇨46—Legislature could require political subdivision to maintain home for care of feeble-minded, or provide state home and share burden of support with subdivisions.

Legislature had power to determine that each political subdivision should maintain home for care of its feeble-minded, or could provide state home for purpose and bear entire burden of maintenance, or require each political subdivision to contribute to share of expense.

25. Mandamus ⇨164(3)—Denial, on information and belief, of regularity of commitments to state home, by county treasurer sued for cost thereof, is sham (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In mandamus petition by director of department of institutions to compel county treasurer to pay moneys claimed to be due state, under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, for persons committed to state home from county, denial on information and belief of regularity of commitment of two inmates is denial of matters of public record, which should have been denied positively or admitted to be regular, and such denials are sham and raise no issue.

26. Mandamus ☞164(3)—Denial that anything was due state by county for commitments to state home raised question of law, where county treasurer admitted nonpayment and failed to deny statutory requirements for payment (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In mandamus petition by director of department of institutions to compel county treasurer to pay moneys claimed to be due state, under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, for persons committed to state home from county, denial that anything was due state on account of claims alleged raised question of law alone, in face of admission that nothing was paid and failure to deny any ultimate circumstances specified in statute under which claims are made valid charges against county.

27. Mandamus ☞164(3)—Denial, by county treasurer sued for money due state home, that state controller made demand for payment, held without merits under evidence (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In mandamus petition to require county to pay state amount due for commitments to state home, under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, denial that state controller made demand or order to pay on county treasurer held without merit, where controller wrote letter of notification stating amount due.

28. Mandamus ☞164(3)—Denial, on information and belief, that judges failed to inquire into financial conditions of responsible persons, held sham in mandamus to require county treasurer to pay for commitments to insane home (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In mandamus petition to require county to pay state amount due for commitments to state home, under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, denial, on information and belief, that judges of superior court of county failed to perform their duty to inquire into financial condition of parents and guardians of persons committed, held sham, and raised no issue.

29. Mandamus ☞164(3)—Defense that amount due state for commitments from county to state home was not determined nor presented to supervisor were insufficient in mandamus to require payment (Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193).

In mandamus petition to require county to pay state amount due for commitments to state home, under Pol. Code, §§ 2192, 2193, defense that no person or tribunal has determined amount due state, and that no claim has been presented to board of supervisors, held not to raise triable issue, since law did not require either of such things to be done.

30. Pleading ☞122—Defendant, though public officer, cannot raise issue, depending wholly on public records, by denial on information and belief.

Person may not raise issue, depending wholly upon public records, by denial on information and belief alone, though defendant is public officer.

Application for writ of mandamus by Earl E. Jensen, Director of the Department of Institutions of the State of California, against C. F. McCullough, Treasurer of San Benito County. Writ granted.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. L. Chamberlain and Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., Deputy Attys. Gen., for petitioner.

Wyckoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, and A. M. Rannels, of Hollister, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus to require the respondent to pay to the state treasurer moneys claimed to be due the state by reason of commitments from the county of San Benito to the Sonoma State Home. The petitioner is the director of the department of institutions of the state, and the respondent is the treasurer of San Benito county. The controversy arises over the claim of the respondent that the act of the Legislature (sections 2192 and 2193, Pol. Code), which places this charge upon the county from which the commitments are made, is unconstitutional. The respondent has appeared by both demurrer and answer, and the whole cause has been submitted on these pleadings.

[1] The first ground of demurrer is that the petition fails to state sufficient facts, in that it does not show any sum to be owing the state, because it alleges that in May and December, 1927, certain sums became due, and that in May and December, 1926, the respondent failed and refused to pay such sums. The error is plainly a clerical one—the figures 1926 should read 1927. The petitioner has asked leave to make the correction on the face of the petition, and such leave will be granted. This disposes of the point raised.

[2-5] It is argued that the petition is insufficient because it fails to allege a prior demand upon respondent to do the act prayed for in the petition. There is no quarrel with the general rule that, in ordinary cases of mandamus, the petition must allege that demand was made upon the respondent to perform the act, and that he refused to comply. But there are two well-recognized exceptions to this general rule: First, that a demand is excused when the act is a mere public duty affecting the public at large and in which the petitioner has no immediate benefit; and, second, that a demand is excused when the attitude of the respondent shows that it would have been refused if made. Both of these exceptions are applicable here. The petitioner is a state officer proceeding under a general state statute for the benefit of the state and without any private or personal interest in the subject-matter. In such a case the law itself stands in lieu of a demand, and it is not necessary to allege that a specific demand has been made. 16 Cal. Jur. 771, 772. It also appears from the admissions in respondent's brief that any demand upon him would have been futile. He says:

"But the treasurer resists and will continue at all times to resist the efforts of the state to compel him to pay in any such unauthorized manner as is here attempted."

The respondent further admits that, for a period of 30 years, the county of San Benito has contended that it cannot be compelled to make payments to the state under Political Code, § 2192. As the controversy between the state and the county over this long period of time has been based upon the question of the constitutionality of section 2192, and as that is the real basis of the defense in this proceeding, it is apparent that the respondent would not have complied with any demand in any form for the payment of these sums. The petition does allege, in form of recital, that the respondent refused to pay "upon the order of the controller." If this is not sufficient as an allegation that demand was made, it is sufficient to show that respondent is not prejudiced by the failure to allege demand in specific terms and to show that it would be an idle act to sustain the demurrer and require petitioner to allege specific demand or to allege the admitted fact of the futility of making a demand.

[6-8] It is argued that the petition is insufficient because it does not allege facts showing that said amounts have ever been found to be due to the state. The petition alleges that at the time of the settlement with the state the respondent refused to pay, upon the order of the controller, the amounts found to be due to the state. This allegation is sufficient to raise the issue of the duty of the respondent under section 2193 of the Political Code. If the amounts demanded are not in fact due, that is a matter of defense for the respondent in this proceeding. The duty of the county treasurer is to pay out moneys in the treasury on warrants when they are based upon orders of the board of supervisors or upon orders of the superior court, "or as otherwise provided by law" (section 4101, Pol. Code, subd. 7). An exception to the rule that the treasurer can pay only upon warrants issued by the auditor is made in cases of "Settlement with the State" (subdivision 6, same section). Section 2193 expressly fixes upon the county treasurer the liability to pay to the state treasury the sum of $20 monthly for each person committed to the home from the county, and requires the county auditor to include in his report to the state controller the amount due the state under the act. When the auditor performs this duty the amount due the state is fixed, and the treasurer's duty to pay the amount so fixed follows. However, when either auditor or treasurer fails to perform his duty under the act, the director of the state department of institutions is empowered to proceed against the treasurer by writ of mandate to require him to pay to the state the amounts found due, and in such a proceeding one of the issues of fact to be tried is the amount due under the terms of the act. In this respect the proceeding is similar to that in mandamus against the trustees of reclamation districts, authorized by section 3457 of the Political Code, where it is provided that if a controversy arises as to the amount due a claimant against the district, the court must determine the same in the manner provided for determining controversies in other civil actions and cause a writ to issue to the trustees requiring them to draw their warrant for the amount found due. So in section 2193 the petitioner herein is expressly authorized to require the county treasurer by writ of mandate "to pay to the state treasurer upon an order of the controller all amounts found to be due to the state." By the same section the county auditor is required to include in his report to the state controller "the amount due the state under this act." In finding the amount due under this section the auditor need only compute the fixed charge on the basis of the number of commitments made from his own county—a finding based solely on public records—without any room for discretion or independent judgment. We hold, accordingly, that the auditor does not exercise any judicial function in determining the amount due the state, and that his failure to comply with the statute is no defense in this action against the treasurer because section 2193 declares it shall not be a defense. Thus, the point is not available on the demurrer to the petition because the petition recites the treasurer's failure to pay the "amounts found to be due to the state." If the auditor has not in fact determined these amounts, that is a matter to be raised by answer, and this, in turn, would raise the issue before this court as to what was in fact due.

[9] The respondent argues that section 2193 is invalid because it conflicts with sections 4041 and 4101 of the Political Code relating to payment of claims against the county. The point is that the two later sections relating to the approval of claims by the supervisors and the payment on warrants drawn by the auditor conflict with section 2193, which authorizes the treasurer to pay the claims arising under that section upon the order of the controller. The difficulty with the argument is that it is based upon wrong premises. Section 4041 provides that the supervisors shall pass on all claims against the county "except salaries of officers, and such demands as are authorized by law to be allowed by some other person or tribunal." Section 4101 provides that the treasurer shall disburse the funds only upon warrants from the auditor, "or as otherwise provided by law." These exceptions fully cover the special provisions in section 2193 relating to the payment of claims arising under it.

[10] It is also argued that the section is void because it relieves the state from alleging that there are funds in the county treasury applicable to the payment of the claim, whereas, in other actions by individuals in mandamus, it is necessary to allege that the respondent has funds within his control applicable to the payment of the demand which is sought to be enforced. From this it is argued that the section is in conflict with the interpretations which have been put on the general sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to proceedings in mandamus, and that it therefore offends the provisions of subdivision 3 of section 25 of article 4 of the state Constitution. The inhibitions of this section of the Constitution are that the Legislature shall not pass any local or special law regulating the practice of courts of justice. The respondent refers to Meyer v. City & County of San Francisco, 150 Cal. 131, 88 P. 722, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 110; State Commission of Lunacy v. Welch, 20 Cal. App. 624, 129 P. 974; People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 83 Cal. 393, 23 P. 303, and City of Tulare v. Hevren, 126 Cal. 226, 58 P. 530. It would serve no purpose to discuss any of the cases cited. The rule applicable to the situation before us is stated in the later case of People v. Central Pac. R. Co., 105 Cal. 576, 589, 38 P. 905, 908, where it was held that, in proceedings to enforce obligations to the state, the Legislature "may prescribe such procedure as may best avail for that purpose, irrespective of the mode of procedure provided for the determination of controversies between individuals." Many later authorities may be found to the same effect: Selowsky v. Superior Ct., 180 Cal. 404, 410, 181 P. 652; Brambini v. Superior Ct., 192 Cal. 19, 26, 218 P. 569; In re Sutter-Butte By-Pass, etc., 191 Cal. 650, 671, 218 P. 27; Fleming v. Superior Ct., 196 Cal. 344, 351, 238 P. 88; Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 768, 138 P. 355, and City of Stockton v. Ellingwood, 78 Cal. App. 117, 120, 248 P. 272.

[11] That the act does not contravene the provisions of subdivision 9, section 25, article 4, of the Constitution, prohibiting local and special laws regulating county business, is so obvious that we merely mention it to show that the point has not been overlooked.

[12-14] It is argued that the petitioner has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, and that therefore mandamus should not issue. This question of the speed and adequacy of the legal remedy is always a matter to be determined by the court to which the application is made. When the question presented is one of statewide concern, involving the construction of a general state statute, the courts have been more liberal in entertaining the proceeding in mandamus. As the matter has been pending in this court for many months and has been fully heard and briefed by the respective parties, it would be an abuse of discretion to refuse to entertain the proceeding at this time.

[15] Section 2193 is attacked upon the ground that it violates section 12 of article 11 of the state Constitution, which prohibits the Legislature from levying a tax upon the county for county purposes. There is, of course, no attempt to levy a tax. The act merely makes a charge against the county for the support of its insane wards just as the Legislature has made a charge upon the county for the support of its indigent sick, its dependent poor, its orphans, and for the maintenance of persons charged with or convicted of crime.

[16, 17] But respondent states that if he be wrong in this view he might be right in another—that it is a tax for state purposes, and hence in violation of section 14 of article 13 of the state Constitution. That the act does not purport to levy a tax is obvious. The argument that the act is unconstitutional because it attempts to appropriate county moneys for the support of a state institution is without merit, because the act makes the charge a direct one against the county for the support of the patient, and whether the state should require the county to maintain a home within its borders for the feeble-minded, or whether it should require it to pay its proportionate share of the expense of maintenance of its feeble-minded in a state home, is no concern of the county. It being a mere agency of the state, it is subject to the direction of the state in matters of this kind. County of Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 145, 164 P. 613.

[18] It is then said that the act violates section 31 of article 4 of the state Constitution as providing for a gift to some unknown or undisclosed donee who might be liable for the care and maintenance of the person committed. As we have pointed out, the act makes the charge a direct charge against the county from which the commitment is made. The fact that it also provides that the judge of the superior court shall order that the party liable for the support of the feeble-minded person shall pay to the hospital stated sums for the support of the inmate does not constitute a gift of public money to those who are not found or who are not ordered to pay.

[19-23] We have covered each point raised by the respondent in support of his demurrer to the petition, and, for the reasons given, the demurrer is overruled. There are, however, certain considerations governing legislation of this character which are not discussed in the briefs, but which may be adverted to at this time. The state Constitution is a limitation on the powers of the Legislature, and not a grant of power. There are, of course, many provisions found therein which are express grants of power, but these are made, not because an express grant is necessary, but, because of some limitation on the power of the Legislature, the presence of the express power is in doubt. Thus, in the absence of a limitation, and without an express grant, the Legislature has the inherent right to subdivide the state into political subdivisions and to prescribe the mode of government, the powers, duties, and obligations of each of such subdivisions and of the officers and employes created for the purpose of exercising, on behalf of the state, the governmental functions of such subdivisions. Having heretofore discussed the limitations which surround the power of the Legislature in matters of this kind, and having found none of them applicable to the case in hand, we are left with the inherent power of the Legislature, in the exercise of its police power, and for the general welfare of the state at large, to provide for the care and maintenance of its citizens. Without specifying the particular acts, we know that the state has provided for the care and maintenance of the indigent, the orphans and half-orphans, the blind, the insane, the feeble-minded, the juvenile delinquents, the criminal, and other dependent persons. In the absence of some limitation on the power of the Legislature, there is no sound reason why the entire burden of the care and maintenance of such dependent classes could not be placed upon the political subdivisions of the state. Sacramento v. Chambers, 33 Cal. App. 142, 145, 164 P. 613. If, therefore, in the wisdom of the Legislature a portion of this burden is ordered to be borne by the political subdivisions and a portion by the state as a whole, the Legislature is acting within its power, and the question of the wisdom of the action is, of course, not one for the courts to determine.

[24] Thus, the Legislature has the power to determine that each political subdivision should maintain a home for the care of its feeble-minded, or it could provide a state home, or homes, for the purpose, and bear all the burden of maintenance, or it could require each political subdivision to contribute a share of the expense of the maintenance of the individual. In the case at hand the Legislature has provided a home where such patients may be kept, and has fixed a uniform charge upon every county in the state determined by the number of patients committed from each county. This plan has been in operation for more than 25 years and has been followed by every county in the state but San Benito. A similar situation arose in County of Los Angeles v. State, 64 Cal. App. 290, 297, 222 P. 153, 156, where the county of Los Angeles had refused to pay the state charge for the care and maintenance of wards committed to a state institution under the Juvenile Court Act (St. 1915, p. 1225). In speaking of the obligation of the county under the act, the court said:

"It was the duty of the court of Los Angeles County to make the order, and under the law, as we read it, it was also the duty of Los Angeles County to provide for the maintenance of its own wards and not to shift that burden upon the state or upon other counties of the state who, following the statute, had made provision for the support and maintenance of their wards."

[25-30] Upon the suggestion of the court the cause was submitted upon the demurrer and answer, with the understanding that both parties might produce their proof by affidavits, as the only matters in dispute were of public record. Counsel for respondent now complain that they did not formally stipulate to the use of affidavits, and they move that those filed by petitioner be stricken from the files. At the same time they have filed counter affidavits in reply. Without approving the procedure followed by respondent, his motion is granted, and all affidavits filed by petitioner and by respondent are accordingly stricken. There is no call for any further hearing, however, as the respondent's answer does not raise any triable issue. The denial upon information and belief of the regularity of the commitment of two of the inmates of the home is a denial of matters of public record which should have been denied positively or admitted to be regular. Such denials are sham and raise no issue. The denial that nothing was due the state on account of the claims set forth in the petition raises a question of law alone in face of the admission that nothing was paid and the failure to deny any of the ultimate circumstances specified in the statute under which the claims are made valid charges against the county. The denial that the state controller did not make a demand or order to pay upon the respondent does not call for much comment. The argument in the brief is that the courteous letter of notification from the controller stating the amount due should not be treated as an explicit demand for payment. The denial upon information and belief that the judges of the superior court of San Benito county failed to perform their duty to inquire into the financial condition of the parents or guardians of those committed is sham and raises no issue. The denials that no person or tribunal has determined the amount due the state, and that no claim has been presented to the board of supervisors, do not call for a trial, because the law does not require that either of these things must be done, as we have heretofore pointed out. If the commitments were not made as alleged in the petition, or if the individuals were not confined in the institution in the manner and for the periods alleged, or if the statutory charges for the care of these individuals in the state home were in fact paid, any one of these matters would constitute a defense to this petition, but the fact that the respondent is a public official does not alter the application of the rule that one may not raise an issue dependent wholly upon public records by a denial upon information and belief alone.

Let a peremptory writ issue as prayed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; STURTEVANT, J.

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 2, 1928.

1. Divorce ⇨167—Court's finding that allegations of answers in action to set aside divorce decree are true held sufficient to support judgment for defendant (Code Civ. Proc. § 1908).

In action to set aside interlocutory divorce decree on ground of plaintiff's ignorance of fact that she was served with summons, court's finding, sustained by record, that allegations of answers and defenses that plaintiff had served affidavits for order setting aside decree on same grounds, that superior court denied motion for such relief, and that such decision was a judgment between parties on issues involved, are true and supported by evidence, was sufficient to support judgment for defendant under Code Civ. Proc. § 1908.

2. Divorce ⇨167—Evidence held to support finding in action to set aside divorce decree that plaintiff knew she was served with summons.

In action to set aside interlocutory divorce decree, on ground that plaintiff was ignorant of fact that she was served with summons, evidence held to support court's finding that allegation of complaint that plaintiff, by reason of her state of mind, did not recall delivery of papers, nor connect them with her relations with defendant, and did not know that divorce suit was pending, but believed that they concerned other matters, were untrue.

3. Divorce ⇨167—Evidence held to sustain findings that wife was not terrorized into making property settlement, nor ignorant of what she was doing.

In action to set aside interlocutory divorce decree, evidence held to sustain court's findings for defendant on plaintiff's allegations that defendant terrorized her into making property settlement and executing deed, and that she was in ill health and did not know what she was doing.

4. Appeal and error ⇨1011(1)—Trial court's decision, on conflicting evidence, as to validity of property settlement by wife, is binding on appeal.

Trial court's decision, on conflicting evidence, as to whether plaintiff, in action to set aside interlocutory divorce decree, was terrorized into making property settlement and executing deed, and did not know what she was doing because of ill health, is binding on appellate court.

5. Appeal and error ⇨757(3)—Appellate court need make only cursory examination of typewritten record, where brief contains only appellant's version of testimony in condensed narrative form (Code Civ. Proc. § 953c).

Where appellant reproduces in her brief only her version of testimony in condensed narrative form, with but few extracts from record itself, contrary to Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, requiring parties to print in briefs such portions of record as they desire to call to court's attention, appellate court is not required to make more than a cursory examination of typewritten record on file.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; George D. Murray, Judge.

Action by Hilma Carp against August Carp. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. Logan Beamer and Henry L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant.

J. F. Coonan and Mahan & Mahan, all of Eureka, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. [1] Plaintiff in her complaint alleges three causes of action. The first cause of action is to set aside an interlocutory decree of divorce granted to August Carp, defendant herein and plaintiff in the divorce action, on the ground of ignorance of the fact that she was served with summons in such divorce action. She admits the delivery to her of the summons and copy of the complaint, but claims that "by reason of her state of mind as aforesaid plaintiff did not think of and did not recall the delivery of said paper writings upon her as aforesaid, and did not connect the same with the relations between herself and her husband, and did not know that an action for divorce was pending by the parties hereto, but believed that said paper writings concerned said property and the said Selma Aster." Defendant in his answer denies these facts alleged, and as a separate defense alleges that, after the interlocutory decree had been granted, the appellant here has served affidavits praying for an order to set aside the interlocutory divorce decree upon the identical grounds set up in this action; that such motion was duly heard upon affidavits, and that on June 8, 1923, the superior court of Humboldt county, California, rendered its judgment and decision therein, denying the motion to set aside and vacate such interlocutory decree; that the decision of the court on such motion to set aside the interlocutory decree was duly entered in the minutes of such court, and thereupon became, ever since has been, and now is, a judgment between said parties on the issues therein involved, and involved in this action. The court found, and the record sustains such finding:

"That the allegations of the first and second separate answers and defenses to said first cause of action in said amended complaint are true, and that each and every of them is supported by the evidence."

The appellant does not attack this finding, which of itself is sufficient to support the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908; Lake v. Bonyne, 161 Cal. 120, 118 P. 535; 15 R. C. L. 975.

[2] But, aside from this, the court found the allegation of plaintiff's complaint above quoted to be untrue. This finding is supported by the testimony of Wiking Carp, plaintiff's son, Joe Miller, and M. Challman, each of whom testified that, before the time allowed to answer the complaint, he read the summons to her. Miller testified that he told her "they were a divorce summons," and Challman testified he told her "that was a summons for Mrs. Carp to prove the charges brought against her in the divorce suit by Mr. Carp," and further:

"Well, I told her. I told Mrs. Carp she had so many days left to appear, but I don't remember exactly how many days it was."

[3, 4] The second cause of action alleges that on February 5, 1923, five days after the filing of the divorce suit, plaintiff made a property agreement with defendant; that defendant terrorized her into making this settlement, and also into executing the deed which is the subject of the third cause of action; and further that she was in ill health, and did not know what she was doing. The court found against appellant and in favor of respondent on these allegations. The evidence amply sustains the court's findings. The agreement was made in the office of Attorney J. F. Coonan. Present part of the time were Coonan, appellant, respondent's brother-in-law, Branston, and appellant's sister. Part of the time appellant's attorney Irwin Quinn was there. Attorney Coonan testified:

"So I took that old agreement and read it paragraph by paragraph to Mr. Branston. * * * Now I understood Mr. Branston represented Mrs. Carp, and I considered myself as acting for both parties. * * * Now every paragraph of this contract was read to Mr. Branston, and I had Mr. Branston restate each paragraph to Mrs. Carp, every one."

The testimony of Irwin T. Quinn, appellant's attorney at the time sustains Mr. Coonan. He testified that the agreement was fully discussed in his office; that he went over all the items with appellant; that he had certain changes made in the agreement. It appears that the agreement was discussed, each side being represented by an attorney; that appellant was aided by her sister and Branston, who explained each detail to her. We fail to see how, under the circumstances, there could be fraud in the execution of the agreement or deed. At the utmost, all that appellant can claim is that there is a conflict in the evidence, the decision on which by the trial court is binding on this court.

[5] There is no merit in appellant's contention that the court erred in not granting plaintiff's motion for judgment on the pleadings. The appeal is taken under section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires the parties to print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court. This requirement has not been complied with, as appellant in the main has reproduced in her brief only her version of the testimony, in a condensed narrative form giving but a few extracts from the record itself. In this condition of the record we are not required to make more than a cursory examination of the typewritten record on file. O'Rourke v. Skellenger, 169 Cal. 271, 146 P. 633; Estate of Keith, 175 Cal. 28, 165 P. 10. We have, however, examined the record sufficiently to conclude that there is ample evidence to support the findings of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STOVALL et al. (Cr. 1716.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 27, 1928.

1. Criminal law ⇨200(3)—Conviction of asportation of automobile in violation of statute does not preclude conviction of grand theft (Motor Vehicle Act, § 146).

Acquittal of asportation of automobile in violation of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 564, Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 5123), § 146, does not preclude conviction of grand theft, if evidence is sufficient to establish guilt thereof.

2. Criminal law ⇨538(3)—Police officer's testimony as to defendant's practical confession held sufficient to support conviction of grand theft, though defendant took stand and denied guilt.

Police officer's testimony as to conversation wherein defendant made statements practically amounting to confession of guilt held sufficient to support conviction of grand theft, though defendant took stand and denied his guilt; his testimony giving rise only to conflict of evidence.

3. Criminal law ⇨761(12)—Instruction that taking of automobile is grand theft held not erroneous, as assuming that defendant took automobile.

In trial for grand theft, instruction that, when property taken is an automobile, the offense is grand theft, held not erroneous, as assuming that defendant had taken an automobile.

4. Criminal law ⇨822(1)—All instructions must be read together.

All instructions must be read together, in order to ascertain their import.

5. Criminal law ⇨823(2)—Instruction that taking of automobile is grand theft held not harmful, in view of instructions as to presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, and absence of intimidation by court as to what facts were established.

In trial for grand theft, instruction that, when property taken is an automobile, offense is grand theft, held not harmful, if erroneous, as assuming that defendant took an automobile, where jury was carefully instructed as to presumption of innocence and reasonable doubt, and also that court had not intimated or intended to intimate what facts were or were not established by evidence.

6. Criminal law § 878(3)—Defendant may be convicted of grand theft, though such charge includes statutory offense of asportation of automobile (Motor Vehicle Act, § 146).

Defendant may be convicted of grand theft in taking an automobile, even if such charge includes offense of asportation of automobile, in violation of Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 564, Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 5128) § 146.

7. Criminal law § 1172(8)—Instruction that defendant might be convicted of either or both grand theft and violation of statute by asportation of automobile was harmless, where he was acquitted of latter charge (Motor Vehicle Act, § 146).

Where defendant was acquitted of violating Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 564, Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 5128) § 146, by asportation of automobile, he was not harmed by instruction that such offense and grand theft are distinct offenses, and that he might be convicted of either or both.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Bill Stovall, Hubert Roark, and Launie Miller were tried for grand theft and violation of the Motor Vehicle Act by taking an automobile. From a judgment on conviction of defendant Miller for grand theft, he appeals. Affirmed.

M. H. Broyles, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and James S. Howie, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, P. J. Defendants were informed against jointly in two counts; the first charging them with the crime of grand theft, the second charging a violation of section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act, both charges being based on the same taking of an automobile. Stovall and Roark entered pleas of guilty to the charge made under section 146, and the grand theft charge was dismissed as to them. Miller pleaded not guilty as to both charges, and after trial was convicted of grand theft, and acquitted of the charge of violating section 146. Miller appeals from the judgment, and from an order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Section 146 of the Motor Vehicle Act (Stats. 1923, p. 564, Deering Gen. Laws, Act 5128) provides:

"Any person who shall drive a vehicle not his own, without the consent of the owner thereof and in the absence of the owner, and with intent to either permanently or temporarily deprive the owner thereof of his title to or possession of such vehicle, whether with or without intent to steal the same, shall be deemed guilty of a felony."

As this language denounces the asportation of an automobile, under the other circumstances stated in the section, appellant contends that his acquittal of the charge made under it rendered it impossible for the jury to find him guilty of grand theft. He therefore says that the verdict of guilty returned against him cannot stand. This does not follow. The real question—one to be mentioned again later—is whether the evidence was sufficient to establish guilt of grand theft. If it was, it is immaterial that the jury acquitted on the other charge. Perhaps a conviction should have resulted on both. Under a state of facts somewhat similar to that here presented we once said:

"It may be conceded, for the purpose of the argument, that under the evidence the jury had as much reason for finding appellant guilty on the first and second counts as it had for finding him guilty on the third; but even so, the fact remains that the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict on the third count, and we must conclude that the jurors were convinced of his guilt thereon. If the jurors paltered with their oaths and with the law they must make their own peace with conscience. If appellant was wrongfully acquitted on the first and second counts the error was in his favor, and he cannot be heard to complain. The fact that the jurors relieved him on two counts does not oblige this court to relieve him on the third." People v. Edwards, 72 Cal. App. 102, 236 P. 944.

[2] It is contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict finding appellant guilty of grand theft, but the contention cannot be upheld. A police officer testified to a conversation between him and appellant, in which the latter made statements practically amounting to a confession of guilt. Appellant, it is true, took the witness stand in his own defense and denied his guilt. This testimony, and that of the officer, gave rise only to a conflict of evidence, and the verdict indicates that the jury believed the testimony of the officer, as it had the right to do. There was also some other evidence, perhaps slight in character, which tended to support the verdict.

[3-5] Immediately following a definition of the word theft, the trial judge instructed the jury "that when the property taken is an automobile that the offense is grand theft." It is objected to this instruction that, "taken independent of any other instruction, it was misleading to the jury in that it assumed * * * that the defendant and appellant had taken an automobile." Even considered by itself, we think the instruction is not susceptible of the construction thus placed upon it, but it cannot be read "independent" of other instructions. All instructions must be read together in order to ascertain their import. Here the jury was carefully instructed as to the presumption of innocence and upon the law of reasonable doubt, and the judge also gave the usual instruction to the effect that he had not intimated or intended to intimate to the jury what facts were or were not established by the evidence. On the whole, we can see nothing in the questioned instruction that was erroneous or harmful.

[6, 7] Appellant insists that the following instruction, given by the court, was erroneous:

"The defendant is charged * * * with grand theft and violation of section 146, California Vehicle Act, distinct offenses and may be convicted upon either or both."

It is said that the crime of violating section 146 is included within the crime of grand theft and that, therefore, appellant could not have been convicted of both crimes. If the offense under section 146 was included under the charge of grand theft, this affords no reason why appellant should not have been convicted of the latter crime. If the instruction was erroneous, as contended, which we do not decide, appellant was not harmed by it as he was acquitted of the charge made under section 146.

Judgment and order affirmed.

NEFF v. ENGLER et al. (L. A. No. 9515.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 14, 1928.

- 1. Fraud ⚡41—Complaint, alleging that defendants made statements concerning stock which they knew to be false, and that, in reliance thereon, plaintiff exchanged land for stock, resulting in loss, held sufficient in action for damages.

In action for damages for fraud, complaint, alleging that defendant made statements to her concerning stock which defendants sought to exchange for plaintiff's land, that they knew their statements to be false, and that plaintiff entered into contract of exchange in reliance thereon to her injury, on account of fact that stock was practically worthless, held to state cause of action.

- 2. Fraud ⚡35—Prompt action on discovery of fraud, required as condition to rescission, need not be shown to maintain action for damages.

Where rescission is sought on account of defendant's fraud, party defrauded must act promptly on discovery of fraud as condition to right to rescind, whereas showing of promptness is not necessary to maintain action for damages for fraud, right probably continuing for statutory period after discovery of fraud, where no prejudice results from delay.

- 3. Fraud ⚡20—It was no defense to defendants sued for fraud that plaintiff was unduly credulous.

In action for damages for fraud, based on false representations of defendant inducing plaintiff to exchange her real estate for stock of little value, it was no defense that plaintiff should not have believed defendant's representations, or that she failed to make inquiries in her own behalf which would have shown them false.

4. Fraud — 11(1)—False statement of opinion, based on alleged facts known to party making statement, may afford basis of action for fraud.

False statement of an opinion, expressed to one entitled to rely on it, and based on supposed facts known to party making the statement, may afford basis for action for fraud, to the same extent as any other misrepresentation of fact.

5. Fraud — 49—Plaintiff suing for fraud need not prove all misrepresentations relied on, but may recover on single material misstatement.

Plaintiff, suing for damages for fraud, need not prove that all specifications of fraudulent misrepresentations are true, but single material misstatement may afford ground for relief.

6. Fraud — 62—$3,000 damages for defendant's fraud in inducing exchange of plaintiff's land for practically worthless stock held not excessive.

$3,000 damages to plaintiff, in action for defendant's fraud in inducing exchange of properties, held not excessive under evidence, where amount represented difference in value between the land which plaintiff transferred and the stock which she received.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Edward T. Bishop, Judge.

Action by Arly Foulkes Neff against William F. Engler and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Eugene T. McGann, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Minor Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. Defendants appeal from judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action involving an alleged fraud on their part in accepting from plaintiff certain real property in exchange for a sum of money and some practically worthless stock.

The complaint, with its amendment, alleges that on February 4, 1925, plaintiff, the owner of said real property, which was of the reasonable value of $6,500, subject to a $1,700 mortgage, exchanged it for personal property owned by defendants as follows: $800 in cash and 400 shares of the preferred capital stock of Income Builders, Inc., a corporation, together with 500 shares of the common stock of said corporation held in escrow for their benefit. It further alleges that prior to said exchange, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff, defendants made various statements to her, enumerating them, respecting said stock, which they knew to be false, but which plaintiff believed to be true, and solely by reason of her reliance upon them consummated said exchange; that on April 17, 1925, plaintiff first discovered their falsity, and knew of her right to rescind said contract of exchange; that thereafter, on April 23, 1925, she served notice and offer of rescission upon defendants. The amendment to said complaint alleges the suppression by defendants from plaintiff of certain facts known to them relative to the condition of said corporation; the complaint is in two counts, one stating a cause of action for rescission, the other for damages in the sum of $5,100. During the trial, plaintiff elected to stand on her action for fraud, and dismissed the first count in so far as it concerned rescission.

The court found that the reasonable value of plaintiff's said property did not exceed $5,500, subject to said $1,700 mortgage; that on February 4, 1925, the parties entered into the said agreement of exchange; that defendants did not make all of the untrue statements alleged, specifying them; that they did not state that said stock was bonded, secured, or guaranteed by the state of California, but that plaintiff understood their statements to mean that said stock was guaranteed by the state of California; that, however, prior to said exchange, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff, defendants did state to her that said preferred stock was then worth $3,200, and that they were receiving, and had been paid, semiannually dividends on it at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, which statement was, and defendants knew it was, untrue, but that plaintiff believed and relied upon it, and, solely by reason of such reliance, agreed to said exchange; that, at the time said statement was made, said corporation had issued and outstanding $108,070 of its capital stock, and owed about $500 in accounts payable, while its assets consisted of not to exceed $1,800 in money and $14,208 in unsecured accounts and notes receivable, which were for balances due by subscribers to the preferred stock of said corporation, it being extremely probable that no portion thereof would ever be paid; that defendants did not suppress such facts from plaintiff, but that they knew in part of the financial condition of said corporation and, by the exercise of ordinary care, reasonable diligence, and prudence, could have ascertained all said facts; that, if said statement made by defendants had been true, said stock would have been worth $3,200, but that its actual value, based on said assets, did not exceed $200; hence, by reason of said false statement, plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $3,000. Judgment accordingly went for plaintiff, awarding her $3,000 as damages, with interest from April 24, 1925, and defendants have appealed.

Appellants make two main contentions: First, that the complaint, with the amendment, does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and, second, that the evidence does not sustain the findings and judgment. Further, they contend that the court below abused its discretion in overruling their demurrer to said amendment, in denying motion for nonsuit, and that the judgment is excessive and contrary to law.

[1, 2] The attack upon the complaint is unfounded. It contains all the essential averments of a pleading which seeks to charge fraud. (See 12 Cal. Jur. p. 806, § 64, and cases there cited.) It alleges in detail the fraudulent representations; it alleges that they were false, and such falsity was known to defendants; that they were made with intent to induce plaintiff to enter into the transaction, and were relied upon by her as true, to her injury. It likewise shows on its face reasonable diligence on the part of plaintiff in discovering the facts constituting the fraud and in instituting her action, in that less than two and a half months elapsed between the date of the agreement and the discovery of the fraud, and the complaint was filed a week later. However, such a showing is not essential to a statement of the cause of action for damages. In applying the doctrine of laches after discovery of the fraud, where suit is brought within the statutory period, a distinction exists between an action in which relief is sought by way of rescission and an action for damages. Where rescission is sought, the party defrauded, as a condition of his right to rescind, must act promptly upon discovery, while in seeking damages based upon the fraud under ordinary circumstances, and where no prejudice is shown to have resulted from the delay, he probably has the right to institute and maintain his action at any time within said statutory period after his discovery of the fraud. This subject is fully considered in Victor Oil Co. v. Drum, 184 Cal. 227, 242, 243, 193 P. 243. See, also, Estudillo v. Security Loan, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 556, 565, 87 P. 19.

[3] It would appear from the evidence that appellants deliberately took advantage of plaintiff's credulity and general unfamiliarity with commercial transactions to secure in haste her final consent and signature during the absence of her husband, who had theretofore expressed his disapproval of the contemplated exchange, and at a time when she was ill at home, and in no proper condition to negotiate or investigate the matter further. Their conduct cannot be excused upon the ground that plaintiff should not have believed said representations, which were mere expressions of opinion in the nature of trade talk, but that she should have prosecuted inquiries on her own behalf, and would then have found them to be untrue.

The rule in this respect is well stated in Dow v. Swain, 125 Cal. 674, 682-684, 58 P.

271, where the facts are similar to those of the instant case. That action was one to rescind an exchange of land for foundry stock upon the ground that the plaintiffs were induced to make said exchange solely by reliance upon materially false and fraudulent representations of fact by defendants as to the solvency, profits, and assets of the corporation owning the foundry, value of the stock, etc. The court said:

"The plaintiffs were not put upon inquiry by having their suspicions so aroused that it was negligence on their part not to inquire further, and it also appears that they did not in fact rely upon any examination made by themselves—if it can be held that they made any. It is quite obvious that the plaintiffs in this case did not make an examination for themselves, or attempt to do so. Defendants knew that they were utterly incapable of so doing, except, as the court finds, by the employment of experts. * * * 'It is now settled law that one who chooses to make positive assertions without warrant will not excuse himself by saying that the other party need not have relied upon them. He must show that his representations were not in fact relied upon. * * *' (Webb's Pollack on Torts, 378, and see note, where numerous authorities are cited.) In Bishop on Non-contract Law, sec. 330, it is said: That plaintiff is too credulous is not generally a defense. 'The test of the representation is its actual effect on the particular mind, whether it is a strong and circumspect mind, or one weak and too relying.' (See, also, Bigelow on Frauds, 524.) 'Every contracting party has an absolute right to rely on the express statement of an existing fact, the truth of which is known to the opposite party and unknown to him, as the basis of a mutual agreement; and he is under no obligation to investigate and verify statements to the truth of which the other party to the contract, with full means of knowledge, has deliberately pledged his faith.' (Mead v. Bunn, 32 N. Y. 275.) * * *"

To the same effect see Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 154 P. 851; DeGarmo v. Petitfils Confiserie (Cal. App.) 269 P. 692; Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 395, 92 P. 383; Tracy v. Smith, 175 Cal. 161, 165 P. 535.

[4] Of course, mere expressions of opinion honestly made are not actionable, but a false statement of an opinion expressed to one entitled to rely upon it, and professedly based upon alleged facts known to the party stating them, may form the basis of an action just like any other misrepresentation of fact. Stockton v. Hind, 51 Cal. App. 131, 137, 196 P. 122, and cases therein cited. "Matters which might otherwise be only expressions of opinion, when stated as accomplished facts by one of the parties to a contract and accepted and relied upon by the other as such, may, and often do, become the basis of actions for fraudulent misrepresentations." Sheer v. Hoyt, 13 Cal. App. 662, 110 P. 477; Bickel v. Munger, 20 Cal. App. 633, 129 P. 958; Tracy v. Smith, supra, at page 164 of 175 Cal. (165 P. 535); Stirrus v. Adams, 50 Cal. App. 730, 195 P. 955.

There is contained in the record here competent and persuasive evidence in support of the findings and judgment. As might be anticipated in a case of this character, the testimony is in conflict as to whether defendants made the representations charged against them, but there is nevertheless sufficient evidence of a tangible character to uphold the conclusions of the trial court, to meet the requirements as to the degree of proof required to support findings of fraud, and to establish the misrepresentations found by the court to have actually been made. Discussion with respect to certain immaterial findings is unnecessary.

[5] A plaintiff is not required to prove that all the specifications of fraudulent representations are true. As said in Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 623, 626, 98 P. 1047, 1048:

"A single material misstatement, knowingly made with intent to influence another into entering into a contract, will, if believed and relied on by that other, afford as complete ground for rescission as if it had been accompanied by a multitude of other false representations."

(See, also, Thomas v. Hacker, 179 Cal. 731, 733, 178 P. 855; Fisher v. Brotherton, 82 Cal. App. 532, 538, 255 P. 854.

[6] It is demonstrable from the record that said judgment is not excessive. Defendants received from plaintiff property valued by her at $6,500 and found by the court to be of the value of $5,500, subject to a $1,700 mortgage. Plaintiff received from defendants stock represented to be of the value of $4,000 and $800 in cash. Deducting from said amount of $4,000 said cash payment, and also $200, the actual value placed upon said stock by the court, leaves $3,000, the sum awarded plaintiff as damages, with interest. As the evidence, which includes the financial sheet of the corporation, showed how problematical it was that anything could ever be realized on the stock, the amount awarded plaintiff was plainly just.

We have examined all the points made by appellants, and find that none of them have merit. The judgment is affirmed.

SOUTHERN SIERRAS POWER CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA
et al. (L. A. 10433.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1928.

1. Corporations ⇨636—Railroad commission had no authority to issue permit for issuance of stock by foreign public utility electrical corporation (Const. art. 12, § 23; Public Utilities Act, §§ 2, 52).

Railroad commission had no authority under Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 18, as amended) § 52, to issue permit for issuance of stock by foreign public utility electrical corporation as defined by Const. art. 12, § 23, and Public Utilities Act, § 2, since the issuance of stock by corporation is essentially an internal function thereof, cognizable and regulatable only under laws of state or nation creating corporation.

2. Corporations ⇨639—Law granting powers and privileges to corporations must, in absence of plain indications to contrary, be held applicable only to corporations created by state.

Statute of a state granting powers and privileges to corporations must, in the absence of plain indications to the contrary, be held to apply only to corporations created by the state and over which it has the power of visitation and control.

3. Corporations ⇨636—Legislature cannot regulate or control intra vires acts of foreign corporations concerning their internal affairs.

While a Legislature has power to dictate under what terms and conditions foreign corporations may transact business within state, such power does not extend so far as to give Legislature power to regulate or control the intra vires acts of such corporation concerning their internal affairs.

4. Corporations ⇨639—Foreign corporation is not, because engaged in business within state, subject to legislation purporting to regulate exercise of its inherent powers.

The fact that a foreign corporation engaged in business within state is within jurisdiction within state courts in suits against it upon its contracts or for fraud practiced in operation of its business does not subject it to legislation purporting to regulate exercise of its inherent powers.

Original mandamus by the Southern Sierras Power Company against the Railroad Commission of California and others. Writ denied.

Henry W. Coil, Newman Jones, and H. M. Hammack, all of Riverside, for petitioner.

Carl I. Wheat, Reginald L. Vaughan, and Roderick B. Cassidy, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

TYLER, Justice pro tem. Mandamus against the Railroad Commission to compel it to issue its permit for the issuance of certain stock. Petitioner, a Wyoming corporation, is now, and since November, 1911, has been, engaged in generating, transmitting, and distributing electrical energy in this state. It is a public utility electrical corporation as defined by section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution and section 2 of the Public Utilities Act of the state of California. St. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 18, as amended. Although a foreign corporation, it is operating lawfully in this state, since it has been engaged in doing business therein prior to March 23, 1912, the date when the Public Utilities Act became effective. Petitioner is authorized by its certificate of incorporation obtained from the state of Wyoming to issue $5,000,000 common stock, and also a like amount of 7 per cent, preferred stock. The common stock was all issued prior to the effective date of the Public Utilities Act. The company, being desirous of issuing $2,000,000 of its preferred stock for the refunding or payment of its outstanding indebtedness, applied to the Railroad Commission to authorize such issue under section 52 of the Public Utilities Act. The application was in due form and included all the necessary facts required by law and the rules and regulations of the commission. That body declined its permit upon the ground that it possessed no jurisdiction over the issuance of stock by a foreign corporation. An application for rehearing was asked for and denied, and the writ of mandate here applied for is sought to compel the Railroad Commission to exercise its alleged jurisdiction and to hear and determine petitioner's application. The sole question here involved, therefore, is whether or not the Railroad Commission has authority to authorize a foreign corporation, operating a public utility, to issue its capital stock.

[1] Petitioner claims that section 52 of the Public Utilities Act, making the authorization of the commission a prerequisite to the issuance of stock by a public utility, is applicable to foreign and domestic corporations alike. It is respondents' position that the issuance of stock in a corporation is essentially an internal function thereof, cognizable and regulatable only under the laws of the state or nation creating the corporation. We are of a like opinion. Section 52 of the Public Utilities Act (amended, Statutes 1925, p. 817) provides, in part, that the power of public utilities to issue stocks and stock certificates or other evidence of interest or ownership, and bonds, notes, and other evidences of indebtedness, and to create liens on their property, situated within the state, is a special privilege, the right of supervision and regulation over which is vested in the state to be exercised by the Railroad Commission under such rules and regulations as it may prescribe. The purposes for which said securities may be issued are definitely set forth, and it is declared that all such securities issued without the authority of the Railroad Commission shall be void, and penalties are provided for violations of its provisions. While the language employed in the section is broad and comprehensive and makes no distinction in express terms between foreign and domestic corporations, it was never intended thereby to subject foreign corporations to regulation concerning the exercise of the inherent corporate powers conferred upon them by the legislative power of the incorporating state. Whether or not the term "corporation," when used in a statute, applies to foreign corporations operating within the state depends largely upon the subject-matter of the statute, its policy, and the context in which the term is employed. A statute of a state granting powers and privileges to corporations must, in the absence of plain indications to the contrary, be held to apply only to corporations created by the state and over which it has the power of visitation and control. 14a C. J. p. 1241.

[2-4] While the Legislature has the power to dictate under what terms and conditions foreign corporations may transact business in this state, this power does not extend so far as to give the Legislature the power to regulate or control the intra vires acts of such corporations concerning their internal affairs. Over such matters it has no power of control. Miles v. Woodward, 115 Cal. 308-311, 46 P. 1076; Commonwealth Acceptance Corp. v. Jordan, 198 Cal. 618, 630, 246 P. 796; 8 Fletcher Cyc. of Corp. § 5807; Guilford v. Western Union Tel. Co., 59 Minn. 332, 61 N. W. 324, 50 Am. St. Rep. 407; Beach on Foreign Corp. § 307. Nor does the fact that a foreign corporation engaged in business within the state is within the jurisdiction of the state courts in suits against it upon its contracts or for fraud practiced in the operation of its business subject it to legislation purporting to regulate the exercise of its inherent powers. Application of Ostrander, 206 App. Div. 362, 201 N. Y. S. 423. For the same reason courts will refuse to exercise visitatorial powers over foreign corporations, or interfere with the management of their strictly internal affairs. Nat. Corp. v. Worth, 274 Pa. 148, 117 A. 914; Travis v. Knox, etc., Co., 215 N. Y. 259, 109 N. E. 250, L. R. A. 1916A, 542, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 387; Howell v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co., 51 Barb. (N. Y.) 378; In re Fryeburg Water Co., 79 N. H. 123, 106 A. 225, 18 A. L. R. 1373. Such matters must be settled by the courts of the state creating the corporation. This rule rests upon a broader and deeper foundation than the mere want of jurisdiction in the ordinary sense of that word. It involves the extent of the authority of the state over foreign corporations. Guilford v. Western Union Tel. Co., 59 Minn. 332, 61 N. W. 324, 50 Am. St. Rep. 407.

While the term "internal affairs" is more or less indefinite, there can be no question but that the issuance of stock by a corporation is purely an internal affair, and to entertain an action to compel its issuance would clearly constitute the exercise of visitatorial powers over the corporation, or an interference with the management of its internal affairs. Id. From the very nature of corporate stock, which is created by and under the authority of a state, the right or duty to issue it, like the other attributes of the corporation, is governed by the local laws of the state from which it derives its existence, and not by that of any other state. In re Fryeburg Water Co., 79 N. H. 123, 106 A. 225, 18 A. L. R. 1373. The Fryeburg Case is on all fours with the present one. There a foreign corporation doing business in the state of New Hampshire sought to compel the commission to issue certain stock which was authorized by the corporation's home state. It was there held that the issuing of the stock is a corporate act which is regulated and controlled by the laws of the incorporating state, for the reason that it relates to the internal conduct and management of the corporation. See, also, Com. Acc. Corp. v. Jordan, supra.

For the reasons stated the application before the Railroad Commission to issue the stock in question was properly denied. It follows that the writ here sought should, for like reasons, be denied and the matter discharged.

It is so ordered.

PALMER et al. v. FIX et al. (L. A. 10254.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 9, 1928.

1. Attachment ⇨183—Trial court alone had jurisdiction to extend lien of attachment, notwithstanding pendency of appeal, where appeal did not embrace question of expiration of attachment (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542a, 946, 1049).

Court in which action was commenced, and in which it remained pending until after determination of appeal, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 946, 1049, alone had jurisdiction to extend lien of attachment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 542a, permitting extension by court in which action is pending, notwithstanding pendency of appeal in Supreme Court at time extension was sought, where appeal did not embrace question of expiration of attachment.

2. Appeal and error ⇨487—Supersedeas to protect appellant's rights under attachment pending appeal held not to affect limitation on attachment lien (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542a, 946).

Issuance of writ of supersedeas in favor of appellant under Code Civ. Proc. § 946, to protect his rights under attachment pending appeal held not to affect expiration of attachment lien under section 542a, nor rights or duties of attaching party thereunder.

3. Attachment ⇨183—One whose attachment lien is about to expire during pendency of appeal must apply to trial court for extension, notwithstanding issuance of supersedeas (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 542a, 946).

Where attachment lien preserved pending appeal under Code Civ. Proc. § 946, is about to terminate under three-year limitation period prescribed by section 542a, attaching party, notwithstanding pendency of appeal and issuance of writ of supersedeas, must apply to trial court for extension of term of lien and file certified copy of order of extension with county recorder.

In Bank.

Action by Fred Palmer and others against M. J. Fix and others, in which defendants filed a cross-complaint and instituted attachment proceedings. From an adverse judgment defendants and cross-complainants appeal. On motion of defendants and cross-complainants to extend the lien of the attachment pending determination of the appeal. Motion denied.

John A. Jorgenson, C. H. Tyler, and C. H. Sherrick, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Arthur C. Verge, Patrick J. Cooney, and Verge & Cooney, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The appellants and cross-complainants herein have moved this court for an order which would have the effect of extending the lien of an attachment issued and levied upon the real property of the plaintiff and respondent herein at the time of the filing of the cross-complaint in this action and the lien of which attachment is about to expire under the provisions of section 542a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The said motion has been presented upon the theory that, under the provisions of the section of the Code above referred to, this court has by virtue of the appeal which is pending herein the sole jurisdiction to make the order sought. The portion of said section of the Code upon which this claim is predicated reads as follows:

"The attachment, whether heretofore levied or hereafter to be levied, shall be a lien upon all real property attached for a period of three years after the date of levy unless sooner released or discharged as provided in this chapter, by dismissal of the action or by entering and docketing of judgment in the action. At the expiration of three years the lien shall cease and any proceeding or proceedings against the property under the attachment shall be barred; provided, that upon motion of a party to the action, made not less than five nor more than sixty days before the expiration of said period of three years, the court in which the action is pending may extend the time of said lien for a period not exceeding two years from the date on which the original lien would expire."

[1] We are of the opinion that the clause in the foregoing portion of said section of the Code which requires a motion for the extension of the lien of an attachment to be made in "the court in which the action is pending" has reference to the court wherein the action was commenced and wherein it remained pending under the provisions of section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." The effect of an appeal upon the pendency of an action is provided for in section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads in part as follows:

"Whenever an appeal is perfected, as provided in the preceding sections of this chapter, it stays all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from, or upon the matters embraced therein, * * * but the court below may proceed upon any other matter embraced in the action and not affected by the order appealed from."

The matters referred to and provided for in section 542a of the Code of Civil Procedure, above set forth, are matters which are not embraced in the appeal herein and are not affected by the judgment or order appealed from, and hence under the provisions of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, above quoted, have not been transferred from the court in which this action remains pending to this court for determination upon this appeal, or for the making of any order with relation thereto. In our opinion the sole jurisdiction to make such order under the provisions of section 542a of the Code of Civil Procedure abides in the superior court from the judgment in which court this appeal has been taken.

[2, 3] It has been made to appear upon this motion that heretofore the appellant herein applied to this court for a writ of supersedeas which had for its purpose the prevention of the superior court from issuing a writ of execution at the instance of the plaintiff after the cross-complainant and appellant herein had undertaken to give a bond upon this appeal which would have the effect, under the further provisions of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, of continuing in force the attachment pending this appeal. This court, for good cause shown, ordered a writ of supersedeas to issue as applied for upon the giving by the appellant and approval of an undertaking as provided for in its said order, and which undertaking, having been so given and approved, the writ of supersedeas was issued accordingly and is still in full force and effect. See (Cal. Sup.) 264 P. 255. The issuance and terms of said writ of supersedeas, however, under the provisions of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and which had for its purpose the protection of the rights of the appellant under his said attachment pending this appeal, had no reference to or effect whatever upon the matters which are referred to in section 542a of the Code of Civil Procedure, nor to the rights or duties of an attaching party thereunder, and if it should appear that his attachment lien which has been preserved to him pending said appeal and in conformity with the provisions of section 946, Code of Civil Procedure, above referred to, is otherwise about to cease, under the provisions and limitations of section 542a, Code of Civil Procedure, it remains the duty of the attaching party, notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal and the issuance of the writ of supersedeas thereunder, to make timely application to the superior court wherein the action is pending for an extension of the term of said lien for the period provided for in said section of the Code, and to procure from said court an order to that effect, upon the filing of a certified copy of which, within the required period, with the recorder of the county in which the property attached is situated, the lien of his attachment may be extended.

For the foregoing reasons the application of the cross-complainant and appellant herein is denied.

EL GRANADA HOLDING CO. v. BETTEN-
COURT et al. (S. F. 13114.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨627(2)—Where transcript was not filed within 40-day period, appeal must be dismissed (Supreme Court Rules 1, 5).

Where transcript was not filed within 40-day period provided by Supreme Court Rule 1, motion to dismiss appeal under Rule 5 must be granted.

2. Appeal and error ⇨628(1)—On motion to dismiss appeal, it avails appellants nothing that they appealed from order denying relief from default in filing request for transcript, where latter appeal was taken too late (Supreme Court Rules 1, 5; Code Civ. Proc. § 953a).

On motion to dismiss appeal under Supreme Court Rule 5, for failure to file transcript within 40-day period required by Rule 1, it avails appellants nothing to urge that they have prosecuted separate appeal from order denying their motion for relief from default in failing to file request for transcript within 10-day period prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, where latter appeal was not taken within 60 days after entry of order.

In Bank.

Action by the El Granada Holding Company against Joseph S. Bettencourt and another. From an order granting a new trial, defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] There is presented herein a motion by the plaintiff to dismiss an appeal from an order granting a new trial. The motion is made under rule 5 of this court, which provides, in part, for the dismissal of an appeal if the transcript to be used in support thereof be not filed within time. Defendants' inability to procure a transcript is due to the trial court's refusal on May 17, 1928, to certify to the correctness thereof because of the tardy filing of the request therefor. The 40-day period provided by rule 1 for the filing of a transcript having expired, the motion to dismiss must be granted. It avails the appellants nothing to urge, in opposition to the motion, that they have prosecuted a separate appeal from an order of the trial court denying their motion for relief from default in failing to file their request for a transcript within the 10-day period prescribed by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, for inspection of the transcript upon this latter appeal discloses that it was taken too late, having been perfected more than 60 days after the entry of the order attempted to be appealed from.

The appeal herein is dismissed.

PEOPLE v. MEYER. (Cr. 1512.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 8, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 8, 1928.

1. Indictment and information ⇨192—Conviction of taking liberties with body of infant may be sustained, though evidence also showed attempt to rape (Pen. Code, § 288).

A conviction of violation of Pen. Code, § 288, making felonies of liberties with the body, other than specific acts elsewhere enumerated, may be sustained, notwithstanding that evidence showed the attempt to commit rape, where it also showed violation of the Penal Code section.

2. Indictment and information ⇨125(47)—Contention that indictment charging violation of statute making felonies of liberties with body, other than acts elsewhere enumerated, was insufficient, because also pleading attempt to rape, held without merit (Pen. Code, § 288).

Contention that indictment charging violation of Pen. Code, § 288, making felonies of liberties with the body, other than specific acts elsewhere enumerated, was insufficient, because also pleading facts showing an assault with attempt to commit rape, held without merit; such surplusage not vitiating it.

3. Criminal law ⇨824(1)—Court's failure when charging jury to again read indictment counts not required was not error, defendant not then requesting it.

Failure of court when charging jury to again read certain counts of indictment was not error, where no statute required it, and defendant at the time did not request them to be read again.

4. Criminal law ⇨1178—Reviewing court need not build up argument or find authorities to support appellant's contention.

A court of review is not bound to build up argument or to search out authorities to support contention of an appellant who fails to give argument or cite authorities.

5. Criminal law ⇨1186(5)—Defendant cannot complain because public defender did not move for new trial, where court heard defendant's motion therefor in propria persona and denied it.

Where trial court listened to and denied motion by defendant in propria persona for new trial, after public defender representing him announced that defendant had no legal cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced, defendant cannot complain of failure of public defender to make the motion.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Willis James Meyer was convicted of violation of Pen. Code, § 288, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Lionel Browne, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The grand jury presented an indictment against the defendant, he appeared and entered his plea, a trial was had before the court sitting with a jury, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, the motion was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The defendant contends that the indictment is insufficient to sustain the verdict, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and that the verdict is contrary to law, and he presents the three contentions together. The indictment alleged the commission of certain acts by the defendant on the 28th day of April, 1928, on the person of each of three little girls, Esther Stanghellini, age 12; Sophie Church, age 10; and Betty Tisma, age 7. In the first, third, and fifth counts the pleader charged assault to commit rape. In the second, fourth, and sixth counts the pleader charged a violation of section 288 of the Penal Code. The defendant calls attention to the fact that by its terms section 288 enacts a law supplementing other offenses defined by other statutes and is not applicable if the acts charged fall within the provisions of such other statutes. He then asserts that when the prosecution dismissed the second, fourth, and sixth counts, it did so by mistake. That is purely the assumption of the defendant and is sustained by no part of the record. Continuing, the defendant quotes certain parts of the record which would tend to prove the commission of an assault to commit rape. In doing so he neglects to quote passages from the record which tend to prove the commission of a violation of section 288 of the Penal Code. Having given a one-sided view of the evidence, the defendant makes the claim that the defendant was guilty of an assault to commit rape, if anything, and therefore by the expressed language contained in section 288 of the Penal Code he was not properly charged under that section, that the evidence was insufficient, and that the verdict may not be sustained. However, as suggested above, there was evidence that the defendant violated the provisions of section 288 of the Penal Code, and perhaps there was evidence that he committed an assault to commit rape. Under no logical reasoning was the latter offense a defense to the former. In this same connection the defendant contends that the second, fourth, and sixth counts, while pleading a violation of Penal Code, § 288, went further and pleaded facts showing an assault to commit rape. Thereupon the defendant argues that the indictment was insufficient. The point is without merit. Superfluity does not vitiate. No demurrer was interposed, and we are not intimating that if one had been interposed it should have been sustained. The youngest girl was not called as a witness. The other two girls were called as witnesses. Without going into detail, it can readily be seen that the prosecution was attempting to prove, and did prove, a violation of section 288 of the Penal Code, and that it did not prove, nor even attempt to prove, an assault to commit rape on the person of the little girl who was not called as a witness. On this branch of the appeal the contentions of the defendant are wholly illogical, capricious, and without merit.

[3] Because the indictment was long the defendant contends that the trial court erred when it came to charging the jury, because it did not again read to the jury counts two, four, and six. The court did not err. No statute required it to read those counts the second time. No request was made of the court asking it to read those counts the second time. There was not under any theory any error committed in this behalf.

[4, 5] The defendant quotes an instruction which the court gave to the jury, and argues that it was erroneous. He gives us no argument and no authority supporting the contention. A court of review is not bound to build up the argument or to search out the authorities.

Commencing as early as the day of arraignment the defendant appeared by the public defender. Thereafter from time to time he appeared by the same officer. The jury having returned a verdict against the defendant on August 17, 1928, his case was called for pronouncing judgment. In reply to the question by the trial court as to whether the defendant had any cause to show why judgment should not be pronounced, the public defender announced that the defendant had no legal cause to show. Thereupon the defendant in propria persona commenced to make statements to the court. Instead of reprimanding him and causing him to remain silent, the court allowed him to make some statements. At this time the defendant asserts that he personally stated to the trial court that he had not been informed of the day of trial until the day before the case was called, and that he had not had a fair trial—that he could have gotten some witnesses. He presented no affidavit; he did not offer to be sworn; and, furthermore, his attorney stated in open court that he had called on the defendant several times to obtain the names of his witnesses, that he had sent for the defendant's mother and sister to secure such information, and that from all those sources he had been unable to get it. The record even at this time does not disclose that there was any fact outstanding which, if it had been brought to the attention of the court, would have been of the least assistance to the defendant.

Complaint is made because the public defender did not make a motion for a new trial. Every point made by the defendant in this court is based on the assumption that a motion for a new trial was made—rests on the motion made by the defendant in propria persona, although that individual was guilty of contempt of court when he made the motion. The trial court listened and denied the motion. Consequently the trial court did not fail to see that the defendant's case was fully presented. The action of the public defender was clearly the proper practice, and the criticism of his conduct is clearly unfounded.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

In re SULLIVAN'S ESTATE. ★

SULLIVAN et al. v. SULLIVAN et al.

(Civ. 6554.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 7, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 7, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 3, 1929.

1. Wills ⇨133—Court determines from entire holographic will whether signature appearing elsewhere than at end was token of execution.

If testator's signature on alleged holographic will appears in some other place than at the end of the instrument, it is for the court to say from an inspection of the whole document, its language, form and relative position of its parts, whether the signature was placed there with intent that it should serve as a token of execution.

2. Wills ⇨133—Holographic will containing signature only in introductory clause, followed by specific legacies, appointment of executrix, residuary clause, and final direction, held not void for want of execution.

Instrument sought to be probated as holographic will, which contained signature of testator only in introductory clause, followed by listing of legacies, appointment of executrix, and residuary clause, with final direction as to one of legacies, held not invalid as holographic will for want of signature, since circumstances showed testator's adoption of signature in first clause as token of execution.

3. Wills ⇨125—Original holographic will held sufficiently incorporated in codicil by reference, where contents and date were correctly described and both instruments were sealed in single envelope.

Original holographic will, referred to in codicil as a "codicil will," held nevertheless sufficiently incorporated therein, where correct date was recorded and description of contents of former instrument was accurate, and the two documents were sealed together in a single envelope without considering that envelope bore inscription "holographic will."

4. Wills ⇨130—Envelope containing inscription relative to holographic will and codicil contained therein, followed by testator's signature, did not of itself constitute will.

Envelope in which original holographic will and codicil were inclosed, and which bore inscriptions, "holographic will of M. C. S., July 14, 1926. Date of will," and, "codicil dated October 13, 1926. Opened and resealed by self, October 13, 1926," followed by testator's signature, did not of itself constitute will incorporating by reference the two documents sealed within.

5. Wills ⇨400—Admission of envelope containing inscriptions, to probate, was harmless, where will and codicil contained therein were entitled to admission.

Admission to probate of envelope containing inscriptions relating to holographic will and codicil sealed within was harmless, where the documents inclosed were entitled to probate, though the envelope itself had no testamentary character.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Proceedings by Myrtle Ann Sullivan and another for the probate of the will of Mark Cornelius Sullivan, deceased, opposed by Mark R. Sullivan and other contestants. From an order admitting the will to probate, contestants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Stafford, of San Francisco, for appellants.

William M. Maxfield, of San Francisco, and Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. This is an appeal from an order admitting to probate as the last will and testament of said deceased three documents written in his handwriting. The three documents in question follow:

The first reads as follows:

"I, Mark Cornelius Sullivan, of Banning, California, revoking all wills by me heretofore made, do hereby publish and declare this my Last Will and Testament on this Fourteenth day of July Nineteen Houndred and Twenty-Six, in manner and form following:

"To each of my blood relatives, offspring of my deceased brother Robert E. Sullivan, the sum of Fifteen hundred dollars and to his widow the same amount and to the daughter of my nephew Mark R. Sullivan One thousand dollars.

"To my step-son R. D. Wilson Twenty five hundred dollars.

"To my wife, I leave and bequeath the balance of my property and hereby appoint her as Executrix of this will and without bonds or obligations of any kind. I further direct that she pay to my sister Mary Five hundred dollars.

"In regard to the bequest to her Son, and my Step-son, R. D. Wilson, I direct the Executrix to treat this bequest more as a debt against the estate which it really is but I leave its payment entirely to her good judgment."

The second reads as follows:

"Codocil

"Referring to that portion of Codocil Will dated July 14, 1926, and being my last will and Testament, dealing with the quests to the wife and children of my deceased brother R. E. Sullivan. The daughter of his Son, M. R. Sullivan, commonly called 'Pat' and to my sister Mary—The bequests are changed to read as follows—

"To Margaret Sullivan, Two hundred dollars, $200.00

"To Mark R. Sullivan, Two hundred dollars, 200.00

"To Mrs. Edward Gillespie, Two hundred dollars, 200.00

"To 'Pat' daughter of M. R. Sullivan Seven hundred dollars, 700.00

"To my sister Mary Two hundred dollars 200.00

"Dated—October 13, 1926.

"Mark Cornelius Sullivan."

The third document was an envelope within which were sealed the two documents above set forth and it bore, also in the handwriting of the deceased, the following inscriptions:

"Holographic will of Mark C. Sullivan July 14, 1926. Date of will ———"

"Codocil—Dated October 13, 1926. Opened and resealed by self, October 13, 1926.

"Mark Cornelius Sullivan."

[1, 2] It is contended by appellants that the first document is not a will because it is not signed within the meaning of the Code requirements of an holographic will. It is not essential that such a will be signed at the end thereof. "The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is that, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the face of the document itself. If it is at the end of the document, the universal custom of mankind forces the conclusion that it was appended as an execution, if nothing to the contrary appears. If placed elsewhere, it is for the court to say, from an inspection of the whole document, its language as well as its form, and the relative position of its parts, whether or not there is a positive and satisfactory inference from the document itself that the signature was so placed with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution." Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 421, 163 P. 358, 360 (L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 227). This rule has in substance been many times repeated by the Supreme Court.

We are of the opinion that the signature in the document of July 14, 1926, meets these requirements. Appellants claim that in no California decision has a signature in the exordium clause been held sufficient, and that in many cases it has been held insufficient, such as Estate of Manchester, supra; Estate of Hurley, 178 Cal. 713, 174 P. 669; Estate of Bernard, 197 Cal. 36, 239 P. 404, and Estate of Devlin, 198 Cal. 721, 247 P. 577. In each of these cases, however, there was also evidence on the face of the will of incompleteness indicating that the signature found at the beginning of the will could not have been intended as the token of execution and could not be regarded as proof that the execution of the will was a complete and concluded act. On the other hand, there are several authorities which uphold a signature at the top or beginning of a will. Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 425, 163 P. 669, L. R. A. 1917D, 778; Estate of Streeton, 183 Cal. 284, 191 P. 16; Estate of Morgan, 200 Cal. 400, 253 P. 702; Estate of England (Cal. App.) 259 P. 956.

In the last two cited cases the signature appeared at the very top of the document in a phrase independent of the will proper as though it were a label or description of the will to follow, thus: Last will or last will and testament of ———. We are unable to distinguish the case at bar from these two authorities. The mind which writes at the top of the will "Last will of ———" is the same mind which writes in the first paragraph "I ——— do hereby publish and declare this my last will," and the two expressions convey substantially the same idea. Whether the signature appearing within either one of these expressions amounts to a signing of the will must be determined from the entire will. The Sullivan will of July 14, 1926, ends with a period and appears to be complete. After listing the legacies, appointing an executrix, and inserting a residuary clause, the testator's mind returned to the bequest to his stepson found in about the middle of the will and added what appears to be a finishing touch by giving directions as to how that particular bequest should be treated. Completeness or lack of completeness appearing on the face of the purported will has been an important consideration entering into the decision of all the cases referred to herein. We think the Sullivan will of July 14, 1926, shows by itself that the testator adopted his signature in the first clause of the document as the token of execution, and that it is therefore signed within the meaning of the Code requirements.

[3] The conclusion upon the point is arrived at, as of course it must be, without regard to what the testator afterwards did with the will and without regard to what he afterwards thought about it or wrote about it. However, the codicil of October 13, 1926, is admittedly validly executed according to law. Its terms are such as to incorporate into and as a part of itself the document of July 14, 1926. In Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 77, 90 P. 192, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100, a codicil to an invalidly executed will was held to make the defective will a part of the testator's last will and testament. See, also, 26 Cal. Jur. 849, 850, 851, and cases cited. Appellants do not contend that a preceding validly executed will is essential for the rule of incorporation by reference to apply, but contend that the requirements of that rule are not met in the instant case. They quote these requirements from Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 P. 1011, to the effect that the description (of the incorporated document) in the will itself must be so clear, explicit, and unambiguous as to leave its identity free from doubt. The description of the July document in the October document is claimed to be fatally defective because it refers to the July document as a codicil will. It is said that the document is not a will because not signed, that it is obviously not a codicil, that there is no such thing as a codicil will, and the July document itself is not labeled as a codicil will. For these reasons it is said that the precise document referred to is not proven to be in existence, if in existence it is not the July document produced and probated, and that the description is too uncertain and vague to be capable of being applied to any instrument in particular.

Absolute certainty in any description is not possible. The description here is not perfect because it refers to the July document both as a "codicil will" and as "my last will and testament." The date, however, is exactly correct and the description of the portion of its contents referred to is also accurate. An inspection of the two documents without recourse to other facts in evidence can leave no reasonable doubt that the testator referred to the July document probated. The fact that an incorporated document is upon the same sheet of paper or attached to the same sheet of paper containing a valid codicil has been held to constitute a sufficiently certain description for incorporation by reference without other description. Estate of Skerrett, 67 Cal. 585, 8 P. 181; Estate of Plumel, 151 Cal. 77, 90 P. 192, 121 Am. St. Rep. 100; Estate of Henderson, 196 Cal. 623, 238 P. 938. These authorities will suffice to indicate that absolute certainty is not required of a description of an incorporated document. The fact that two documents are each on different sides of a single sheet of paper can be nothing more than a strong inference. It does not amount to a complete description in words in the incorporating document especially where the latter does not refer in words to the incorporated document as being on the obverse side of the paper.

The third document is the envelope in which the first two documents were found sealed after the death of the testator and the writing thereon. In determining the sufficiency of the description in the second document to incorporate the first by reference, logic directs that the sealing of the two documents in one envelope is just as eloquent as the attaching together of the two documents by other mechanical means. This disregards the inscriptions upon the envelope.

[4, 5] We do not agree, however, with respondent's contention that the writing on this envelope constitutes by itself a will incorporating by reference the two documents sealed within the envelope. If it should be conceded that the date of October 13, 1926, where it secondly appears is the date of the inscriptions and not merely a statement of the date upon which the testator opened and resealed the envelope, still the inscriptions do not appear to have been written animo testandi. This document seems only to be a simple description of the contents of the envelope and a statement that it had been opened and resealed by the testator. For the same reason it should not be regarded as a part of the will within the envelope. Estate of Manchester, 174 Cal. 417, 420, 163 P. 358, L. R. A. 1917D, 629, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 227. In view of our conclusion upon the self-sufficiency of the two documents inclosed, we need not determine the precise value of the indorsements upon the envelope. This document does not add any substance to the terms of the will and codicil and its admission to probate together with the first and second document is at the most harmless.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

(Civ. 6166.) *

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 10, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1929.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 843(2)—Right to foreclose chattel mortgage or trust deed by procedure in equity becomes moot after payment of judgment.

Question relative to right to foreclose chattel mortgage or trust deed containing specific power of sale, pursuant to law of pledges by means of ordinary procedure in equity, became moot after judgment was fully paid and satisfied, except as to items of attorney's fees and taxes.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 843(1)—Points raised on appeal which have become moot will not be considered.

Where certain points raised on appeal are settled and have become moot, court will not consider them, but will devote its attention to remaining points in controversy.

3. Chattel mortgages ⚡290—Attorney's fees held improperly allowed, where agreement therefor in chattel mortgage did not contemplate services for foreclosing mortgage in court of equity (Code Civ. Proc. § 1021).

Where agreement contained in chattel mortgage with power of sale relative to payment of counsel fees did not contemplate services for foreclosing mortgage in court of equity, such fees were improperly allowed, since allowance of attorney's fees, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1021, depends entirely on contract between parties.

4. Chattel mortgages ⚡290—Mortgages ⚡581(5)—Reasonable attorney's fees will be allowed, where provision therefor is stipulated, when amount is left blank.

Where provision in mortgage for attorney's fees is stipulated, but amount is left blank, a reasonable fee may be allowed; but in absence of stipulation for payment thereof there can be no recovery.

5. Chattel mortgages ⚡290—Mortgages ⚡581(6)—Attorney's fees will not be awarded in foreclosure suit unless averments authorizing same are incorporated in pleadings.

Attorney's fees will not be awarded in a foreclosure suit unless proper averments authorizing same are incorporated in the pleadings.

6. Chattel mortgages ⚡283—Mortgages ⚡490—Taxes paid by mortgagees held properly allowed on foreclosure as against contention that complaint failed to allege that taxes were paid.

In action to foreclose chattel mortgage and trust deed, taxes paid by plaintiffs held properly allowed as against contention that there was no allegation in complaint presenting issue, where during trial plaintiffs were given permission on request to amend complaint by pleading facts concerning disbursements made by them, and contract under which plaintiffs made their claim was pleaded in hæc verba.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Carlos S. Hardy, Judge.

Action by Abner Podrat and others against Oscar Oberndorff, Carrie Belle Watson, Findlay Watson, and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants Carrie Belle Watson and Findlay Watson appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 267 P. 750.

Walters & Mauk, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

O'Melveny, Tuller & Myers, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ, on behalf of appellants.

Max Schleimer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. Heretofore an opinion in this action was written by Judge R. L. Thompson, acting as justice pro tempore. Later a petition for a rehearing was granted by this court. Having some doubt as to the conclusions reached regarding the disallow-ance of attorney's fees and the rejection of the item reimbursing the respondent for taxes paid, this court granted a rehearing. Having reconsidered the entire matter, the court adopts so much of the opinion heretofore written by Judge Thompson as follows:

"This is an appeal from a decree foreclosing a chattel mortgage and also a trust deed given to secure a loan.

"October 1, 1923, for value, the defendant Oberndorff executed his note for $8,000 in favor of the appellants Carrie Belle and Findlay Watson, payable in installments of $200 each month. This note was secured by chattel mortgage on the furniture of the Plaza Hotel at Whittier, Cal. November 17, 1923, this note and chattel mortgage were assigned to the respondents. The appellants, who were husband and wife, at the same time executed and delivered to the respondents their promissory note for $7,800 secured by a trust deed on lot 18, block 29, of the original city of Whittier, as collateral security for the payment of the note and chattel mortgage first mentioned. As a part of the same transaction the appellants and respondents executed an agreement imposing certain conditions with respect to the obligations incurred by the foregoing instruments, for the default of which the foreclosure of both the chattel mortgage and trust deed heretofore mentioned were authorized. In the event of foreclosure, the agreement specified that appellants would refund any taxes which the respondents were compelled to pay pursuant to said transaction. The appellants defaulted in the payment of several installments of the first-mentioned note. After demand, this action was commenced in a court of equity to foreclose [both] the chattel mortgage and the trust deed. Judgment was rendered in favor of the respondents for $5,900 and interest, together with $517.67 attorney's fees and $140.04 taxes.

"The appellants contend that (1) the respondents had no authority to foreclose the chattel mortgage in the ordinary equitable proceeding, since the only power conferred by the chattel mortgage, in the event of default, was for the mortgagee to seize the property and sell it pursuant to division 3, pt. 4, tit. 14, c. 3, of the Civil Code, as a pledge; that (2) the trial court erred in allowing attorney's fees and taxes, and that (3) the decree failed to preserve appellants' right of redemption. * * *

[1, 2] "So far as the general question of the right to foreclose a chattel mortgage or trust deed containing a specific power of sale pursuant to the law of pledges by means of the ordinary procedure in equity is concerned, that has become moot in the present case for the reason that the briefs of the respective parties disclose the fact that the judgment has been fully paid and satisfied by the appellants, except as to the items of attorney's fees and taxes. In response to this charge, the appellants admit in their closing brief that: 'We were compelled to pay the amount of the judgment, except attorney's fees and taxes.' If certain points raised on the appeal are settled and have become moot, the court will not consider them, but will devote its attention to the remaining points in controversy. 2 Cal. Jur. 804, § 472, and cases there cited.

[3] "Attorney's fees were, however, improperly allowed in the present case for the reason that the agreement contained in the chattel mortgage to pay counsel fees did not contemplate services for foreclosing the mortgage in a court of equity.

"The allowance of attorney's fees depends entirely upon the contract between the parties. 3 Cal. Jur. 683, § 84. Section 1021 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: 'The measure and mode of compensation of attorneys and counselors at law is left to the agreement, express or implied, of the parties. * * *'

[4, 5] "The only contract for the payment of attorney's fees in the present case is found in the language of the chattel mortgage heretofore quoted, which provides that, in the event of default, the mortgagee may take possession of the property and proceed 'to sell the same in the manner provided by law (as a pledge) and from the proceeds (of such sale) pay the whole amount of said note, * * * including the counsel fees not to exceed * * * per cent. * * *'. Where a provision for attorney's fees is stipulated but the amount is left blank a reasonable fee may be allowed. 3 Jones on Mortgages (8th Ed.) 514, § 2059; Alden v. Pryal, 60 Cal. 215. If there is no stipulation in the mortgage for the payment of counsel fees, they cannot be allowed. 3 Jones on Mortgages, supra, 215, § 2059; 5 Cal. Jur. 109, § 50; Fell v. Frierson, 171 Cal. 351, 153 P. 229; Sichel v. De Carrillo, 42 Cal. 493; Boob v. Hall, 107 Cal. 160, 40 P. 117. In the case last cited it is said: 'Neither the prayer in the complaint for its allowance nor the averment of the amount which would be reasonable can supply the necessity of a direct averment that an attorney's fee had been agreed to be paid by the mortgagor.' If, however, the fees are provided for in the note, although they are omitted from the mortgage, under proper pleadings, they may still be allowed. Worth v. Worth, 155 Cal. 599, 102 P. 663; National Bank of California v. Mulford, 17 Cal. App. 551, 120 P. 446. But attorney's fees will not be awarded in a foreclosure suit unless proper averments authorizing the same are incorporated in the pleadings. 19 Standard Ency. of Proc. 1056.

"The specific question involved in the present case is whether a contract to allow attorney's fees for the seizure and sale of personal property under a chattel mortgage will authorize the allowance for the performance of entirely different service, to-wit, the foreclosure of the mortgage. The respondent claims that the language of the chattel mortgage implies that attorney's fees were contracted to be paid for services performed in satisfaction of the mortgage lien, by whatever procedure this end was accomplished. No case is cited in support of this claim. On the contrary, it is said in 3 Jones on Mortgages, supra, at page 520: 'Under a provision in a power of sale for an attorney's fee in case of foreclosure by (seizure and sale) no allowance can be made if the mortgage is foreclosed in chancery instead.' Van Marter v. McMillan, 39 Mich. 304; Sage v. Riggs, 12 Mich. 313; Hardwick v. Bassett, 29 Mich. 17. In the case of Brown & Parler v. Kolb, 92 S. C. 309, 75 S. E. 529, it is said: 'The mortgage provided that on default, the mortgagee might seize and sell the property, and that upon the sale "he shall apply the proceeds of such sale, after deducting all expenses and charges, including attorney's fees, toward the payment and discharge of the indebtedness," etc. Under a similar contract, it was held in Walker v. Killian, 62 S. C. 482, 40 S. E. 887, that the mortgagee could not claim the fees if he foreclosed by action and not by seizure under the power.' The judgment in this last-mentioned case was modified by striking out the amount allowed for attorney's fees. Upon the foregoing authorities, we are of the opinion that the counsel's fees were improperly allowed in the present case."

[6] The defendants also assert that the trial court erred in allowing the plaintiffs $140.04 for taxes paid. It is claimed that there was no allegation in the complaint presenting the issue. The point is not well founded. During the trial the plaintiffs requested permission, and they were given permission, to amend by pleading the facts concerning disbursements made by them. The contract under which the plaintiffs make their claim was pleaded by them in hac verba. The court made findings in their favor. On an appeal based on the judgment roll the point is without merit. McKelvey v. Wagy, 157 Cal. 406, 408, 108 P. 268.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is modified so as to eliminate the allowance of $517.67 attorney's fees. As so modified the judgment is affirmed. The appellants will recover their costs on appeal.

Ex parte BATEMAN. (Cr. 1701.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

1. Habeas corpus $\Leftrightarrow$ 22(1)—One imprisoned under judgment void for judge's failure to pronounce sentence could bring habeas corpus (Pen. Code, § 1193).

One imprisoned under judgment of police court invalid on account of failure of police judge to pronounce sentence under Pen. Code, § 1193, held entitled to remedy of habeas corpus to secure relief.

2. Criminal law $\Leftrightarrow$ 258(2)—Written statement of police judge, "or 180 days," supplementing oral pronouncement of judgment and sentence in defendant's presence, held not to authorize imprisonment, because not part of judgment; "pronounce" (Pen. Code, § 1193).

Police judge's addition of written words to complaint, "or 180 days," supplementing oral pronouncement, in defendant's presence, of judgment, and sentence that defendant pay fine, rendered defendant's commitment on nonpayment of fine illegal under Pen. Code, § 1193, requiring pronouncement of judgment, since the only sentence given was that pronounced orally and the words written were not a part of the judgment; "pronounce" meaning to utter, speak, or declare that which is pronounced.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Pronounce.]

Application by L. L. Bateman for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the chief of police of the City of Bakersfield to liberate petitioner from imprisonment under an alleged invalid judgment of the police court. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged.

Dorris & Henderson, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.

Brittan & Brittan, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The petitioner seeks his liberty through a writ of habeas corpus. In a police court of the city of Bakersfield he was charged with unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor, and on June 27, 1928, he pleaded guilty to said charges and waived time for sentence. The allegations of the petition as to what was said and done by the police judge at that time being controverted by the return to this court, evidence was received in that behalf. Upon that issue we find that the judge orally rendered and pronounced judgment and sentence that the defendant pay a fine in the latter's presence, but did not state to him that he be confined in the county jail in the event that such fine be not paid. However, the judge did then write upon the complaint, "or 180 days," and two days later the judge wrote on the complaint, "given to July 3rd to get the fine."

[1] Respondent interposes a preliminary objection that petitioner has mistaken his remedy, and that even though the facts be as claimed by him, he may secure relief by appeal, and not otherwise. We have no doubt that if petitioner's contention is sound as to the main legal issue involved, his only speedy and adequate remedy is through a writ of habeas corpus.

[2] The issue presented resolves itself into this: Are the words, "or 180 days," written by the police judge at the time of pronouncing sentence in open court, legally a part of the judgment? If so, of course, since it is undisputed that the fine has not been paid, the imprisonment is regular and lawful. If not, the commitment is unauthorized and the petitioner's imprisonment is illegal.

It is most seriously argued that since, if the conviction be of a misdemeanor, section 1193 of the Penal Code permits judgment to be pronounced in the absence of the defendant, the sentence may be written by the court and need not be stated orally. But we think that in so far as the question here involved is concerned the controlling word in the above section is "pronounced." The only decision which we have been able to find bearing upon the subject suggesting a judicial definition of the word "pronounce" is Ex parte Crawford, 36 Tex. Cr. R. 180, 36 S. W. 92. It is there stated that to "pronounce sentence" is to "utter formally, officially or solemnly; to declare or affirm." Wherever in the Penal Code the sentencing of convicted persons is the subject of legislation, the court's action in that behalf is designated as the "pronouncement of sentence," or some other form of the word "pronounce" is employed.

To "pronounce" always implies uttering, speaking, orally declaring that which is pronounced. Webster defines it as, "to give an articulate utterance to; to make sounds of." Without an oral articulation of a sentence, it would not be pronounced. To write a sentence is not the pronouncing of it. Nor do we find any provision in the law for judgment being rendered in a criminal case by the court writing it. We conclude that in this instance the only sentence which was given was that which was pronounced orally, and that the words written by the judge, "or 180 days," form no part of this judgment.

The writ is granted and petitioner is discharged.

MARGOLIS v. LEONARD & HOLT.
(Civ. 6566.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1928.

Appeal and error  1071(1)—Finding in action for accounting, merely determining balance due to plaintiff, not setting out items of account, held prejudicially erroneous, as indefinite.

In action by real estate salesman to secure accounting from employer of amount due to him for sales made by him, general finding by trial court, merely determining balance due to plaintiff, not setting out any of items of the accounting, held prejudicially erroneous, as not being sufficiently definite to permit defendant to specify intelligibly on appeal particulars in which it is not supported by evidence, and as denying defendant specific finding as to every disputed item determining whether money involved in particular transactions had been collected by defendant, so that, in any subsequent action between parties, plaintiff would, as to those items found collected prior to accounting, be precluded from further claiming.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Caba-niss, Judge.

Action by C. L. Margolis against Leonard & Holt, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Morris, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford, of San Francisco, for respondent.

DOOLING, Justice pro tem. Plaintiff, who had been employed by defendant as a real estate salesman, brought this action to secure an accounting from defendant of the amount which had become due to him for sales of real estate made by him while he was in defendant's employ. The action was commenced on July 15, 1925, but by stipulation of the parties entered into during the trial the accounting was had to October 1 of that year.

Under plaintiff's contract with defendant, his commissions did not accrue until the money from the sale of the properties was actually collected by defendant, and the accounting was asked for because the record of those collections was in the possession of defendant and not available to the plaintiff. At the conclusion of the trial, in which evidence, much of it conflicting, was introduced covering a large number of transactions, the court ordered judgment for plaintiff for $3,000. From the judgment which followed, plaintiff has presented this appeal.

The trial court made a general finding that "from the period of March 18, 1924, to October 1, 1925, the defendant received commissions from various sales negotiated and consummated by the plaintiff, and that the portion or share of said plaintiff in said commissions during said period amounted to the sum of three thousand eight hundred ($3,800) dollars, and that no part of said sum of three thousand eight hundred ($3,800) dollars had been paid to plaintiff, except the sum of eight hundred ($800) dollars."

Appellant attacks this finding on the ground that it merely determines the balance due to the plaintiff and respondent as of October 1, 1925, and does not set out any of the items of the accounting. Appellant complains of this upon two grounds: (1) That the finding is not sufficiently definite to permit appellant to specify intelligibly the particulars in which it is not supported by the evidence; and (2) that appellant was entitled to a specific finding of the court as to every disputed item, determining whether or not the money involved in that particular transaction had been collected by appellant prior to October 1, 1925, so that in any subsequent action between the parties respondent would, as to those items found to have been collected prior to October 1, 1925, be precluded from further claim.

Under the facts of this case we are of opinion that appellant is correct in both contentions. The correct rule to be applied in cases of this character is laid down by our Supreme Court in Whann v. Doell, 192 Cal. 680, at page 684, 221 P. 899, 901, in the following language:

"It is obvious that a statement of the balance due in the findings of the court, without a reference, and without an account or without exceptions being taken to specific items, is not a proper disposition of such an action, because the issues between the parties are not framed or disposed of in such manner as to show the method by which the general result is reached, and the aggrieved party cannot successfully present his grievances to an appellate tribunal, because on such an appeal this court must assume in support of the judgment that every controverted fact was determined in favor of the respondent, and even if there was both the disposition and the power on the part of the appellate tribunal to reexamine the entire account, the presumption in favor of the action of the trial court as to the contested items would ordinarily render such action wholly nugatory.

"On the other hand, the contention that an account must be stated in accepted bookkeeping fashion cannot be maintained. The question presented by such an appeal is a practical one in such cases, particularly in view of our restricted powers under the Constitution (article 6, § 4½), namely, can this court upon the whole record say that there has been a miscarriage of justice in the trial court? Any procedure or record from which it can be intelligently ascertained what the issues were as to the controverted items and how these issues were disposed of by the trial court will suffice for the purpose, whether the matter appears from the findings, the decree or a bill of exceptions, showing the controversy, and the disposition thereof. It may be possible, also, to show such action by a typewritten record prepared under section 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure."

We are satisfied from an examination of the transcript that it cannot be intelligently ascertained how the issues raised by the many disputed items in this case were disposed of by the trial court.

Respondent cites and relies upon Pratalongo v. Larco, 47 Cal. 378, as supporting the making of a general finding of the amount due in a case of this sort. If there is anything in the Pratalongo Case inconsistent with the later case of Whann v. Doell, supra, it must be considered to that extent overruled. But, as we construed the Pratalongo Case, it is not in conflict with the Whann Case. In the Pratalongo Case the court said:

"In such a case, if the items on the debit and credit side are intelligibly stated by the referee, so that on the face of the report it clearly appears how the indebtedness arose, this, we think, is a sufficient compliance with the statute in this class of cases."

There is no statement of any items in the findings of the court or elsewhere in the case on appeal here, and there is no way in which we can determine how the court arrived at the amount which it found to be due.

It is also clear, as pointed out by the appellant, that in this particular case, where commissions will continue to accrue to the respondent as money is collected by appellant from sales negotiated by respondent, the appellant is entitled to the protection of a specific finding of every transaction in which money is found by the court to have been already collected by appellant. Otherwise, on a subsequent account, neither appellant nor the court will be advised what transactions were included in the previous judgment and what transactions remain to be inquired into. This itself distinguishes this case from the ordinary accounting case in which every transaction between the parties can be finally disposed of in the one action.

We are satisfied from the record before us that the failure to make any more specific finding on the account between appellant and respondent than the one herein quoted constituted error prejudicial to appellant on both of the grounds heretofore stated. Much space is devoted in the briefs to a discussion of the correct interpretation of a finding covering a modification of the contract of employment between the parties. Upon a second trial, the finding on this point will doubtless be so drawn as to avoid any possible claim of ambiguity.

For the reasons herein stated the judgment appealed from is reversed.

BENGOCHEA v. BENGOCHEA. (Civ. 6235.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

1. Executors and administrators §32(2)—Evidence sustained findings, in widow's petition for revocation of administration on husband's estate, that administrator was not deceased's partner and did not procure settlement through fraud (Code Civ. Proc. § 1365).

In proceeding by widow for revocation of letters of administration of her deceased husband's estate issued to his brother, in which defendant denied existence of community property on account of property settlement between spouses, evidence held sufficient to support findings that administrator was not partner of deceased at time of his death, rendering administration contrary to provisions of Code Civ. Proc. § 1365, and that property settlement was executed freely without fraud on part of administrator.

2. Appeal and error §1011(1)—Trial court trying facts determines weight of evidence, and its findings under conflicting evidence are not disturbed.

Trial court sitting without a jury weighs the evidence and determines credibility of witnesses exclusively, and courts of appellate jurisdiction will not disturb its findings and judgment where evidence is conflicting.

3. Husband and wife §279(3)—Property settlement between spouses, followed by separation and wife's sale of her interest, held not abrogated by resumption of marital relations.

Property settlement between husband and wife disposing of community property, followed by six months' separation, held not abrogated as to wife by subsequent reconciliation of the spouses and resumption of marital relations, where wife sold her community interest to third person and did not thereafter seek to rescind.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Proceeding by Felicia Bengochea against Paul Bengochea, as administrator of the estate of Blas Bengochea, deceased. From an adverse judgment, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Canepa & Castruccio, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harry A. Chamberlin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The respondent was appointed administrator of the estate of Blas Bengochea, deceased, who was his brother, and who also was the husband of the appellant herein. Thereafter the latter petitioned the superior court for revocation of the letters of administration, and for appointment of herself as administratrix, alleging that the estate consisted of community property, and that as surviving wife of the deceased she was a competent and proper person for appointment, and had a prior right to act, in such capacity. Respondent admitted the marital relation between appellant and his intestate, but denied the existence of any community property or interest of appellant in said estate, alleging that on or about December 27, 1923, Mrs. Bengochea and her husband, owing to disputes between them, entered into a property settlement agreement in writing, a copy of which was appended to the answer as an exhibit, "in settlement, adjustment and in compromise of all property questions and rights," each agreeing "to execute and acknowledge any and all deeds or instruments of release or conveyance in order to enable such other to sell, convey or otherwise dispose of his or her own real property, free from any apparent right of interest therein."

Appellant filed a reply, denying the allegations, and the contract last mentioned, and alleged that prior to December 27, 1923, she and her husband owned a one-half interest in certain real property and a hotel maintained thereon, of which Paul Bengochea and his wife also owned one-half. She denied the existence of any dispute between the decedent and herself, but alleged that owing to differences between herself and Paul Bengochea, the latter agreed to purchase the share of herself and husband. She further alleged that she was unable to read the English language sufficiently to understand the purport of written instruments; that Paul Bengochea represented the property settlement contract to be a bill of sale, and that as a kinsman, partner, and co-owner of the common property, she believed and relied upon his representations, and therefore signed the same; that such representations were false, were known to Paul Bengochea to be false, and that he knew that she and her husband believed and relied upon them as being true, and thus obtained their signature, but that they would not have signed instrument except for respondent's false and fraudulent representations.

[1, 2] The case was tried before the court without a jury, whereupon findings of fact, conclusions of law, and a judgment were filed and entered in favor of respondent, from which the petitioner appealed, principally upon the alleged ground that the evidence was insufficient to warrant or to support the judgment. The court found that Paul Bengochea was not a partner of the deceased at the time of his death; that the property settlement was executed by appellant freely and was not obtained through false representations or fraud, or through any reliance upon representations of her brother-in-law.

It is contended by appellant that the evidence established, and that the court should have found, that in view of the fact of all the parties being related by blood and by marriage, having been joint owners of the property in question, having resided together, and jointly conducted the hotel business, there was a partnership between them, and a bond of trust and confidence between appellant and respondent amounting to a fiduciary relationship; that she sold her interest to respondent, but that the alleged property settlement was obtained by respondent through fraud and deceit; and that the evidence failed to show any differences between herself and her husband.

There is much substantial evidence that all of the parties disagreed. The respondent positively swore that Blas and Felicia Bengochea had many quarrels; that there was dissatisfaction all around as to the management of the business; that appellant felt that she was not receiving her share of the income, or being properly treated; that there were discussions as to which of the parties should purchase another's interest; that finally there was a "row," following which appellant left the premises, the others considered the matter, and upon her return respondent "bought her out for $7,500." It is obvious from the record that appellant was illiterate, but it appears from the testimony of various witnesses, including that of her brother, Angel Ardanaz, that the latter understood the English language, and that he was present and explained her desires and advised her at meetings of the family and at the offices of the attorneys who prepared the property settlement. The respondent testified in his own behalf and as a witness for the petitioner that Mrs. Bengochea was desirous of obtaining a property settlement with her husband, and of disposing of her separate interest in the community property; that there was no fraud or deceit; and that she freely and voluntarily lived separate and apart from her husband for some time thereafter. Appellant admitted that she built a home with her own money, and lived alone thereon until her husband came to her shortly prior to his death. It appears that the deceased and his wife divided community moneys in bank, and conveyed to Paul Bengochea and wife all their right, title, and interest in the property in controversy; that respondent resold to his brother, Blas Bengochea, a one-fourth interest, and took back a lease thereof. It was testified that appellant consented to the appointment of respondent as administrator, and requested that none of her property be included in the inventory. The attorney who prepared her petition for revocation of the administrator's letters, about five months after the filing of his petition, testified that she made no mention to him of the existence of a property settlement. Her testimony, while given with difficulty, was nevertheless inconsistent and contradictory, and was flatly contradicted by other witnesses in all material respects wherein it tended to support her theory of the transaction. The trial court had the opportunity of observing all of the witnesses, and of determining their credibility, of weighing the evidence, and deciding the issues presented. Such duties being within its exclusive province, courts of appellate jurisdiction will not, in a case such as that before us, disturb the findings and judgment. Stransky v. Callan, 81 Cal. App. 476, 253 P. 960.

[3] It appears that the deceased remained with his brother for a period of about six months following the property settlement with his wife and her departure, and that he then expressed a desire to join her, which he did. It is insisted that the property settlement, if valid, was abrogated by the fact of the spouses becoming reconciled and resuming marital relations. It is apparent, however, that appellant sold her community interest to a third person for a valuable consideration, which admittedly was adequate, and that she did not thereafter seek to rescind, nor did her husband ever acquire her share. The point is without merit, and authorities cited in that behalf are inapplicable to the issue.

It is asserted that respondent and the deceased were partners, and that the appointment of the administrator of said estate was contrary to the provisions of section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But as we have pointed out, there is positive testimony and facts and circumstances sustaining the findings of the court below.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re MORGAN'S ESTATE.
DEXTER et al. v. BAKER et al.
(Civ. 6191.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 31, 1928.

1. Executors and administrators ⇨507(1)—Special administrator's employment of additional attorney and period of employment held for trial court in determining right to attorneys' fees.

Whether one not attorney of record actually represented special administrator as attorney and question as to length of period of his employment held questions of fact for trial court in proceedings for settlement of final account of administrators, in which attorneys of record claimed all of attorneys' fees.

2. Executors and administrators ⇨216(2)—Claim that additional attorney prepared no papers and made no appearances did not preclude finding that he was entitled to compensation from estate.

Claim that attorney, employed by special administrator, in addition to attorneys of record, prepared no papers, made no court appearances, and assumed no responsibility to court in conduct of legal affairs of the estate, did not prevent trial court from finding that additional attorney was actually employed and entitled to a part of attorneys' fees allowed on final settlement.

3. Executors and administrators ⇨268—Trial court could apportion attorneys' fees, on settling estate, though additional attorney was employed for only part time.

Trial court, in proceedings for final settlement of estate, could apportion allowance for fees as between attorneys of special administrator, though additional attorney employed outside of attorneys of record might not have acted as attorney during the entire period covered by the order.

4. Attorney and client ⇨75(1)—Attorneys for special administrator who permitted another attorney to appear, without objection, waived formal substitution.

Where attorneys of record of special administrator had actual notice that administrator had employed another attorney, and signed receipt for notice bearing the name of other attorney as representing administrator, and allowed him to appear for administrator without objection, attorneys of record waived requirement of written notice of change of attorneys and formal substitution, and trial court, in proceedings for final settlement, could award part of attorneys' fees to the other attorney.

5. Executors and administrators ⇨268, 510 (10)—Superior court has discretion to apportion fees between attorneys for joint administrators, which is not disturbed on appeal, unless abuse of discretion or error appears.

Superior court, in settling accounts of joint administrators, has discretion to apportion allowance of attorneys' fees between their attorneys, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal, where there is no abuse of discretion, and no errors of law appear.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Petition by A. F. Morgan and others, as special administrators of the estate, and executors of the last will, of J. J. Morgan, deceased, for settlement of final account. From an order making a partial allowance of attorneys' fees to Arthur G. Baker, as attorney for Henry H. Matthieson, one of the administrators, G. R. Dexter and another, attorneys of record, appeal. Affirmed.

G. R. Dexter and Raymond S. Taylor, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Arthur G. Baker, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIL, Justice pro tem. On August 7, 1925, special letters of administration were issued to Henry H. Matthieson and two others. The petition for appointment was signed by appellants, G. R. Dexter and Raymond S. Taylor, as attorneys for the petitioners. They appeared at the hearing, and became attorneys of record. Shortly after the death of the decedent, Henry H. Matthieson filed of record certain deeds in favor of his wife and others, which had been placed in his hands for that purpose by the decedent. The other administrators and their attorneys, appellants herein, believing that the deeds were invalid for failure of delivery, brought an action to quiet title against the grantees, and included, as one of the defendants, the said Matthieson, both as administrator and in his individual capacity. Thereupon, and on September 5, 1925, said Matthieson, "having lost confidence in" appellants as his attorneys, employed the respondent Arthur G. Baker. At all times thereafter respondent represented said Matthieson, with the knowledge of appellants, but no formal substitution of attorneys was entered on the record; and it is the contention of appellants that respondent acted merely as attorney for Matthieson in his individual capacity.

On December 27, 1926, after a full hearing, the court made an order settling the final account of the two special administrators, overruling certain objections which were filed by Matthieson, administrator, and in the same order made an allowance to respondent, as attorney for Matthieson, of a sum equal to one-fourth the sum which it allowed to appellants. It is from this order that the appeal is taken.

There was some sparring for position by attorneys on both sides in the trial court, for the reason that each was accusing the other of unethical conduct in representing adverse interests. But no adverse interest seems to have suffered by reason of the alleged betrayals of trust, and no such claim is now made; nor is such a question before us for review. When stripped of unpleasant personalities and acrimonious aspersions at the conduct and motives of the respective parties, freely hurled at each other in the briefs, the questions for determination lend themselves more readily to solution.

[1] It is first contended by appellants that, under the facts and circumstances in evidence, the respondent never was attorney for Matthieson, as special administrator. But there is substantial evidence in the record that respondent did so act during the entire period covered by the order. This is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, and we would not be justified in setting aside its order in this regard.

The same is true with reference to appellants' next contention that the portion of the allowance covering the period from September 5, 1925, to October 1, 1925, was prior to any employment of said counsel by anyone. The same is true with reference to appellants' contention that the period from October 1, 1925, to April 13, 1926, covered a time when appellants had been notified in writing by respondent that he was acting for Matthieson as an individual.

[2] The same is true with reference to the contention that during this period respondent Baker prepared no papers, made no court appearances, nor assumed any responsibility to the court in the conduct of the legal affairs of the estate. These were circumstances in evidence to be weighed by the trial court on the question of the employment of respondent and his services thereunder along with the other evidence bearing upon those questions.

[3] The same is true with reference to appellants' next contention which covers the period from April 13, 1926, to November 10, 1926; and as to appellants' next contention that the order in its entirety must fall, even though one or more of the foregoing contentions be untenable, there being no means available to apportion the allowance, if respondent were not attorney for Matthieson, administrator, during the whole period covered by the order.

[4] The contention that there could be no allowance of fees to respondent because he was never formally substituted as attorney for the administrator on the records of the court, and because no written notice of the motion to substitute was given, requires more extended consideration. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the order appealed from involves, and only involves, the distribution between attorneys of a fractional part of the statutory attorney's fees in a probate proceeding. No one, other than the attorneys themselves, is interested in the outcome. The estate of decedent will not be taxed with greater fees, whether the order appealed from be affirmed or reversed. In this sense neither the administrators of the estate nor the heirs are interested parties, and the rights of an ordinary litigant to notice of motion to substitute attorneys are not involved. There is substantial evidence in the record that appellants had actual notice that Matthieson, administrator, had employed respondent as his attorney, and was using him as such during all the period covered by the order. Appellants actually brought an action against Matthieson, as administrator, prior to that period, and it was for this reason that he first employed respondent and notified appellant Dexter that he had lost confidence in him. There are no intervening equities and no claim by appellants that anything was done which would not have been done had there been a formal substitution of attorneys and written notice thereof. The cases hold that formal substitution of attorneys and notice thereof may be waived. Livermore v. Webb, 56 Cal. 489; Leake v. City of Venice, 43 Cal. App. 568, 185 P. 424; Starkweather v. Eddy, 196 Cal. 74, 235 P. 734. In addition to the actual notice, the record shows that, four months before the date of the order appealed from, appellants signed a receipt for a notice as "attorneys for W. L. Pollock and A. F. Morgan," the two other administrators. The notice was from Matthieson, as administrator, and was signed by respondent Baker, as his attorney. No objection was made that respondent was not so employed. Later, when respondent was appearing in court as attorney for Matthieson, administrator, no objection was made to the appearance. On the contrary, the court was told by appellants that, "when the proper time comes, Mr. Baker, we will challenge your authority as attorney for the executor, but that is a matter of further development." Under the circumstances, it will be deemed that the written notice and formal substitution were waived.

[5] The superior court has discretion in settling the accounts of joint administrators to apportion the allowance of counsel fees between their attorneys, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal, where no abuse of discretion or errors of law appear. Estate of Dudley, 123 Cal. 256, 55 P. 897.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MUSTO. (Cr. 1467.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 8, 1928.

1. Criminal law ☞998—Trial court, though losing jurisdiction by not trying defendant within 60 days after information, was not required to vacate regular judgment, without motion for new trial (Pen. Code, § 1050, as added by St. 1927, p. 1036).

Trial court, even though regarded as losing jurisdiction for failure to bring defendant to trial within 60 days after filing information charging defendant with possessing liquor, as required by Pen. Code, § 1050, as added by St. 1927, p. 1036, was not required to vacate and set aside judgment regular on its face, where defendant made no motion for new trial.

2. Criminal law ☞1144(1/2)—On appeal from refusal to vacate judgment of conviction, all presumptions favor judgment.

On appeal from order denying motion to vacate judgment on plea of guilty to possession of liquor, all presumptions are in favor of judgment of trial court.

3. Criminal law ☞1144(7)—Appellate court, on appeal from refusal to vacate judgment of conviction, must assume that over 60 days' delay in bringing defendant to trial was accounted for.

On appeal from order denying motion to vacate judgment on plea of guilty to possession of liquor, in absence of any showing to contrary, District Court of Appeal must assume that delay of over 60 days after filing information and before bringing defendant to trial was duly accounted for.

4. Criminal law ☞576(9)—Record showing trial over 60 days after information and 4 days' continuance after arraignment showed no violation of Code setting time of trial (Pen. Code, § 1050, as added by St. 1927, p. 1036).

Where record showed that defendant was not brought to trial within 60 days after information was filed, and that there was continuance for 4 days after arraignment until sentence was entered, no violation of Pen. Code, § 1050, as added by St. 1927, p. 1036, providing for time within which case must be heard was shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Denver S. Church, Judge.

Jimmie Musto was convicted of unlawful possession of intoxicating liquors, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Iener W. Nielsen, of Fresno, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and William F. Cleary, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. The district attorney filed an information against the defendant, and thereafter the defendant pleaded guilty and judgment was duly entered. Thereafter, on February 17, 1928, the defendant made a motion to vacate and set aside the judgment so entered, the motion was denied, and from that order the defendant has appealed, bringing up the judgment roll.

The defendant makes one point which involves a consideration of the following dates: On November 15, 1927, an information was filed, charging the defendant with the unlawful possession of intoxicating liquor. On February 3, 1928, the defendant appeared for arraignment, was arraigned, and pleaded guilty. The case was then continued until February 6, for sentence. On that date it was continued until February 7, when the matter was taken up and the defendant was sentenced. On February 16, the defendant served a notice of motion to vacate and set aside the judgment. On February 17, the motion was presented. On February 20, the motion was denied, and the defendant immediately served his notice of appeal from the order denying the motion.

[1] It is the contention of the defendant that he should have been brought to trial within 60 days, and, not having been brought to trial within 60 days, that the trial court lost jurisdiction, and that the defendant was entitled to be dismissed at any time after January 14, 1928 (the sixtieth day). In the first place, if we concede, as contended by the defendant, that by virtue of the provisions of section 1050 of the Penal Code, as added in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1036), the trial court loses jurisdiction to further proceed whenever a defendant has not been brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the information, the concession does not warrant the procedure adopted by the defendant. He made no motion for a new trial and he does not cite us to any other law which authorizes a trial court to vacate and set aside a judgment regular on its face.

[2-4] We have before us the information and a copy of the minutes of the plea and a copy of the judgment, which constitute a record of the action. Pen. Code, § 1207. The transcript does not purport to contain a bill of exceptions. On this appeal all presumptions are in favor of the judgment of the trial court. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we must assume that the delay occurring between November 15, 1927, the date when the information was filed, and February 3, 1928, the date that the defendant appeared for sentence, was duly and regularly accounted for. In his brief the defendant concedes that prior to the amendment to the statute his motion would have been without merit. However, he bases his claim entirely on the provisions of section 1050 of the Penal Code, as added in 1927. Turning to that section, it will be noticed at once that nothing transpired that did violence to any provision contained in the section. No continuances whatever were had except from February 3, 1928, the date of the arraignment, to February 7, 1928, the date judgment was pronounced. It does appear on the face of the record that more than 60 days occurred between the date the information was filed and the date the defendant was arraigned, but section 1050 of the Penal Code does not speak on that subject. It is unnecessary to refer to the provisions of section 1382 of the Penal Code. That section was enacted in 1880, and the defendant concedes that under a long line of cases any rights he had under that section have not been violated. However, an examination of the several sections of the Code shows that section 1382 of the Penal Code, and not section 1050 of the Penal Code, deals with the matter of delays after information filed.

We find no error in the record. The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BAKER. (Cr. 1610.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

1. Homicide $\S$ 234(1)—Evidence as to identification of defendant held to support conviction for murder.

In prosecution for murder, evidence as to identification of defendant held sufficient to support conviction.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 552(3)—Belief in minds of jurors to moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt, arising from circumstantial evidence, is sufficient to support conviction.

Circumstantial evidence need not, in order to justify inference of legal guilt, consist of inculpatory facts which are absolutely and to the point of demonstration incompatible with innocence; a conviction in minds of jurors to moral certainty and beyond reasonable doubt, arising from evidence, being sufficient to support conviction.

3. Homicide $\S$ 170—That defendant, charged with murder, was at or near scene of crime when it was committed, may be considered by jury.

In prosecution for murder, fact that defendant was at or near scene of crime at time of its commission may be considered by jury.

4. Homicide $\S$ 170—That witnesses are unable positively to identify defendant, charged with murder, as guilty one, may be considered by jury in connection with all other evidence.

In prosecution for murder, fact that witnesses are unable positively to identify defendant as one who committed act, but expressed belief that he was person seen, may be received and weighed by them in connection with all other evidence before them.

5. Criminal law $\S$ 590(1)—Refusal to grant continuance to defendant, charged with murder, and to furnish him stenographic copy, where there was none, of testimony before grand jury held not erroneous, it being optional with district attorney to demand stenographic services.

Where it is optional with district attorney to demand services of stenographic reporter at time of returning indictment for murder, refusal of continuance and to furnish defendant with stenographic copy of testimony given before grand jury held not erroneous, where there was no copy made.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 406(3)—Statement made by person being tried for murder, shortly after his arrest, freely made, and not confession, held admissible.

In prosecution for murder, statement freely made by defendant to police, shortly after his arrest, held admissible, where defendant made no confession, and it appeared he had been cautioned that statements made by him might be used in his trial.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 829(1)—Requested instructions in murder prosecution, covered in instruction given, held properly refused.

In prosecution for murder, requested instructions, which appeared in those already given, held properly refused.

8. Constitutional law $\S$ 268—Reading of statute as instruction in murder prosecution, covering requested instruction refused, held not unconstitutional, as depriving defendant of liberty without due process of law (Pen. Code, $\S$ 1096, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039).

Reading, under Pen. Code, $\S$ 1096a, as added by St. 1927, p. 1039, to jury in murder prosecution, of Pen. Code, $\S$ 1096, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, which included substance of several separate instructions refused, held not unconstitutional, as depriving defendant of his liberty without due process of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leon R. Yankwich, Judge.

Elmer Norman Baker was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Cooper & Collings and George H. Shreve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John D. Richer, of Los Angeles, for the People.

CRAIG, J. On or about January 15, 1927, one Mike Trifoni, a shoemaker, was attacked in his shop in the city of Los Angeles by a robber, and during a struggle which ensued between them the latter was shot and killed. Baker was prosecuted for the crime, which resulted in a verdict of murder in the first degree, recommending life imprisonment. He moved for a new trial, which was denied, and appeals from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

Appellant seeks a reversal upon the ground that the evidence was wholly circumstantial, and that it was insufficient, particularly as to identification, to support the verdict and judgment. Trifoni testified that at about 11 o'clock p. m. of said date a man entered his place of business, produced a .45 caliber pistol, and ordered him to throw up his hands and give him his money; that the witness then caught the man's hands, and was wrestling with him, when the latter's revolver was discharged several times; that "then the other fellow was outside, and was shooting" from near the sidewalk; that the robber suddenly relaxed, fell to the floor, and a man who resembled the defendant entered with a pistol in his hand, ordered Trifoni to stand by the wall, took the revolver from the hand of the first intruder, went outside, and departed in an automobile in which about six others apparently were waiting. He testified that the second man who entered carried a small gun of about .32 or .38 caliber. Police officers immediately entered the store and found the first arrival lying face downward. It is not denied that he was dead, that a .38 caliber bullet had pierced his heart, and that three .45 caliber empty shells lay on the floor outside, and five .38 caliber shells were found outside, of Trifoni's establishment. It affirmatively appears, in part from appellant's own testimony, that he and the deceased, who proved to be one Paul Cotham, had been friends for about five years, and that they were living together at the time of the homicide; that they visited an acquaintance by the name of Nelson, who loaned them his automobile, and that Cotham also inquired if Nelson would loan him his .45 caliber automatic pistol, which Nelson replied that he was not "in the habit of loaning"; that they drove about the city, finally stopping in front of Trifoni's store, and that Cotham asked Baker to wait for him, alighted, entered the store, and almost immediately shots were heard by the defendant.

Appellant testified that he at once drove to the apartment where he and Cotham had been living, and left the car standing in the street; that he spent the night at a hotel in another part of the city, but did not communicate with Nelson regarding the whereabouts of the automobile, nor the shooting; that on the following morning, at about 6 o'clock, he went to San Pedro, shipped to New York on a tanker, and from there sailed to Italy, from whence he returned some months later. Following his arrest, and on October 27, 1927, the defendant made a statement to officers, in which he replied to questions that he had been anxious to leave Los Angeles for some time, but that he was without money. He was asked when they had discussed holding up the shoemaker, to which he replied:

"It wasn't discussed. I did not know what he was going to do at all. He never told me of his plans or what he was going to do."

The statement contains also the following question and answer:

"Q. When you and Cotham went to this shop, was anybody else along, or just you and he?
A. There was no one with us. There was no one else in this affair but us."

It was the theory of the people that Cotham did in fact borrow Nelson's .45 caliber revolver, as well as his automobile, and that both he and Baker were armed; that Cotham entered the shop for the purpose of holding up and robbing Trifoni, while Baker remained in or near the automobile, and that, seeing his partner and friends of some years apparently in danger, appellant fired several shots from a .38 revolver, intending to disable or kill Trifoni, but which in fact struck Cotham; that appellant then entered the store and obtained Cotham's weapon, which might be a means of identification, and fled. There was some testimony that Cotham had theretofore stated that he was in fear of being killed by Italians, and appellant contends that the homicide may have resulted from a smoldering animosity between the deceased and the Trifonis, who were of that nationality. It is insisted that in any event the man who took the pistol from the hand of the deceased was not sufficiently identified as the appellant to justify the jury in convicting him of the crime.

[1-4] It cannot be doubted that the defendant and Cotham drove to Trifoni's place of business together in Nelson's automobile, since Baker so admitted, and swore that he witnessed the shooting, and immediately drove away, but did not return the car to its owner. The Trifonis testified that the man who entered and took the .45 revolver had a mustache and sideburns, but that he resembled the defendant, who at the time of the trial wore none. A photograph of the defendant, which had been identified by Nelson as that of Baker, was shown to Mr. and Mrs. Trifoni, and while neither of them was positive that it was a picture of the man who entered their store and was on trial, they both testified that it looked like him. Trifoni testified, "The picture looks like him;" "the front view looks like him." Mrs. Trifoni stated that she was in doubt; that "if he had his mustache and long sideburns and his hair, and, of course, his suit and everything, just like that fellow that came in, I would say it was the man;" "his forehead and his eyes are just like that man that came in the store." Another witness swore that a "man resembling Baker got out of the car." This evidence, together with the fact that the defendant was present at the time of the shooting, but failed to notify Nelson that a mutual friend had been mortally wounded, or shot to death, and did not return the automobile, nor spend the night at his own place of abode, but stayed at a strange hotel some distance from home, and early on the following morning left the city under the circumstances herein detailed, constituted considerable substantial grounds upon which the jury may well have based its conclusion that the man who fired from outside the store, entered with a .38 caliber revolver with which Cotham was killed, and was photographed and brought to trial before them, was one and the same person, and that his movements strongly tended to show guilty knowledge.

Circumstantial evidence need not, in order to justify the inference of legal guilt, consist of inculpatory facts which are absolutely and to the point of demonstration incompatible with innocence. "A conviction in the minds of the jurors to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, arising from the evidence of the defendant's guilt, is sufficient." People v. Bellamy, 109 Cal. 610, 42 P. 236. Circumstantial evidence may be as conclusive in its convincing force as the testimony of direct witnesses to the overt act. "Circumstances very largely control the conduct of men in the most important affairs of life, and may be sufficient to justify a conviction of crime where they are such as to exclude any other reasonable theory than that of the guilt of the accused." People v. Nagy, 199 Cal. 235, 248 P. 906. That the defendant was at or near the scene of the crime at the time of its commission may be considered by the jury (People v. Woodward, 45 Cal. 293, 13 Am. Rep. 176), and the fact that witnesses are unable positively to identify him but express a belief that he was the person seen, may be received and weighed by them in connection with all other evidence before them (People v. Young, 102 Cal. 411, 36 P. 770; People v. Botkin, 9 Cal. App. 244, 98 P. 861).

[5] Error is assigned to the failure of the court to grant a continuance of the trial and to furnish the defendant with a stenographic copy of the testimony given before the grand jury. It appears, however, that at the time of returning the indictment in the instant case no stenographic reporter was present, and no report was made of which a copy could have been furnished. It was optional with the district attorney to demand such service, and it was not error to refuse a continuance in the absence of a stenographic report. People v. Doble, 83 Cal. App. —, 257 P. 81; In re Kennedy, 144 Cal. 634, 78 P. 34, 67 L. R. A. 406, 103 Am. St. Rep. 117, 1 Ann. Cas. 840.

[6] It is next contended that a statement made by the defendant to police officers shortly after his arrest was inadmissible, and that the court erred in allowing it to be read to the jury. It is observed, however, that while the accused was being questioned by the officers he denied having had any participation in the crime, but was cautioned and warned as to the use which might be made of any statements he might make, and that he freely and voluntarily gave information as to his residence, acquaintance with Nelson and Cotham, borrowing the automobile and driving to Trifoni's place of business. He also stated in detail his movements thereafter, as heretofore related. When asked pertinent questions as to his connection with or knowledge of the murder he declined to answer until he could consult an attorney. He made no confession, and hence the argument on behalf of appellant in this respect is without merit. People v. Peete, 54 Cal. App. 333, 202 P. 51.

[7, 8] The trial court read to the jury section 1096 of the Penal Code (St. 1927, p. 1039), which is as follows:

"A defendant in a criminal action is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proved, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown, he is entitled to an acquittal, but the effect of this presumption is only to place upon the state the burden of proving him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Reasonable doubt is defined as follows: 'It is not a mere possible doubt; because everything relating to human affairs, and depending on moral evidence, is open to some possible or imaginary doubt. It is that state of the case, which, after the entire comparison and consideration of all the evidence, leaves the minds of jurors in that condition that they cannot say they feel an abiding conviction, to a moral certainty, of the truth of the charge.'"

It is complained that the court erred in refusing three instructions requested by the defendant upon the questions of mere suspicion of guilt, preponderance of evidence, credibility of witnesses, and reasonable doubt, and appellant argues that merely reading the instruction above quoted from the Code was not sufficient. All of the elements of the instructions which were refused appear in those which were given in addition to the section above mentioned. Section 1096a of the same Code provides:

"In charging a jury, the court may read to the jury section 1096 of this Code, and no further instruction on the subject of the presumption of innocence or defining reasonable doubt need be given." St. 1927, p. 1039.

Appellant contends that reading to the jury an omnibus instruction embracing the substance of several separate instructions, and refusing to give those offered deprived him of his liberty without due process of law, in violation of his constitutional guaranties. As held in People v. Egan (Cal. App.) 266 P. 581, section 1096 of the Penal Code merely codifies the legal principles upon which juries have been instructed for years. Having once given an instruction, it is also a rule of long standing that it is not error to refuse to again state the law in the phraseology requested by the defendant. People v. MacPhee, 26 Cal. App. 218, 146 P. 522. He may submit instructions, but beyond this he has no legal right to dictate their form or substance. People v. Dodge, 30 Cal. 448.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

RUPP et al. v. HIVELEY. (Civ. 3586.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 5, 1928.

1. Highways $\Leftrightarrow$ 83—Complaint, alleging plaintiffs' ownership of land west of avenue, and that defendant, owning land on east side, was threatening to destroy trees on east line thereof, affording wind-break, held insufficient in injunction suit (St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9; Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 733).

Complaint, alleging that plaintiffs were owners of land on west side of avenue, on east line of which eucalyptus trees had been grown for 25 years and used for purpose of breaking wind from plaintiffs' land and orange grove, and that defendant, owning land on east side of avenue was threatening to destroy the trees, thus causing irreparable injury to plaintiffs, held insufficient to state cause of action for injunction, under St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9, Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39, and Code Civ. Proc. § 733, relating to public protection of shade and ornamental trees on public roads.

2. Constitutional law $\Leftrightarrow$ 87—Property owner's rights may not be interfered with, if rights of others are not disturbed.

No one has right to interfere with or control right of owner of property to use his property as he sees fit, so long as its use in no way impinges on property or personal rights of another.

3. Easements $\Leftrightarrow$ 61(1)—Plaintiffs could not restrain property owner on other side of road from cutting down trees within his property line, thereby destroying wind-break.

Owners of orange grove on one side of road were not entitled to restrain owner of property on the other side from cutting down trees along highway within his property line, even if the trees as located had for many years constituted a protection to plaintiffs' lands as a wind-break.

4. Highways $\Leftrightarrow$ 83—Plaintiffs, owning orange grove, held not entitled to restrain property owner on other side of road from destroying trees growing on defendant's side of highway, which served as wind-break (St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9; Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 733).

Plaintiffs, owning orange grove on one side of highway, held not entitled to maintain action to restrain property owner on other side of road from cutting down trees on his side of road, though trees were growing and maintained on the highway itself, and had been used over long period for purpose of wind-break for plaintiffs' grove, since matter of protection and preservation of shade and ornamental trees on public roads is vested in the state and its agencies, under St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9, Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39, and Code Civ. Proc. § 733.

5. Highways $\Leftrightarrow$ 83—State has exclusive control over trees on highways and owner of contiguous property may not remove them without permission (St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9; Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 733).

While owner of land abutting on public highway has private interest in trees on highway contiguous to his land, such as to entitle him to damages as against one removing them without lawful authority, state alone has exclusive control over the trees planted and growing on the highways, and not even owner of property himself has right to remove the trees without permission of public authorities, under St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9, Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39, and Code Civ. Proc. § 733.

6. Highways $\Leftrightarrow$ 83—Owners of land abutting highway have no property right in trees on highway in front of another's lands, except through state's easement (St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9; Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 733).

Owners of land abutting on public highway have no property right in trees growing on the highway immediately in front of and on the line of the lands of another on the same highway, under St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9, Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39, and Code Civ. Proc. § 733, except such right as inheres in or is incidental to the easement which the state has acquired in the lands.

7. Highways $\Leftrightarrow$ 83—Owner of land abutting on highway had no prescriptive right in lands on opposite side to have trees on highway remain as wind-break (St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9; Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 733).

Where state did not acquire fee in lands used for highway purposes, owner of property on one side of highway did not acquire prescriptive right of easement in lands of defendant to have trees planted and growing on highway in front of defendant's lands maintained as wind-break for plaintiffs' property, since extent of easement of owner of land abutting on public highway to lands of others acquired by the state for highway purposes is limited to use as highway; planting of trees by state along public highway, under St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9, Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39, and Code Civ. Proc. § 733, being merely incidental.

8. Easements $\Leftrightarrow$ 61(8)—Complaint by owner of property abutting highway, alleging trees on highway had been maintained as wind-break, did not show easement (St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9; Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39; Code Civ. Proc. § 733).

Complaint by owner of property abutting on highway, alleging that trees along highway in front of defendant's property had been used for purpose of breaking wind from plaintiffs' lands and orange crops, held not to show acquisition of easement in defendant's property, such as to warrant injunction, since it was not shown that any right was acquired through use of property for highway; state having exclusive control of protection and preservation of trees on highway, under St. 1909, p. 1129, §§ 7, 9, Pol. Code, §§ 2633, 2742, 4041, subd. 39, and Code Civ. Proc. § 733.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Charles L. Allison, Judge.

Action by W. H. Rupp and another against E. R. Hiveley. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Reese & Bagg, of San Bernardino, for appellants.

M. O. Hert, of Colton, for respondent.

HART, J. By their complaint herein the plaintiffs seek an injunction to prevent the defendant from doing or threatening to do certain acts, the nature of which will presently be explained. A demurrer to the complaint on the ground of the want of sufficient facts was sustained, and the plaintiffs were allowed 10 days within which to amend their pleading. The plaintiffs refused or failed to amend within the time allowed, and thereupon the court rendered judgment dismissing the complaint and dissolving the temporary injunction or restraining order, applied for and granted upon the filing of the complaint. This appeal is from said judgment.

[1] The complaint alleges that the plaintiffs are the respective owners in severalty of two 10-acre tracts of land lying and fronting on the west line of Agate or Ramona avenue, in San Bernardino county; that the defendant is the owner of a tract of land lying and fronting on the east line of said avenue; "that for more than 25 years prior to the date of this suit there have been planted and growing, along the east line of said Agate or Ramona avenue, a large number of eucalyptus trees; that said trees are located on the said Agate or Ramona avenue, and, during all the period of time herein mentioned, have been used for the purpose of breaking the winds from the land and crops of oranges growing on the land belonging to these plaintiffs respectively; that these plaintiffs have planted upon their respective tracts of land large and valuable groves of oranges, and that it is necessary for the proper care and protection of said orange groves that a wind-break along the east of their said tracts of land shall be kept and maintained; otherwise, winds and storms coming from the east and northeast and southeast will sweep across the respective groves of these plaintiffs and greatly injure or destroy the trees and the crop of fruit growing thereon, and that, but for such wind-break existing, as herein described, the land and groves of these plaintiffs respectively, would be almost valueless; that the defendant, E. R. Hiveley, without right or authority of whatsoever kind or nature, is attempting to and threatening to destroy or cut down or otherwise render valueless and ineffective, the said wind-break lying along the east line of said Agate or Ramona avenue, as herein above described, and that in so doing, the said defendant is causing and threatening to cause irreparable injury to these plaintiffs and to their respective orange groves and crops of fruit growing thereon; that these plaintiffs are without remedy at law and that their only relief from such great and irreparable damage can be had in this court, sitting as a court of equity, and by an order of this court perpetually enjoining the defendant, E. R. Hiveley, from committing the wrong herein attempted and threatened." The demurrer was properly sustained.

[2-4] It is not shown by the complaint whether the trees are located on the real property itself of the defendant, or upon the highway. The allegation that for more than "25 years prior to the date of this suit there have been planted and growing, along the east line of said Agate or Ramona avenue, a large number of eucalyptus trees," is the only allegation of the complaint which pretends to fix the exact location of the trees with reference to the real property proper of the defendant, and manifestly it cannot be determined therefrom whether the trees are inside or outside the east line of said property. If on the inside, obviously the defendant has the right to remove the trees. Clearly no one has the right to interfere with or control the right of the owner of property to use such property as he sees fit, so long as such use in no way impinges upon the property or personal rights of another. This would, of course, be true in this case, even if the trees, as so located, had for many years constituted and still constitute a protection of the lands and orchards of the plaintiffs from the alleged destructive effect of the seasonal sweep over and through their said lands of the high winds which, it appears, are common to the section of the country in which the respective tracts of lands of the parties are situated. Nor, even if the trees are growing or maintained on the highway itself, have the plaintiffs legal authority to maintain this action, since the Legislature has expressly declared in several statutes that the matter of the "protection and preservation of shade and ornamental trees growing and to be grown upon the public roads, highways, grounds and property within the state" shall be vested in the state itself or its agencies. See Stats. 1909, p. 1129 et seq. Section 7 of of said act provides, inter alia:

"Every county board of forestry * * * shall, within their respective counties, have exclusive power over and jurisdiction to decide upon the variety, kind and character of trees, hedges and shrubs that shall be planted upon said roads, highways, grounds and property; and to determine all questions respecting the pruning, cutting and removal of any trees," etc., "growing and to grow thereon."

Said section further provides that the board of forestry shall not, in the exercise of its powers or the performance of its duties under the provisions of the act, interfere with the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors over the roads, highways, grounds and property in the improvement and general control thereof. Section 9 of the act makes it a misdemeanor for any violation of its provisions. It seems to be true that whether any county may or may not invoke the provisions of said act is a matter committed to the discretion of the board of supervisors of such county; but, as stated, there are other sections of our Codes relative to highway tree planting which clearly show, as does the above-named statute, even though the provisions of the latter be not taken advantage of by any county, that the state, having full and exclusive control and jurisdiction over the public highways of the state, may through its agencies plant, grow, and maintain trees along and over the public highways in all cases where it may reasonably be determined by the proper authorities that such trees will not only afford in a large measure the protection of the traveling public against the heat of the summer season, and more or less against inclement climatic conditions of the winter months, but will also serve the purposes of ornamentation.

Section 4041, subdivision 39, of the Political Code, authorizes the board of supervisors to encourage, under such regulations as it may deem proper to adopt, "the planting and preservation of shade and ornamental trees on the public roads and highways." Section 2633 of the same Code gives the owner or occupant of land adjoining a highway the authority to plant trees on and along such public highways on the side contiguous to his land, and the right to recover damages from any person who willfully injures any such trees for any damage which is thereby sustained. Section 2742 of said Code provides:

"Whoever digs up, cuts down, or otherwise maliciously injures or destroys any shade or ornamental tree on any highway, unless the same is deemed an obstruction by the road overseer, and removed under his direction, forfeits one hundred dollars for each such tree."

Section 733 of the Code of Civil Procedure, among other things, provides that any person who injures any tree on the street or highway in front of any person's house, or village, or city lot, or cultivated grounds, without lawful authority, is liable to the owner of such land, or to such city or town, for treble the amount of the damages which may be assessed therefor, in a civil action, in any court having jurisdiction.

[5] It will be perceived from the foregoing Code sections that, while the owner of land abutting upon a public highway and contiguous to which on such highway trees have been planted and are growing, has such private interest in such trees as to entitle him to damages from one who, without lawful authority, injures or removes such trees, it is established by said sections that in the state alone, or its agencies, resides the exclusive control over the trees planted and growing upon the public highways, and that no one, even the owner himself of the land in front of which on any public highway such trees are growing or standing, has the right to remove such trees without permission from the proper public authorities. The reason that the owner of the land in front of which and on the public highway trees are growing is given the right to complain of and recover damages for the removal of such trees by one having no permit to do so from the proper authorities is because he is the owner of the fee in the land on which the trees stand to the center line of the highway, and therefore in him is vested a limited property right in the trees themselves. "The owner of the fee of the soil," says the Supreme Court, in County of Santa Barbara v. More, 175 Cal. 6, 12, 164 P. 895, 898 (L. R. A. 1917F, 385), "has a limited, not an unlimited, right of property in the trees. The public upon the other hand, has its limited, and not unlimited, property right in the trees. If their destruction is countenanced or ordered by the authorities, the wood of the felled trees unquestionably belongs to the owner of the fee; so also do the fruit or nuts upon fruit or nut-bearing trees. But, upon the other hand, being and growing upon the public highway and subserving useful as well as ornamental purposes, it is for the authorities to say when and under what circumstances they may be destroyed." (Italics ours.)

[6] But owners of land abutting upon a public highway obviously have no property right in trees growing on a public highway immediately in front of and on the line of the lands of another upon the same highway, except such right therein as inheres in or is incidental to the easement which the state has acquired in such lands. This proposition finds express recognition in the very provisions of our statutes confining the right to maintain an action for damages against any person who removes or destroys such trees without permission from the proper public authorities to the owner or occupant of the land along the immediate line of which the trees are growing or being maintained on the highway. It follows that the plaintiffs in the instant case have no legal right to maintain an action for damages, or any other character of action, against the defendant for removing or threatening to remove the trees in question, even if it be true that the latter has not been given permission by the authorities to do so.

[7] The plaintiffs claim, however, that they have a prescriptive right of easement in the lands of defendant "to have the tr to remain where they are as a wind-break." As has been stated, and as is plainly true, unless the state has acquired the fee in the lands themselves over and through which it constructs and maintains its highways, it can only claim an easement in such lands solely for highway purposes. It (the state, or the public, in whatever form the latter may exercise governmental powers) may control the use of the public highways for such purposes only as may subserve their uses as public highways. County of Santa Barbara v. More, supra. And in the planting, growing, and the preservation of trees along and over the public highways the state merely performs an act incidental to the proper use of its easement in the lands of others appropriated to or acquired by it for use for highway purposes only. Any other use of such easement, or of the lands in which the state owns only an easement solely for highway purposes, would be beyond the scope or the legitimate extent of such easement; and this could be prevented by the owners of the lands to which the servitude as so wrongfully used is attached. An owner of land abutting upon a public highway has in extent or quality only such an easement in those lands of others which also abut upon such highway as the state or its agencies have acquired in such lands for highway purposes and uses.

[8] If, therefore, the plaintiffs in this case, or any other persons over and through whose lands the highway involved herein passes, have acquired, assuming that they could legally acquire, an easement in those portions of the defendant's lands, also constituting a part of said highway, which is to subserve purposes or uses other than those which are the first essentials of the maintenance of public highways, they should have set up such right of easement in their complaint. This, as is manifest from their pleading, they have not done. The complaint merely states that the trees in question (for the period of 25 years or more) "have been used for the purpose of breaking the winds from the land and crops of oranges growing on the land belonging to these plaintiffs, respectively." This allegation does not say, nor is there any allegation of the complaint which does say, that the trees were planted and have been maintained on said avenue for the purpose of serving as such wind-break. If the trees in question have served and are serving the purposes of a wind-break, as alleged in the complaint, that circumstance, so far as the complaint furnishes us any information upon the subject, is only supervenient or adventitious, and has no connection with or pertinency to the real purpose for which they may by the public authorities be protected and preserved. The judgment is affirmed.

(Civ. 6430.)

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1928. Hearing
Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Warehousemen ⇨7—Milling company owning elevator for storage of property to facilitate transportation held "public utility" (Public Utility Act, § 2(aa)).

Milling company, which owned elevator in which it stored property to facilitate transportation by common carriers, held "public utility" as to such property, under Public Utility Act (St. 1915, p. 118; St. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 21) § 2(an), regulating business and indebtedness of public utilities.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Public Utility.]

2. Corporations ⇨464—Public utility has no power to issue notes or evidences of indebtedness except "as provided by law" (Public Utility Act, §§ 51(a), 52(a, b, d)).

Public utility has no power to issue notes or evidences of indebtedness, except as provided by statute; Public Utility Act (St. 1915, p. 115) §§ 51(a), 52(b, d), under section 52(a), permitting exercise of power to issue securities and create liens "as provided by law," which means a law of similar kind; that is, a statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Third Series, As Provided by Law.]

3. Statutes ⇨206—Statute should be construed so as to give effect to every part of it.

If possible, statute or code section should be construed so as to give effect not only to the statute as a whole, but to every part thereof.

4. Statutes ⇨219—Great weight is accorded construction placed on statute by officers charged with duty of executing it.

Construction placed upon statute by officers who have duty of executing it, though not conclusive, is entitled to great weight in construing statute.

5. Public service commissions ⇨6—Public utilities must have railroad commission's consent to execute trust deeds, mortgages, or evidences of indebtedness, or issue long-term notes (Public Utility Act, §§ 51(a), 52(a, b, d)).

Public utilities, not included in Public Utility Act (St. 1915, p. 115) § 51(a), may sell or lease their properties without the order of railroad commission, but cannot execute deeds of trust, mortgages, evidences of indebtedness, or notes running over 12-month period, without order of commission under section 52(a, b, d).

6. Warehousemen $\Leftrightarrow$ 7—Trust deed given by warehouse company without permission from railroad commission held void; "evidence of indebtedness" (Public Utility Act, § 52(a, b, d).

Deed of trust executed by warehouse company on its property without order from railroad commission held void under Public Utility Act (St. 1915, p. 115) § 52(a, b, d), providing that "evidences of indebtedness of public utility issued without the order of the commission * * * shall be void," since "evidence of indebtedness" includes mortgages and deeds of trust, in view of Civ. Code, § 3006.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Evidence of Indebtedness.]

7. Contracts $\Leftrightarrow$ 138(1)—No relief will be given either party under contract expressly prohibited by law.

Where contract is expressly prohibited by law, court will not entertain action thereon or give relief to either party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by the Webster Manufacturing Company against Charles W. Byrnes and others, in which defendant named interposed a cross-complaint. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

James F. Peck and Peck, Bunker & Peck, all of Oakland, and H. H. McPike, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Clarence M. Hawkins, of Oakland, for appellant and cross-complainant.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This case grows out of the following facts: On March 21, 1925, Western Milling Company, later named Oakland Terminal & Elevator Corporation, executed three deeds of trust upon the real property involved in this action. The first deed of trust secured the trustor's promissory note in the principal sum of $210,000, dated March 21, 1925, and made payable to plaintiff on or before January 1, 1926. The note was not paid when due, and on May 11, 1926, after notice given, the trustee named in the deed of trust sold the real property to plaintiff; the sale being pursuant to the terms of the deed of trust. When the note was made, Western Milling Company owed plaintiff, the Webster Manufacturing Company, in excess of $210,000, to wit, $210,655.47. The second deed of trust is referred to in the record, but is not directly involved here. It ran in favor of E. H. Nielsen Company and Macdonald Engineering Company, and secured another note of the trustor also dated March 21, 1925. The third deed of trust secured a note in the principal sum of $200,000 likewise dated March 21, 1925, and made by the same trustor in favor of J. T. Williams,

Lee B. Hawkins, and William N. Wholey. This third deed of trust named B. O. Sawyer and George Rushforth as trustees. Sawyer died, and the payees named in this $200,000 note assigned the note to Charles W. Byrnes. The deed of trust in favor of plaintiff included all of the property of the public utility, consisting of its warehouse, buildings, equipment, and land upon which the same were situated, and was made to secure a note given to refund notes aggregating $90,000, conditional sales contracts aggregating $61,629.64, and the remainder of the $210,000 note was to repay moneys advanced to pay insurance, taxes, etc. This deed of trust was by agreement to be a first deed of trust on the property and was recorded ahead of the other deeds of trust. No foreclosure or sale ever occurred under the third deed of trust made to secure the $200,000 note, and it was stipulated that this deed of trust was recorded last and that it was never foreclosed. Byrnes, after obtaining the assignment of this note, disregarded the security of the deed of trust which had been made to secure it—evidently considering it void for lack of permission given by the railroad commission for its execution—and on February 24, 1926, and prior to the sale of the property to plaintiff filed suit on the note against Western Milling Company and caused a writ of attachment to be issued and levied upon the real property. This suit was not contested, and on April 20, 1926, Byrnes took personal judgment by default therein, and on May 24, 1926, the sheriff of Alameda county, under a writ of execution, sold, subject to redemption, the real property to Charles W. Byrnes. Immediately following this sale, plaintiff brought this action to quiet its title to the real property so sold under execution, including as defendants Byrnes, the purchaser at the execution sale, and Williams, Hawkins, and Wholey, beneficiaries under the third deed of trust, and Rushforth, the surviving trustee thereunder. Byrnes in his answer relies upon the execution sale as his claim of title, while Williams, Hawkins, Wholey, and Rushforth filed a separate answer in which they rely upon the third deed of trust.

[1] It was stipulated at the trial that Western Milling Company was a public utility on and after March 21, 1925 (the date the notes and deeds of trust were executed); that at and from that time it owned an elevator in which is stored property and did thereby facilitate transportation of such property by common carriers. This made it a public utility as to such property (section 2 [aa], Public Utilities Act, Stats. 1915, pp. 115, 118; Extra Session Stats. 1911, pp. 18, 21). It was further stipulated that the railroad commission had never given its consent to the making of the $210,000 note nor to the making of the deed of trust mentioned nor to the procurement of the judgment which Byrnes procured. Judgment was entered decreeing plaintiff to be the owner in fee of the real property in question, and quieting its title against the claims of defendants and all persons claiming under them, or any of them, and from such judgment defendants have appealed.

Appellants contend that the deed of trust under which plaintiff claims was void as having been made without the order of the railroad commission and because the note was given for the refunding of indebtedness and not made for proper purposes; that both the note and the deed of trust securing the same are void; and that, if either is void, the Webster Manufacturing Company obtained no title to the property by virtue of the trustee sale under the deed of trust.

The Public Utility Act of California, in force at the time, so far as it bears on the question here presented, provides:

"Section 51(a). No railroad corporation, street railroad corporation, pipe line corporation, gas corporation, electrical corporation, telephone corporation, telegraph corporation or water corporation shall henceforth sell, lease, assign, mortgage or otherwise dispose of or encumber the whole or any part of its railroad, street railroad, line, plant or system, necessary or useful in the performance of its duties to the public, * * * without having first secured from the commission an order authorizing it so to do."

"Section 52(a). The power of public utilities to issue stocks and stock certificates, and bonds, notes and other evidences of indebtedness and to create liens on their property situated within this state is a special privilege, the right of supervision, regulation, restriction and control of which is and shall continue to be vested in the state, and such power shall be exercised as provided by law and under such rules and regulations as the commission may prescribe."

"Section 52(b). A public utility may issue stocks and stock certificates, and bonds, notes and other evidences of indebtedness payable at periods of more than twelve months after the date thereof, for the following purposes and no others, namely, for the acquisition of property, or for the construction, completion, extension or improvement of its facilities, or for the improvement or maintenance of its service, or for the discharge or lawful refunding of its obligations, or for the reimbursement of moneys actually expended from income or from any other moneys in the treasury of the public utility not secured by or obtained from the issue of stocks or stock certificates, or bonds, notes or other evidences of indebtedness of such public utility," within five years next prior to the filing of an application with the commission for the required authorization, "for any of the aforesaid purposes except maintenance of service and replacements, in cases where the applicant shall have kept its accounts and vouchers for such expenditures in such manner as to enable the commission to ascertain the amount of moneys so expended and the purposes for which such expenditure was made; provided, that such public utility, in addition to the other requirements of law, shall first have secured from the commission an order authorizing such issue and stating the amount thereof and the purpose or purposes to which the issue or the proceeds thereof are to be applied. * * * A public utility may issue notes, for proper purposes and not in violation of any provision of this act, * * * payable at periods of not more than twelve months after the date of issuance of the same, without the consent of the commission, but no such note shall, in whole or in part, be refunded by any issue of stocks or stock certificates," or other evidence of interest or ownership, "or of bonds, notes of any term or character or any other evidence of indebtedness, without the consent of the commission."

"Section 52(d). All stock and every stock certificate," or other evidence of interest or ownership, "and every bond, note or other evidence of indebtedness, of a public utility, issued without an order of the commission authorizing the same then in effect, shall be void."

Section 51 (a) of the Public Utilities Act was amended in 1927 (Stats. 1927, p. 78) so as to include warehousemen and other utilities, and consequently the question here presented will not arise under the act as amended.

In the Matter of Russell, 163 Cal. 672, 126 P. 875, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 152, it is said that the first step in the interpretation of a statute is to consider the conditions existing prior to its adoption so as to ascertain its objects and purposes.

The Public Utilities Act is existent for and because of certain definite reasons, causes, and purposes. It is not hasty legislation enacted in the crisis of time or occasion; but, on the contrary, it is the reaction of the public to long years of oppression from public utilities and misuse of the powers and purposes of such institutions. The act represents the considered, measured, and determined policy of the public to regulate and control the actions of such institutions in their conduct towards the public, and competition between the utilities themselves. It is the intent that investors be secured by regulated and approved securities issued; that credits be allowed only in certain approved lines and classifications; that the money gathered from stockholders and security holders be used only for approved and proper purposes. People v. Willcox, 207 N. Y. 86, 100 N. E. 705, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 629. The California Utilities Act, like similar acts in other states, was for a purpose and because of abuses from which the public suffered. It states a policy of this state and declares a rule of conduct for all public utilities named therein. Its purposes are manyfold, and among them are: To remove the operation of public utilities from the realm of common business and place such operation in the domain of permitted, restricted, and regulated business; to place such institutions and their activities within the sovereign control of the state.

[2] The California act, as we have seen (section 52 [a], Public Utilities Act), declares that the power of public utilities to create liens on their property is a special privilege. Authority as to the meaning of "special privilege" is not needed, so well is it understood, but from and after the declaration of the people, the business of a public utility became something more, other and different than a common business. The people have placed public utilities among that class of business existing at sufferance, and in addition declared that certain powers may only be exercised "as provided by law." The phrase "as provided by law" means a law of a similar kind; that is, a statute. In re Campbell, 138 Mich. 597, 101 N. W. 828. The act then means that authority to exercise the power must be found in the statute. Such authority is found in our Public Utilities Act, but it is coupled with the burden that certain acts must be done by and with the consent of the commission and that unless so done the acts are void. There is no intent in the legislative department that this result be obviated or avoided either by contract or by construction. It is the plain intent of the Legislature that no power in issuing notes or evidences of indebtedness shall be exercised except as provided in the statute.

It is urged in support of the judgment that as the note is payable at a period of less than twelve months from the date it was made, no question arises as to its validity; that under section 51 (a) of the act it is provided that certain classes of public utilities may not sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of or encumber their properties, or any portion thereof, without authorization from the railroad commission, and that as the classes of public utilities so mentioned do not include warehousemen, they are not covered by that section; that section 52 was intended to provide in general terms and for general purposes for the issuance of securities and the creation of other obligations, while section 51 (a) was intended to deal with sales or encumbering of properties by making them security for such obligations; that the special provisions of section 51 (a) govern the general provisions of section 52 relating to the issuance of securities and the creation of other obligations.

[3] It is fundamental that, if possible, a statute or code section should be construed so as to give meaning and effect not only to the statute or code section as a whole, but to each and every part thereof. 23 Cal. Jur. 758, and cases cited. If we conclude that warehouse companies may execute deeds of trust without obtaining the permission of the railroad commission for the reason that warehousemen are not mentioned in section 51 (a), wherein it is provided that certain specified corporations shall not sell, lease, assign, mortgage, or otherwise dispose of or encumber their properties without obtaining an order from the commission, we render meaningless section 52 (d), providing that "all stock and every stock certificate, and every bond, note or other evidence of indebtedness, of a public utility, issued without an order of the commission authorizing the same then in effect shall be void," providing, of course, a deed of trust is an evidence of indebtedness. If, on the other hand, it be held that warehouse companies are not controlled by section 51 (a), but that evidences of indebtedness issued by any character of public utilities are void unless issued in conformity with the other sections of the act, effect is given to each section of the act.

"Evidence of indebtedness" is a generic term. That it is synonymous with securities is so stated by Bouvier in his Law Dictionary, wherein he defines "securities" as "written assurances for the return or payment of money. Evidences of Indebtedness." "Evidence of indebtedness" is defined in Rapalje & Lawrence Law Dictionary, vol. 1, p. 469: "Evidence of debt—a written instrument or security for the payment of money, importing on its face the existence of a debt. Evidence of Indebtedness." In Renton v. Gibson, 148 Cal. 655, 84 P. 188, it is said:

"'Security' is a word of broad import. Certain trust-deeds in real estate are recognized by our decisions, by which trust-deeds the legal title passes to the trustee, with power of sale. In all respects these deeds and transfers of title are 'security,' but they are not mortgages. A mortgage by which no title whatsoever passes, and whereby but a lien upon the property is acquired, is likewise 'security.'"

In Cincinnati, H. & D. Ry. v. Kleybolte et al., 80 Ohio St. 311, 88 N. E. 879, "securities" is held to be synonymous with "evidence of indebtedness." The California Legislature uses the terms "securities" and "evidences of debt" as synonymous as follows:

"Pledgee's Sale of Securities.—A pledgee cannot sell any evidence of debt pledged to him, except the obligations of governments, states, or corporations; but he may collect the same when due." Civ. Code, § 3006.

Under this section it has been held that mortgages are securities or evidences of debt which the pledgee cannot sell. Revert v. Hesse, 184 Cal. 300, 193 P. 943.

[4] The construction placed upon the act by the officers upon whom was imposed the duty of executing it, while not conclusive of the question under consideration, is entitled to great weight. Riley v. Thompson, 193 Cal. 773, 778, 227 P. 772; Riley v. Forbes, 193 Cal. 740, 745, 227 P. 768.

The railroad commission has placed a construction upon the act which gives effect to each section. As warehouse companies are not named in section 51 (a), wherein certain specified corporations may not sell or lease their properties without authorization from the commission, it has held that warehouse corporations may sell or lease their properties without such order. In re Associate Terminals Company, 15 C. R. C. 963; In re Imperial Grain & Warehouse Company, 5 C. R. C. 94; In re Southern California Warehouse & Distributing Company, 23 C. R. C. 362. This holding is not in conflict with section 52 (d), prohibiting the issuing of "evidence of indebtedness" without an order from the commission, nor is it at variance with any other provision of the act.

The railroad commission, however, with but one exception, which will later be noted, has consistently passed upon applications to mortgage and execute trust deeds by warehouse, wharf, and elevator corporations, which are not enumerated in section 51 (a) of the act. In re Sacramento Warehouse Company, 4 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 949, the opinion recites:

"Heretofore, on December 26, 1913, applicant executed its two certain promissory notes, one for the sum of $10,000.00 and one for the sum of $50,000.00 payable to the Sacramento Bank, and also its deed of trust to secure the same. The first note was payable on December 26, 1914, and the second on December 26, 1915. As the commission's consent was not secured, the second note and also the deed of trust (italics ours) are void, under the provisions of section 52 of the Public Utilities Act."

In re Los Angeles Warehouse Company, 4 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 1149, the commission authorized the issuance of a note for $150,000, and also authorized the execution of a deed of trust on the corporation's properties. In re De Fremery Wharf & Land Company, 5 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 382, the commission took jurisdiction over both the note and mortgage and issued its order permitting the execution of the mortgage. In re Lancaster Feed & Fuel Company, 7 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 880, the commission authorized the purchase of a warehouse and the issuance of a purchase price note and the execution of a mortgage to secure the same, and in the same matter (8 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 19) took jurisdiction of a supplemental application solely to pass upon the form of the mortgage and to direct its execution. In re Los Angeles Harbor Warehouse Company, 12 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 549, the warehouse company was granted authority to execute a mortgage to secure a promissory note or notes of the face value of $33,000. In re Hollister Warehouse Company, 16 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 610, permission was granted to the company to issue its one-day note for $25,000 and to secure the note by a mortgage to be substantially in the same form as the mortgage attached to the petition, and in this instance it will be noted the note was payable in less than one year. In re Grange Warehouse & Storage Company, 16 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 218, permission was granted to execute a deed of trust to secure bonds. In re Murietta Valley Elevator Company, 26 Ops. & Ords. R. R. Com. 843, the company was granted permission to execute a mortgage to secure its promissory note in the sum of $7,500. In re Davies Warehouse Company the commission assumed jurisdiction by supplemental order to authorize the execution of a mortgage or deed of trust, and in re Richards Trucking and Warehouse Company, 28 C. R. C. 377, the company was given authority to execute a first mortgage substantially in the same form as that filed to secure a note in the sum of $35,000 and to execute two deeds of trust substantially in the same form as those filed, to secure notes in the sum of $10,000 and $13,500 for the purpose of paying and refunding its outstanding indebtedness.

As stated, the commission in one warehouse case made the statement that it was not necessary for the warehouse utility to obtain the order of the commission to mortgage its property. This was in respect to the Alpaugh Warehouse & Milling Company, 8 C. R. C. 509, decided in 1915. There the applicant was a very small concern, having issued but 170 shares of stock at $5 per share. It owed $2,700 as a balance due the contractor who built its warehouse at a cost of $3,075 and had borrowed $2,700 on a one-year note to pay this balance. Aside from this one isolated instance, the commission in all warehouse cases has assumed jurisdiction and passed upon the applications to mortgage or execute deeds of trust.

[5] Giving the act as it stood the interpretation placed upon it by the railroad commission—and which interpretation gives effect to each section and which interpretation we think to be correct—public utilities mentioned in section 51 (a) could not sell, lease, assign, mortgage, or otherwise encumber their properties without obtaining the order of the commission. Other public utilities could sell or lease their properties without the order of the commission, but could not without obtaining its consent execute deeds of trust, mortgages, or evidences of indebtedness or issue notes, excepting notes payable at periods of not more than twelve months after the date of issuance, but which notes could not be refunded by other notes or evidence of indebtedness of any character.

[6] Western Milling Company, being a public utility and so declared to be in the Public Utilities Act, and having executed its deed of trust, which is an evidence of indebtedness, without having obtained the order of the commission authorizing its execution, such deed of trust is void, and the sale thereunder passed no title.

[7] The provisions of the Public Utilities Act declaring void evidence of indebtedness issued without the order of the railroad commission, approving the same, were enacted by the Legislature in response to a public demand and constitute a firm expression of public policy. The rule therefore announced in Berka v. Woodward, 125 Cal. 126, 57 P. 779, 45 L. R. A. 420, 73 Am. St. Rep. 31, is apropos here:

"This, then, is the undoubted rule, that when a contract is expressly prohibited by law, no court of justice will entertain an action upon it, or upon any asserted rights growing out of it. And the reason is apparent, for to permit this would be for the law to aid in its own undoing. * * * 'If the plaintiff cannot open his case without showing that he has broken the law, the court will not assist him, whatever his claim in justice may be upon the defendant.' And this must be so, for, while as a matter of private justice between individuals it would be but fair that one under such an illegal contract should restore the consideration or should make the payment, the rights of the public are superior to any such private considerations, and the public's right is that the fountains of justice shall remain unpolluted."

In view of the foregoing, discussion of the remaining points is unnecessary.
The judgment is reversed.

OAKLAND TERMINAL & ELEVATOR CORPORATION (a Corporation), Plaintiff and Appellant, v. MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA (a Corporation), Webster Manufacturing Company (a Corporation) et al., Defendants and Respondents. (Civ. 6265).★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1928. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

Appeal by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court of Alameda County, J. D. Murphy, Judge, in an action to declare deed of trust null and void and to enjoin sale thereunder. Reversed.

Robert L. McWilliams, of San Francisco, James F. Peck and Peck, Bunker & Peck, all of Oakland, H. H. McPike, of San Francisco, and Clarence M. Hawkins, of Oakland, for appellant.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondent.

Carl I. Wheat, Reginald L. Vaughan, and Roderrick B. Cassidy, all of San Francisco, and Arthur T. George, of Los Angeles, for amicus curiæ Railroad Commission of the State of California.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. In this action plaintiff seeks a judgment declaring a certain deed of trust to be null and void, and that Mercantile Trust Company of California, the trustee under the deed of trust, its agents and employes, be restrained and enjoined from selling the property described in such deed of trust. By way of cross-complaint defendants, the Webster Manufacturing Company and Mercantile Trust Company of California, pray for judgment that plaintiff take nothing by its amended and supplemental complaint; that the court adjudge, determine, and declare that the note and deed of trust and sale held thereunder were in all respects valid, and that all the property was by such trustee's sale vested in defendant the Webster Manufacturing Company, and that the Webster Manufacturing Company thereby became and is the absolute owner of the property, and that no other person has any interest therein.

Before the trial the trustee under the deed of trust sold the property at a trustee's sale to the beneficiary the Webster Manufacturing Company. The final judgment, from which the appeal is taken, denies to the plaintiff the relief sought, and determines that the respondent the Webster Manufacturing Company is the owner of the property purchased at the sale held under the deed of trust, and placed it in possession of the property.

It is conceded by respondents that Western Milling Company, later named Oakland Terminal & Elevator Corporation, was a "public utility" as defined by the Public Utilities Act of California (St. 1915, p. 115), and that the railroad commission had never given its consent to the making of the note or deed of trust in question.

This action involves the same deed of trust given to secure the same promissory note which is the subject of the action, Webster Manufacturing Co., Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Charles W. Byrnes et al., Defendants and Appellants; Charles W. Byrnes, Cross-Complainant and Appellant, v. Webster Manufacturing Co. et al., Cross-Defendants and Respondents (No. 6430) 271 P. 771, this day decided by this court, and on the authority of that case the judgment here must be reversed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

OAKLAND TERMINAL & ELEVATOR CORPORATION (a Corporation), Plaintiff and Appellant, v. MERCANTILE TRUST COMPANY OF CALIFORNIA (a Corporation), Webster Manufacturing Company (a Corporation), Defendants and Respondents. (Civ. 6361).★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Oct. 24, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 23, 1928. Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 20, 1928.

Appeal by plaintiff from an order of the Superior Court of Alameda County, J. D. Murphy, Judge, appointing receiver and granting certain injunctive relief. Reversed.

Robert L. McWilliams, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Clark, Nichols & Eltse, of Berkeley, for respondents.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. The appellant, plaintiff in the action, has appealed from an order appointing a receiver of certain real property and granting certain incidental injunctive relief, the order having been made upon the application of the defendants.

The suit was brought by the plaintiff in possession and involves the determination of title to real property. The title claimed by defendant Webster Manufacturing Company rests upon the validity of the deed of trust executed by Western Milling Company, later named Oakland Terminal & Elevator Corporation, to Mercantile Trust Company of California, in which deed of trust the Webster Manufacturing Company is the beneficiary. It is conceded that the deed of trust was executed without obtaining the consent of the railroad commission, and the Western Milling Company was at the time of its execution a public utility as defined by the Public Utilities Act of California (St. 1915, p. 115). The deed of trust here involved is the same deed of trust that is the subject of the action Webster Manufacturing Co., Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Charles W. Byrnes et al., Defendants and Appellants; Charles W. Byrnes, Cross-Complainant and Appellant, v. Webster Manufacturing Co. et al., Cross-Defendants and Respondents (No. 6430) 271 P. 771, this day decided by this court, and on the authority of that case the order here appealed from must be reversed, and it is accordingly so ordered.

PEOPLE v. BAKER et al. (Cr. 1717.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 7, 1928.

Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 6, 1928.

1. Robbery ☞15—Prosecution of person for robbery, who aided and abetted its commission, held justified (Pen. Code, §§ 31, 971).

Though it was not shown conclusively that person convicted of robbery in second degree was actually present at time when robbery occurred, where she was shown to have aided and abetted in its commission, prosecution of her therefor was justified, under Pen. Code, §§ 31, 971.

2. Criminal law ☞865(1)—Remarks of judge merely suggesting, in prosecution for robbery, that jury, reporting disagreement, give further consideration to evidence, held not prejudicial.

Remarks of judge in prosecution for robbery in the second degree, which merely suggested that the jurors give further consideration to evidence to the end that a verdict be reached, where jury had made two reports of disagreement, held not prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; Shelley J. Higgins, Judge.

Sylvia Baker and others were convicted of robbery in the second degree, and the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edgar B. Hervey, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank Richards, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. By an information, defendants Sylvia Baker, Frank Kirk, W. O. Schaeffer, and Charles M. Baker (the latter of whom was the husband of defendant Sylvia Baker), were charged with the commission of the crime of robbery. Each of the defendants Kirk and Charles M. Baker pleaded guilty to the charge. On the trial of the action, Schaeffer was convicted of robbery in the first degree, and Sylvia Baker of robbery in the second degree. From the judgment and order denying her motion for a new trial, defendant Sylvia Baker appeals.

It is urged by appellant that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict. The crime committed was that of robbing employees of a street railway company in charge of a street car barn in the city of San Diego. Approximately $4,000 was taken in the robbery, of which amount $3,000 was in currency and the balance of $1,000 in silver, weighing approximately 25 pounds; checks and 1,466 car tokens, all contained in a tin box, were also taken. Although as to several of the circumstances the evidence was contradictory, nevertheless it is clear that the jury was justified in believing the following facts to have been established: A short time preceding the date of the robbery, defendant Charles M. Baker and appellant reserved and procured for the use of defendants Kirk and Schaeffer a room in a certain hotel in the city of San Diego adjoining a room occupied by defendants Baker therein; following which time, and until after the robbery occurred, all of the defendants daily associated one with the other. In the early evening, as well as toward midnight, preceding the morning of the robbery, the clerk of the hotel saw appellant, her husband and Schaeffer go into and out of the hotel several times. Shortly after midnight the Bakers received a telephone call, and immediately thereafter, accompanied by Schaeffer, left the hotel, at which time they told the clerk they were going out to dinner. Each of defendants Charles M. Baker, Kirk, and Schaeffer was actually present at and participated in the robbery, which occurred at about 2:30 o'clock a. m., at which time an automobile was seen in front of the street car barn, but which automobile left that vicinity immediately thereafter. At about 3 o'clock a. m., appellant was seen walking back and forth in front of the hotel. Shortly thereafter she went to her room, remained there about five minutes, returned to the office of the clerk of the hotel, where she appeared to be anxious regarding her husband, left the hotel, but returned immediately, accompanied by her husband, who carried a package under his arm, wrapped in an overcoat, which package, in the presence of appellant, defendant Charles M. Baker took pains to tell the clerk was a case of whisky. Very soon thereafter appellant again returned to the office of the clerk of the hotel and told him that she was going to the depot to meet a friend. She was gone half an hour, returned alone, and retired to the room occupied by her and her husband. Immediately thereafter defendant Charles M. Baker left the hotel and within five minutes returned thereto accompanied by defendant Schaeffer. At about 6 o'clock in the morning following, all the defendants checked out of the hotel. Two or three days later the tin box containing checks and car tokens which had been stolen in the robbery was found on the roof of the hotel where the defendants had roomed. The box corresponded in size with the package carried by defendant Charles M. Baker into the hotel shortly after the robbery occurred. Following the robbery, Mrs. Baker bought a trunk which she said she gave to defendant Kirk. Kirk packed the trunk during Mrs. Baker's absence from her apartment. However, in order to account for its weight, Mrs. Baker made a statement to the effect that it contained linen and silver. The next morning after the robbery occurred Charles M. Baker left the city of San Diego for Los Angeles, where appellant and Kirk followed within a day or two thereafter. In Los Angeles the Bakers registered at a hotel under assumed names. After her arrest, appellant made contradictory, improbable, and untrue statements concerning her acquaintance with defendants Kirk and Schaeffer; also with reference to her whereabouts and movements on the night preceding, as well as the morning of, the robbery.

[1] Although perhaps it was not conclusively shown that appellant was actually present at the time when and at the place where the robbery occurred, after an examination of the transcript of the evidence, this court is convinced that it was ample to justify the conclusion by the jury that defendant either aided and abetted in the commission of the crime, or, not having been present where the crime was committed, advised, and encouraged its commission—which is sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute. Sections 31, 971, Pen. Code.

[2] Appellant also predicates prejudicial error on certain remarks made by the judge of the trial court to the jury. The particular circumstances appear to have been that, after the jury had been considering its verdict for some hours, at the direction of the trial judge, the jury was called into the courtroom. In answer to an appropriate question the foreman of the jury informed the judge that the jury stood eleven to one—without indicating whether for acquittal or for conviction of defendant. Thereupon the judge remarked: "Well, I think the possibilities are that if you had a little more time out there that you might be able to persuade that one to see the situation." Later, when the jury was again brought into the courtroom, at which time it was disclosed that the same situation obtained, the judge made the statement that "evidently you haven't made any progress"; after which one of the jurors said, "Well, I don't believe, Judge, there is any use going back;" to which the judge responded, "You try it."

Appellant urges that each of such remarks made by the judge of the trial court "had the effect of throwing a weight into the balance in favor of the majority and against the minority." However, it is uncertain which faction of the jury finally prevailed. For aught that appears, the one juror may have succeeded in converting the other eleven jurors to his opinion of the guilt of defendant. But, aside from such consideration, this court is of the opinion that the remarks made by the trial judge present no real ground for complaint. The effect of the entire situation was that, far from any coercion, the judge was merely suggesting that the jurors give further consideration to the evidence, etc., to the end that a verdict be reached.

In the case of People v. Carder, 31 Cal. App. 355, 357, 160 P. 686, 687, where a similar question was involved, in part the court said:

"* * * It was proper for the presiding judge to admonish the jury of their duty to consult together, to listen to argument, and to endeavor earnestly to reach an agreement. * * *"

In the case of People v. Miles, 143 Cal. 636, 77 P. 666, it appears that the trial judge had strongly urged the jury to agree on a verdict. Attention is directed to some general authorities and the conclusion reached that no error was committed by the trial court. Among other things, the opinion contains the following:

"The point is, that it was proper for the court to urge the importance of reaching a verdict, and as it intimated no opinion of its own or suggested how the verdict should go, the defendants were not prejudiced."

See, also, People v. Rhodes, 17 Cal. App. 789, 121 P. 935; People v. Cherry, 30 Cal. App. 285, 158 P. 335; People v. Bruno, 49 Cal. App. 372, 379, 193 P. 511; People v. Quon Foo, 57 Cal. App. 237, 241, 206 P. 1028.

The judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

GORDON et al. v. HARRIS. (Civ. 5407.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 7, 1928.

1. Landlord and tenant ⇨184(1)—$5,000 retained by owner from tenant constructing building held not security, but payment of rent for latter's portion of lease; "shall."

Where contract between owner and tenant constructing building provided that $5,000 "shall be left unpaid to contractor as security of said contractor and lessee in lease herein," and that said $5,000 "shall be applied by said owner in payment of last nine months rent," with balance on tenth month, no portion of $5,000 could be looked upon as security for payment of rent which was due at time unlawful detainer action was brought against assignee of lease, but such sum was by way of payment of rent for latter portion of lease; word "shall" in form in which it was used being a positive mandatory statement.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Shall.]

2. Landlord and tenant ⇨186(1)—Where receiver is appointed when tenant is in unlawful detainer, and tenant does not retake possession, he need not pay rent during receiver's possession.

When receiver is appointed at plaintiff's instance, and plaintiff recovers final judgment, in which it is held that, at time receiver was appointed, defendant tenant was in unlawful detainer, and tenant does not elect to pay rent found due, and again take possession, so that his tenancy ceased immediately on appointment of receiver, tenant could not be required to pay any part of rental during receiver's possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Action in unlawful detainer by Morris Gordon and another against Adele Harris. From the judgment, defendant appeals. Cause remanded for amendment of judgment, and judgment, when so amended, affirmed.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. B. Cornell and G. C. De Garmo, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

YORK, J. [1] This is a suit in unlawful detainer, brought against an assignee, who holds under a third assignment of the original lessee, after failure to pay rent after service of a three-day alternative notice to pay rent or quit, the property being then held under such assignment of lease; and originally the only question raised by appellant in this case was, that a sum of $5,000 had been received by the owner of the land by way of security only, and not by way of payment of the rent for the latter portion of the period of the lease.

This case is different from the average case in this regard, in that the sum of $5,000 was not cash paid directly by the original tenant, but was a sum to be deducted from the cost of the construction of the building leased, which building was in course of construction by the original tenant, as a contractor. The phraseology of the lease as to the $5,000 is as follows:

"It is understood and agreed that heretofore another agreement was entered into between the said parties wherein the said lessee agrees to construct and build for the said lessor a certain building on which building this lease is given, in accordance with the plans and specifications agreed between the parties hereto and which said building shall be of the total amount of forty-five thousand ($45,000.00) dollars, and in a manner as described in said agreement between the contractor and the owner, it is agreed that the sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars shall be left unpaid to the contractor as security of the said contractor, the lessee in the lease herein, shall faithfully and substantially comply with the terms agreed in the said lease, and the said sum of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars, together with the six per cent. interest, agreed in the said contract to be paid by the said owners to the said contractor, shall be applied by the said owners in payment of the last nine (9) months rent and further apply the balance for that portion of the tenth month of the last year of said tenancy, as the amount will bear."

If it were not for the words "as security" and "shall faithfully and substantially comply with the terms agreed in said lease," there would probably have been no controversy between the parties with reference to what was meant. If the $5,000 had been paid in cash by the lessee instead of paying the sum by deduction in the cost price of the building, and if this action was defended by the original lessee, the matter would be more simple than it is in its present state. However, there is a direct provision that the $5,000 to be thereafter deducted from the contract price, shall be applied by the owners in payment of the last nine months' rent, and further apply the balance for that portion of the tenth month of the last year of said tenancy as the remaining amount will bear, the interest of 6 per cent. also to be credited on said tenth month—this provision of the lease therefore leaves nothing to be applied as security for any other payments whatever. Nothing is said about any deductions for any rent due for any of the previous months' rental, and, in case of a deduction in the amount of the rent due at the time this action was brought, there would not be sufficient funds for the payment of but a small portion of the said last months specified, and nothing for application on the tenth month at all.

The trial court must have assumed that what was meant by the lease was exactly what is stated in a definite and positive portion of said lease as to said $5,000 to wit, "that it shall be applied."

"Shall" is, in the form in which it is used, a positive, mandatory statement; therefore the determination of the trial court in reference to the matter of the $5,000 having been received and credited on account of the rental for the last months, and that therefore, under the authority of the cases hereinafter cited, no portion of the $5,000 could be looked upon as security for the payment of the rent which was due at the time this action was brought, was correct. The words "as security of the said contractor," etc., may have been inserted on the theory that, if the money was actually so applied, then the said contractor would be more liable to comply with the other terms of the lease. It might not apply to any one holding under assignment from him.

As quoted in Wetzler v. Patterson, 73 Cal. App. 527, 238 P. 1077:

"Provision is sometimes made in a lease for the payment in advance of the rents of the last or later periods of the lease, and such a provision has been held not to be a security merely for the lessee's performance of his agreements in the lease, but purely a payment of rent in advance, and therefore may be retained by the lessor though he terminates the lease for the default of the lessee as provided for in the lease." (16 R. C. L. 931.)

In the instant case, we have the words "security" used, and in Wetzler v. Patterson, supra, they had the words "forfeited" and "reserved" to complicate the meaning—but the rule above stated from Ruling Case Law and quoted by the court in the opinion in Wetzler v. Patterson referred to "security." We have attempted to adopt the reasoning used by the court in that case in interpreting the lease in the case now before this court.

[2] At the time of the oral argument, it was suggested to the court for the first time that the rule laid down in the case of Telegraph Avenue Corporation v. Raentsch (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 1109, should also be considered by this court, and it was practically conceded by respondent, upon the oral argument, that this decision would be determinative of the question as to whether any rents could be charged against the tenant after the time the receiver took possession of the property. The case cited does not seem to us to be as unusual a determination as the attorneys on both sides seemed to feel in their argument, but rather an ordinary common sense rule that, when a receiver is in possession collecting the rents, having been appointed at the instance of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff recovering final judgment in which it is held that, at the time the receiver was appointed, the defendant was in unlawful detainer, that thereafter, if the defendant does not pay up all of the rents found due, and the ouster, which took place when the receiver was appointed, becomes a permanent ouster, that is, that the tenant does not elect to pay the amount of rent found due, and thus again take possession of the property, that his tenancy had ceased immediately upon the appointment of the receiver, then, under such circumstances, all rents received by the receiver, as and for rents during his occupancy, are then to be accounted for, and the net proceeds paid to the owner of the property, and the tenant, having been found in unlawful possession, cannot, of course, be found to be entitled to any part or portion of such rents, and therefore could not be required to pay any part or portion of the rental during the possession of such receiver.

The trial court is ordered to amend its judgment by deducting from the judgment all of that part of the rents which accrued after the date the receiver took possession, November 23, 1925, and the cause is remanded to the trial court for that purpose. It is further ordered that the judgment, when so amended, be affirmed.

FARMER v. MOUNTAIN LAKE CLUB.
(Civ. 4942.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 5, 1928.

Contracts §329—Under contract to pay in installments for services and expenditures, suit to recover amount due, brought before final installment, held not premature.

Where contract acknowledged rendition of services and expenditures of a value of $1,000, which corporation agreed to pay at rate of $50 per week for six weeks, and thereafter $100 per week until fully paid, held that, as each installment fell due, it created a cause of action and action to recover amount of such installments, when $600 was due, was not premature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by M. E. Farmer against the Mountain Lake Club, a corporation. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ira E. Quimby and Irving T. Hagan, in pro. per.

Frank H. Jaques, of Long Beach, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The respondent instituted an action upon a contract in writing which was made a part of the complaint, and to which pleading a demurrer was interposed. The demurrer was overruled, and, upon the failure of appellant to answer, judgment for $600 with interest and costs was entered by default. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

The contract in question acknowledges the rendition of certain services and expenditures of moneys for the corporation, of a value of $1,000, which the latter therein agreed to pay as follows, to wit:

"Fifty dollars ($50.00) per week beginning on March 10th, 1924, until six payments have been made, and the balance at the rate of one hundred dollars ($100.00) per week until fully paid."

The demurrer of the defendant was general, and it is here contended that the complaint was filed when but $600 had become due and payable, and that suit was premature, since the contract provided for payment of a fixed sum of $1,000 as a single consideration for said services and expenditures. Respondent contends that each payment of $50 and $100 constituted the basis of a separate cause of action.

While the contract recited a total consideration of $1,000, it was payable in weekly installments, and contained no provision that the whole amount should become due and payable upon a failure to pay any one installment. The plaintiff commenced his suit after the expiration of the ninth week, and prayed judgment for $600, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. upon each such installment from the date that it became due under the provisions of the contract, which the trial court allowed. Appellant cites no authority in support of its contention, and we fail to see any difference in this respect between the contract in suit and other installment contracts or promissory notes. The respondent could not have recovered more than the amount aggregating the nine installments, but, as each installment fell due, it created a cause of action, and a suit therefor would not be premature. Compressed Air Machinery Co. v. West San Pedro Land & Water Co., 9 Cal. App. 361, 99 P. 531.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte BATHURST. (Cr. 1724.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

I. Criminal law ⚡260(4)—Municipal court lost all jurisdiction after notice of appeal from judgment of conviction therein (Pen. Code, § 1468, as amended by St. 1925, p. 950, § 3).

Where defendant, after conviction in municipal court on a charge of petty theft, gave notice of appeal, municipal court lost all jurisdiction, without regard to whether appeal was perfected by compliance with Pen. Code, § 1468, as amended by St. 1925, p. 950, § 3, since, after appeal is taken, jurisdiction over cause is vested in appellate court, which is the only forum in which to determine whether the appeal was effective.

2. Criminal law ⚡258(4)—Trial court had no authority after judgment to grant motion for new trial (Pen. Code, § 1450).

Municipal court, after judgment of conviction therein for petty theft, had no authority under Pen. Code, § 1450, to grant motion for a new trial, irrespective of fact that appeal had been taken from judgment prior to presentation of motion.

Original application for writ of habeas corpus by Benjamin Elconin on behalf of Diana Bathurst. Writ granted.

Benjamin Elconin, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

E. J. Lickley, City Prosecutor, and Joe W. Matherly and F. W. Fellows, Deputy City Prosecutors, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

THOMPSON, J. This is an application of Benjamin Elconin on behalf of Diana Bathurst for the writ of habeas corpus. From the petition, the return thereto, and the findings of this court upon evidence taken, we may state the following situation: Diana Bathurst was tried upon a charge of petty theft before the municipal court of Los Angeles on July 9, 1928, and there found guilty. The trial court on July 11 sentenced the defendant to 180 days in the city jail, suspending the sentence as to 150 days thereof. The petitioner contends that he presented a motion for a new trial prior to pronouncement of sentence, but from the evidence adduced we have found that the motion for a new trial was not presented until after judgment. Some time subsequent to the pronouncement of sentence, and in the afternoon of the same day, counsel served upon the city prosecutor a written motion for a new trial, which bears no filing mark, and which appears to have been called to the attention of the court on July 13, 1928, at which date it was set for hearing for July 16, 1928. After argument of the motion, it was granted, and the cause was transferred to another division of the court for retrial. When the cause was called for trial on August 15, 1928, the trial judge set aside the order granting the motion for a new trial, on the ground that the motion had not been made until after judgment was pronounced and entered, and ordered the defendant committed. This outlines the facts, except that on July 11, when the defendant was sentenced, her counsel gave oral notice of appeal, bond for the release of defendant pending the appeal was fixed by the court and furnished in the sum of $1,000. No other steps were taken with respect to the appeal. It is conceded by counsel under the authority of Lillywhite v. Superior Court, 80 Cal. App. 533, 251 P. 945, that the oral notice of appeal was sufficient, and therefore we can pass directly to the main question.

[1] The petitioner asserts that the municipal court lost all jurisdiction over the proceeding when the notice of appeal was given, while the respondent points to section 1468 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1925, p. 950, § 3, and argues that, by reason of the failure of petitioner to comply with the provisions thereof the appeal was never perfected. Section 1468, Penal Code, reads as follows:

"The appeal to the superior court from a judgment of a municipal court, or from the judgment of a justice's or police court, shall be heard upon the statement of the case settled by the judge of the municipal court or by the justice or police judge. The statement must contain the grounds upon which the party intends to rely upon the appeal, and so much of the evidence as may be necessary to explain the grounds. The statement must be prepared by the appellant and filed with the court, and a copy served upon the opposite party, within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal. The respondent may, within five days after the service of the copy and the filing of the proposed statement, file amendments thereto, a copy of which must be served upon the appellant. Within five days from the time of the filing and serving of the amendments or if no amendments be filed then within ten days from the time of the filing of the statement, as herein provided, the court must settle the same, and if in the opinion of the court the statement is incorrect or insufficient he shall correct it. If no statement is filed and served as herein provided, the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose, and shall be deemed dismissed, and the judgment or order appealed from shall be enforced as if no appeal had been taken."

Since the amendment of the section to read as quoted above in 1925, it has been analyzed at length and declared to provide for "the equivalent of a bill of exceptions, with the difference, at least, that the statement must contain 'the grounds upon which the party [appealing] intends to rely upon the appeal.'" Garrett v. Superior Court, 79 Cal. App. 273, 249 P. 871. The Garrett Case is also authority for the statement that section 1246 of the Penal Code (in effect at the time of this appeal) is applicable to appeals from the municipal court to the superior court, and that by reason of its terms it is the duty of the clerk of the municipal court to furnish the superior court with the "papers which are the equivalent of the 'judgment-roll alone.'"

We also direct attention to the opening words of the section as follows: "The appeal to the superior court * * *, shall be heard upon a statement of the case," etc. We have had occasion heretofore to note a distinction between a method devised for the taking of an appeal and the manner provided for preparing the record upon which the appeal is to be heard. Not only is mention made of the fact that section 1246 of the Penal Code is ineffective until after the appeal is taken, in the Garrett Case, but also in passing upon a motion to dismiss an appeal to this court in People v. McClellan (Cal. App.) 263 P. 841, we held that section 1247 of the Penal Code requiring the appellant to "present an application to the trial court, stating in general terms the grounds of the appeal and the points upon which" he relies, relates to the time and manner of making up the record and not to the taking of the appeal. It is to be noted that the concluding sentence of the first part of this section is substantially the same as those of the section under consideration. It reads:

"If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken."

As a matter of pure logic, it must follow that, if the appeal is taken, jurisdiction over the cause is vested in the appellate tribunal. As a matter of sound procedure, it would seem that the appellate tribunal is the only forum in which to determine the appeal to be ineffectual. To say that the trial court should have the right to determine whether an appeal from its judgment were effectual would certainly lead to a strange inconsistency and be entirely at variance with a just conception of the right of appeal. In line with this reasoning, we find a statement in Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 342-346, 139 P. 805, 807, as follows:

"The appeal was, of course, in this court from the moment it was perfected, although the record on appeal was not filed herein until later. The place then to assail the purported appeal as being ineffectual for any purpose by reason of want of authority of the attorney to take an appeal on behalf of Mrs. Black was this court, and as long as no attack was made here on the same, by motion to dismiss or otherwise, the lower court had no right to regard it otherwise than as a valid appeal, duly authorized by the purported appellant." (Italics ours.)

We also find the same principle announced in the case of In re Howell, 29 Cal. App. 668, 157 P. 553, wherein the court was considering the effect of an appeal prior to the amendment of section 1468. It is there said:

"The filing of the notice of appeal and furnishing the required bail in an amount as fixed by the Justice had the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the Justice's Court to act further, and removed the cause to the Superior Court. This, notwithstanding that it might follow that the appeal should be dismissed for lack of a sufficient record upon which to present any available question. Upon this application, however, that question is of no materiality. If the defendant's case was by the appeal taken transferred to the Superior Court, the Justice of the Peace could not lawfully issue a jail commitment until some order had been made by the Superior Court disposing of the appeal."

The rule is also consonant with the declaration that "the perfection of an appeal divests the Superior Court of jurisdiction as to all matters embraced in the judgment or order appealed from." Eisenberg v. Superior Court, 193 Cal. 575, 226 P. 617. We have not overlooked the force of the language of the section that for failure to file the statement the appeal shall "be deemed dismissed," but, in view of the fact that it would have been just as easy for the Legislature to have provided that the giving of the statement should have been one of the steps in taking the appeal as one of the steps in perfecting the record, we can but conclude that the language used was employed for the purpose of indicating that it should be mandatory upon the appellate tribunal to dismiss the appeal in the event the record was not prepared and perfected, in accordance with the provisions of the section. It has been held many times that substantially the same language found in section 1247 of the Penal Code was mandatory and the appellate tribunal was required to dismiss the appeal for failure to present the statement of the grounds of appeal. Reference may be had to People v. McClellan, supra, for a partial list of these authorities.

It must be obvious from the observations so far made that an appeal once perfected is pending in the appellate tribunal until dismissed by that court. The defendant in the action in the municipal court having given bond to stay the execution of the judgment pending the appeal is therefore entitled to her liberty until some further step is taken.

[2] This would dispose of the present proceeding were it not for the fact that counsel do not agree upon the effect of the order granting the motion for a new trial, which motion, as we have noted, was not filed until after judgment was pronounced; and, inasmuch as that question will probably be argued in subsequent steps to be taken, we ought to announce our opinion thereon. Section 1450 of the Penal Code provides that the defendant may move for a new trial "at any time before judgment." This language is plain and unambiguous. It would seem obvious that once the court has pronounced judgment the time has gone within which the motion may be presented and as completely so as though a motion had been made and denied. It was held in People v. Walker, 142 Cal. 90, 75 P. 658, where a motion was made before judgment and denied and thereafter a second motion was made, that the trial court was right in refusing to entertain the second motion because "the right to move for a new trial had * * * been exercised and exhausted." There was some question concerning when the motion for a new trial was presented in the case of People v. Long, 7 Cal. App. 27, 93 P. 387, whether before probation was granted or after probation was revoked and judgment of imprisonment pronounced, and the court said:

"If the showing made by appellant had not been contradicted and his motion granted, it would have availed him nothing. The application for a new trial must be made before judgment, and the order granting or denying the same must be immediately entered by the clerk in the minutes."

This quoted language is used by the court with respect to section 1182 of the Penal Code, which for our present purposes is the same as section 1450. We have no doubt that the trial court had no authority to grant the motion for the new trial by reason of the fact that it came too late, and that, irrespective of the fact that an appeal had been taken from the judgment prior to the presentation of the motion.

Diana Bathurst is ordered discharged from custody.

SHORT v. SUPERIOR COURT OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (Civ. 6157.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 5, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1928.

1. Divorce ⇨177—Judgment denying divorce held appealable (Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1).

Judgment denying plaintiff a divorce, which was plain, ordinary and final judgment, under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1, held appealable.

2. Mandamus ⇨31—Mandamus held not to lie to compel court denying divorce to proceed with trial of all issues (Code Civ. Proc. § 1085).

Writ of mandate should not issue, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1085, to compel court which had denied petitioner divorce to proceed to trial of all issues in the action; only duty of court being to try action and to render judgment.

Application for writ of mandate by Walter S. Short, to be directed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, to require respondent to proceed with trial of a certain cause. Writ denied.

Shoemaker & Sammons, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Clarke & Bowker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, P. J. Walter S. Short, the petitioner in the present proceeding, filed in respondent court his complaint in an action against Helen W. Short, his wife. The action was commenced for the purpose of procuring a divorce. The wife interposed an answer in which she alleged that an earlier litigation had occurred between her and her husband in a court of competent jurisdiction in the state of Washington, in which litigation a judgment had been rendered, and that the judgment had become final. It was also alleged in the answer that this foreign judgment had required, among other things, the making of certain payments by the husband to the wife, that he had failed and neglected to make the major portion of the payments and that he was in contempt of the foreign court because of such failure and neglect. The answer prayed that the action in respondent court be abated until the husband should purge himself of the contempt.

Upon this state of the pleadings the action for divorce came on for trial in respondent court. The judgment of the Washington court was received in evidence. Respondent court then gave the wife leave to file an amended answer "to conform to the proof." This pleading was filed, and it prayed that the foreign judgment, because of certain matters adjudged in it which need not be mentioned here, be determined to be res adjudicata of all the matters pleaded by the husband in his complaint for divorce. The husband had objected to the introduction in evidence of the Washington judgment. He also objected to the granting of leave to file an amended answer. These objections were both overruled. The husband also insisted that respondent court hear evidence under the allegations presented by his complaint for divorce, but the court declined to hear further evidence in the cause, and it was ordered submitted for decision. Thereafter respondent court made its findings of fact and rendered its judgment. The judgment was to the effect that plaintiff be denied a divorce and that he take nothing by his action. The plaintiff, the husband, then petitioned this court, upon notice, for a peremptory writ of mandate to require respondent court "to proceed to trial with said cause of action [for divorce] upon the merits of all the issues raised by the pleadings in said action." No alternative writ was ever issued.

[1] Petitioner contends that he has no right of appeal from the judgment rendered by respondent court, but this cannot be true. The judgment was a plain, ordinary, final judgment, and the right to appeal from it is secured by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As will appear from what is said below, this point is of interest only because, even at this late day, we might possibly, without deciding whether we could, order a writ of review under the allegations of the petition now before us if there were no right of appeal.

It is further insisted by petitioner that, if he has a right of appeal, the remedy is neither speedy nor adequate. For the reasons to be stated in the next paragraph of this opinion, this question does not arise in the proceeding.

[2] This is not a proper case for the writ of mandate. Except for a certain special purpose which is not presented here, the writ will issue only "to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station." Code Civ. Proc. § 1085. The law enjoined upon respondent court no duty to receive any particular evidence in petitioner's suit for divorce. The only duty of the court was to try the action and to render judgment. This it has done. If any errors have been committed during the progress of the trial, they cannot be corrected by means of the writ of mandate. This rule is too well settled to require the citation of authority in its support.

A writ of mandate is denied.

STURTEVANT, J. This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus. From the sheriff's return it appears that that officer held the petitioners under an order of the police court of San Francisco holding the petitioners to answer upon a charge of felony and committing the petitioners to the custody of the sheriff until they be legally discharged. To the sheriff's return the petitioners did not interpose any answer of any kind or nature. Pen. Code, $\S$ 1484.

[1-4] In their brief the petitioners concede that the complaint on file in the police court was an attempt "to charge said petitioners with a violation of section 14 of the Corporate Securities Act." 1 Deering's Gen. Laws, 1399, 1407. If so, the complaint may not be attacked in this proceeding. Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 P. 605. They make a meticulous attack on the evidence taken in the police court and contend that the evidence was insufficient to support the order holding the petitioners to answer. On the record as made, the evidence taken in the police court is not properly before this court, and we are not at liberty to consult it. Pen. Code, $\S$ 1484. If, however, we pick up that evidence and examine it, we are unable to grant the application of the petitioners. Bearing in mind that this is an application for a writ of habeas corpus, an attack on the evidence taken before the committing magistrate does not authorize this court to weigh the evidence. That function will be exercised by a jury at the proper time. In re Leonardino, 9 Cal. App. 690, 693, 100 P. 708. In this proceeding the power of this court is to ascertain whether the petitioners were held to answer "without reasonable or probable cause." Pen. Code, $\S$ 1487, subd. 7. If there was either reasonable or probable cause, the petition should be denied.

[5, 6] There are many reasons why it is unnecessary, and, indeed, improper, to recite and comment on the evidence taken before the committing magistrate. As stated above, our power is not to weigh that evidence. Furthermore, in this case, as in most cases, the prosecution produced some evidence, but we may not assume that it produced all of its evidence, and the defendants produced no evidence, and we may not assume that they had none to produce. Finally, if we knew that all of the plaintiff's evidence in the case had been produced, it would be improper for us to express our opinions when, as stated above, a jury will hereafter pass on the weight of the evidence. It will suffice for us to state that we have examined the evidence, and that we find there was reasonable and probable cause for holding the petitioners to answer before the superior court.

The writ is denied, and the petitioners are remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

We concur: KOFORD, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

CAMPION v. CONTINENTAL CASUALTY CO. (Civ. 6458.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 1, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Dec. 31, 1928.

1. Appeal and error $\S$ 996—Trial court's decision, as between two opposite inferences reasonably authorized by facts, is binding on appellate court.

Where the facts established may reasonably authorize one of two opposite inferences, the trial court's decision adopting one and rejecting the other is binding on the appellate court.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 931(1)—Trial court's findings must be liberally construed to uphold judgment.

The findings of the trial court are to be liberally construed so as to uphold, rather than defeat, its judgment.

3. Insurance $\S$ 665(3)—Evidence held to warrant inference that insured's scoliosis or spinal deformity did not exist when she signed application for indemnity insurance (Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 2577, 2580, 2610).

Insured's testimony that she did not know of scoliosis or spinal deformity when she applied for indemnity insurance, and testimony of physician who knew her intimately before application that he did not know of such deformity until he examined her after accident, held to warrant inference that such condition did not exist when she signed application stating that she was not crippled, maimed, nor suffering from any mental or bodily defect, and hence made no false representations and violated no warranty within Civ. Code, $\S\S$ 2580, 2610, in view of section 2577, though insurer's physicians testified that scoliosis was obvious, old, and definite.

4. Appeal and error $\S$ 1011(1)—Trial court's finding on conflicting evidence that spinal deformity did not contribute to insured's disability is conclusive.

Trial court's finding on physicians' conflicting testimony, in action on accident policy, that plaintiff's disability was caused solely by accident, and not contributed to by scoliosis or spinal deformity existing when she signed application for insurance, is conclusive on question of preponderance of evidence.

5. Insurance $\S$ 665(5)—Evidence held to show that insured was under physician's regular care as required by accident policy to recover for full loss of time.

Qualified physician's testimony, in action on accident policy, that insured was under his care regularly since about a month after accident, received treatments by him and masseur in his employ, and was examined by him within week before trial, sufficiently showed that insured was under regular care of legally qualified physician, as required by policy to recover for full loss of time.

6. Insurance $\S$ 665(5)—Insured's testimony that she did not realize she would be sick for any length of time held not to preclude finding that she was directly disabled as result of accident.

Insured's testimony that she did not realize when hurt that she was going to be sick for any length of time, but expected to be able to return to work, held not to preclude finding that she was directly disabled as result of accident within policy sued on.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Nellie Cecilia Campion against the Continental Casualty Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, for appellant.

C. J. Creegan, of San Mateo, and Jered A. Maguire, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CAMPBELL, Justice pro tem. This is an action to recover certain monthly indemnities alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant corporation on an insurance contract.

On July 19, 1922, defendant issued to plaintiff the insurance policy in question, and on November 4, 1926, plaintiff sustained injuries which resulted in her total disability. Some two months after the accident causing the injury plaintiff made her first claim for compensation. After an investigation the company commenced paying the monthly indemnity called for in the contract of insurance. Four such payments were made, after which defendant company refused further payment, claiming that plaintiff had a very pronounced scoliosis (curvature of the spine), which scoliosis contributed to the disability of plaintiff. The court found in favor of plaintiff, and rendered her judgment in the amount of $130 per month from March 17, 1927, to the date of the judgment, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum until paid. Motion for new trial was made and denied, and defendant has appealed from the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

Appellant urges that respondent made representations in her application for the insurance contract which were false and consequently void the policy; failed to establish her case by a preponderance of the evidence; and the findings of fact are not supported by the evidence. The false representation by respondent in her application for insurance, which appellant claims voids the policy, is:

"I have not, nor am I now suffering from * * * any chronic or periodic mental or physical ailment or disease, nor am I crippled or maimed, nor have I any defect in hearing, vision, mind or body. No exceptions."

As proof of her statement being false appellant directs us to the testimony of the doctors—five in number—who testified at the trial, who said that respondent did have a pronounced scoliosis. None of them, however, examined her until after the accident, over four years subsequent to the date of her application for a policy, when her statement claimed to be false was made.

In support of its contention that this asserted false statement voids the policy, appellant has cited us to section 2580 of the Civil Code, "If a representation is false in a material point, whether affirmative or promissory, the injured party is entitled to rescind the contract from the time when the representation becomes false," and section 2610 of the same code, "The violation of a material warranty, or other material provision of a policy, on the part of either party thereto, entitles the other to rescind," and to authorities holding the general rule to be that warranties as to health of the insured will be strictly construed, and, if false in any particular, the policy will be voided, regardless of the good faith of the assured.

It is not necessary to review the authorities cited, as the question presented involves not so much the application of legal principles as it does the determination of a question of fact.

It is conceded by appellant that no witnesses, not even the experts produced by it, attempted to say that the scoliosis existed on July 19, 1922, the date of respondent's application for a policy; that such experts could not so testify "for the simple reason that not a single one of the witnesses, least of all the experts produced by appellant, could truthfully testify to such a fact, they not having known respondent or examined her at the time in question." Appellant directs us to the testimony of Dr. Warren, that "she was suffering with an extensive deformity of the spinal column"; and Dr. Ryan, "There was clinically an old scoliosis." Continuing, the doctor testified that lots of us have scoliosis of some kind; some of them are congenital; most scoliosis is acquired by defective posture at a desk; "you can have a scoliosis and you can go on through life quite a way, and the muscles and general bodily activity keep away the symptoms, and compensate for that faulty posture, but when we get towards middle life, or a little beyond and those muscles begin to break down, we begin to get symptoms, begin to get backache; so I would say, with a scoliosis of any degree, that later in life or towards middle life, we will begin to get symptoms." Appellant also directs our attention to the testimony of Dr. Fleming, that in his opinion the scoliosis is not the cause of the present disability inasmuch as she worked steadily for eight years at the arduous work as a nurse without complaints or symptoms referable to her back.

[1, 2] From this testimony, as against the testimony of respondent that at the time she made her application for the policy she did not say anything about having a spinal deformity as she did not know she had one, and the testimony of respondent's witness Dr. Warren, who had known respondent somewhat intimately for eight or nine years, she having been employed by him at different times as nurse, and who testified he did not know that she had a deformity of the spine until his examination of her after the accident, appellant asks us to draw the inference that such scoliosis existed at the time of the injury complained of, contrary to the inference drawn by the trial court. Where the facts established may reasonably authorize one of two opposite inferences and the trial court has adopted one and rejected the other, its decision is binding upon the appellate court, the same as where the trial court decides upon the weight of contradictory evidence. MacDermot v. Hayes, 175 Cal. 95, 170 P. 616. The findings of the trial court are to be liberally construed so as to uphold rather than to defeat its judgment. It is the province of the trial court to make any inference of fact from the evidence or from the facts found by it, and the appellate court will not draw a different inference from that drawn by the trial court to defeat its judgment. Paine v. San Bernardino, etc., Co., 143 Cal. 654, 77 P. 659; Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 77, 31 P. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257; People's Homes Sav. Bank v. Rickard, 139 Cal. 285, 73 P. 858.

[3] The words descriptive of the scoliosis such as "obvious," "old," and "definite" are relative terms and too indefinite in point of time to support the contention that a condition found to exist subsequent to November 4, 1926, existed on July 19, 1922. Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 543, 174 P. 38. Furthermore, if respondent did not know of the existence of this scoliosis or deformity when she applied for indemnity insurance and such condition was not noticeable to the experienced and practiced eye of a physician who had known her intimately, the court could well draw the inference that such condition did not exist at the time respondent signed the application containing the statement that she was not crippled or maimed, nor suffering from any defects in mind or body. "The completion of the contract of insurance is the time to which a representation must be presumed to refer." Civ. Code, § 2577. Here the contract was completed and the written evidence of it delivered on July 19, 1922.

[4] Appellant's next contention is that respondent failed to establish her case by a preponderance of the evidence—that the evidence does not establish the fact that the disability was caused solely by the accident, but, on the contrary, shows that the scoliosis contributed to the disability. In support of this contention appellant cites us to the testimony of Drs. Ryan and Catton, called as witnesses by it; the former testifying that the scoliosis found to exist contributed definitely to respondent's disability, and the latter stating that the scoliosis, together with other abnormalities found to be existing in respondent, contributed to her present disability. Dr. Warren, appellant's expert, however, seems to have entertained a contrary opinion; he testified:

"Well, at the time of the first examination when I found the curvature and thought that she had a dislocation or injury, I thought that possibly it might have had some aggravation, that is, the curvature may have aggravated some of her symptoms or prolonged her trouble, but afterwards we found the trouble was not in the sacro-iliac joint at all and our conjectures in case were wrong. Q. When did you arrive at this latter decision? A. When I saw the X-ray plates made by Dr. O'Neill."

On this conflict the finding of the trial court is conclusive on the question of preponderance of evidence. Still v. San Francisco & Northwestern Ry. Co., 154 Cal. 559, 564, 98 P. 672, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 322, 129 Am. St. Rep. 177.

[5] Under appellant's last contention that the findings of fact are not supported by the evidence, it complains of the following findings in this respect: (a) That plaintiff has been under the care of a legally qualified physician or surgeon; (b) that plaintiff has been directly disabled as the result of the accident; and (c) that it is not true that plaintiff and cross-defendant, during the month of December, 1926, and January, February, and March, 1927, or at any other time, was suffering from a disability caused by a pre-existing spinal deformity. This last objection has already been discussed. As to the other objections there is no merit in appellant's contentions. As to the first, it may be said that Dr. Markel, whose qualifications were admitted, testified that Miss Campion was under his care since December 3, 1926, and has been under his care regularly; that he straightened her back and ordered a surgical corset for her, which she wore about three weeks, but as she was not relieved he made a plaster of paris jacket for her which she has worn ever since; that aside from his personal treatments she had quite a number of physiotherapy treatments in his office given by a masseur in his employ after an examination given her by him before the treatments; that he examined her within a week of the trial. This sufficiently complies with the clause in the policy requiring that in order to recover for the full loss of time the insured must be under the regular care of a legally qualified physician or surgeon.

[6] In support of the remaining objection that the evidence does not support the finding that plaintiff has been directly disabled as the result of the accident, appellant directs our attention to the following testimony of plaintiff as establishing its contention:

"When I was hurt I did not realize I was going to be sick for any length of time. I expected to be able to return to my work. It was never my intention to draw on my insurance policy, or ask the company to help me unless it was absolutely necessary."

This statement that she did not realize she was going to be sick for any length of time does not alter the actual situation. The testimony shows that she was directly disabled; that she immediately suffered nausea, sleeplessness; and that severe pain followed her fall and injury. Her belief that her condition would improve and that she could shortly return to work was not justified; she unfortunately continued to be so disabled.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CITY OF NORTH SACRAMENTO v. IRWIN, City Clerk. (Civ. 3688.)★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 1, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 1, 1928.

Mandamus  73(1)—Ordinance extending statutory time for payment of municipal bonds being invalid, city clerk cannot be compelled to sign them (St. 1901, p. 27, § 5, as amended by St. 1913, p. 30).

Ordinance enlarging by one year time fixed by St. 1901, p. 27, § 5, as amended by St. 1913, p. 30, for payment of municipal bonds and interest, being invalid, council was without authority to issue bonds, and city clerk was justified in refusing to sign them, and cannot be compelled to do so by writ of mandate.

Original application by the City of North Sacramento for a writ of mandate to compel W. O. Irwin, as city clerk, to countersign municipal bonds. Peremptory mandate denied.

Chas. L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for petitioner.

W. O. Irwin, pro se.

FINCH, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as city clerk, to countersign municipal bonds in the sum of $15,000, alleged to have been duly authorized by the voters of the petitioner at a special election. The ordinance calling the election recites that:

"It is proposed to incur an indebtedness against the city of North Sacramento in the sum of $15,000 for the construction and completion of the outfall sewer pipe line over and across the American river."

Section 2 of the ordinance provides:

"The term of years the proposed bonds for said improvements are to run shall be as follows: One-tenth part of the whole amount of the principal of said indebtedness created under the said proposition shall be paid each and every year, that is to say: $1,500 of the principal of said bonds shall mature on the 1st day of January of each year beginning with the 1st day of January, 1931, to and including the 1st day of January, 1940."

Section 3 provides:

"The said bonds and each of them shall bear interest at the rate of four and three-fourths (4¾) per cent. per annum, and said interest shall be due and payable on January 1st and July 1st of each year: Provided, however, that the first interest date shall be January 1st, 1930."

The ordinance directing the issuance of the bonds contains provisions to the same effect as those quoted. The proceedings for incurring the indebtedness were taken under the act of 1901. Stats. 1901, p. 27. Section 5 of that act, as amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 30) provides:

"A part to be determined by the legislative body of the municipality, which shall be not less than one-fortieth part of the whole amount of such indebtedness, shall be paid each and every year on a day and date, and at a place or places to be fixed by the legislative body of the municipality issuing the bonds and designated in such bonds, together with interest on all sums unpaid at such date. * * * The bonds * * * shall be payable on the day and at the place or places fixed in such bonds, and with interest at the rate specified in the bonds, which rate shall not be in excess of six per cent. per annum, and shall be payable semiannually."

Adapting the language of the opinion in McAndrew v. Borough of Dunmore, 245 Pa. 101, 91 A. 237, there was no authority in the city council, in disregard of the plain requirements of the statute, to provide that no interest shall be paid prior to January 1, 1930, or that no part of the principal shall be paid prior to January 1, 1931. The departure from the requirements of the statute is substantial and material. If the time of payment fixed by the statute may be enlarged by one year by the ordinance calling the election, it may be extended any number of years, in the discretion of the council. Since the ordinance fails to comply with the requirements of the statute, the council is without authority to issue the bonds. The bonds being invalid, the respondent was justified in refusing to sign them. Hollywood Union High School District v. Keyes, 12 Cal. App. 172, 107 P. 129. See, also, City of San Diego v. Potter, 153 Cal. 288, 296, 95 P. 146;

MAY v. FARRELL et al. (Civ. 6287.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 9, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 8, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 7, 1929.

1. Pleading $\S$ 8(18)—Allegations to effect that while F. was in employment of defendant, and while he was acting in scope of employment, F. negligently operated automobile injuring plaintiff, held to sufficiently show F. was acting within scope of employment.

In action for injuries caused by automobile, allegations that F. was at all times mentioned in complaint an employé and servant of defendant corporation in acting within scope of his employment, and that while he was in employment of defendant, and while he was acting in scope of employment, he was operating upon and along public highway one Chrysler automobile, and that F., while so acting in scope of his employment, so carelessly and negligently drove and operated automobile as to collide with automobile in which plaintiff was riding, held to sufficiently allege that F. was acting within scope of contract of employment.

2. Pleading $\S$ 8(18)—Terms "scope of employment" and "course of employment" are generally regarded as conclusions of facts, and complaint containing such allegations is sufficient.

Terms "scope of employment" and "course of employment" are generally regarded as conclusions of facts, and, under liberal rules of pleading, complaint containing such allegations is sufficient to justify admission of evidence in support thereof.

3. Appeal and error $\S$ 197(3)—Where evidence supplying omissions from complaint was received without objection and issue was submitted, objection to complaint cannot be urged for first time on appeal.

Where evidence tending to supply any omissions from complaint was received without objection and issue was submitted by court's instructions to jury, objection to complaint cannot be urged for first time on appeal.

4. Master and servant $\S$ 316(1)—"Independent contractor" is one who exercises independent employment and represents employer only as to results.

An "independent contractor" is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation and represents his employer only as to results of his work, and not as to means whereby it is to be accomplished.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Independent Contractor.]

5. Master and servant $\S$ 318(1)—In absence of stipulation regarding employer's right to control manner of doing work by employé injuring third party, existence of right must be determined by reasonable inferences from circumstances.

In absence of stipulation as to employer's right to control mode and manner of doing work by employé injuring third party, existence or nonexistence of right must be determined by reasonable inferences to be drawn from circumstances shown from evidence.

6. Master and servant $\S$ 318(1)—Employer's right to terminate employment is circumstance tending to negative independence of employé injuring third party.

Right of employer to terminate employment at any time is circumstance tending to negative independence of employé injuring third party, for which injury employer is sought to be held liable.

7. Automobiles $\S$ 197(7)—That salesman causing automobile accident furnished his own transportation did not affect his status as defendant's employé.

That salesman causing automobile accident in which plaintiff was injured furnished his own transportation did not affect his status as an employé of defendant.

8. Master and servant $\S$ 332(3)—Where relation of employer and employé causing injuries to third party is not created by writing and evidence is conflicting, question whether right to direct manner of doing work was reserved by employer is for jury.

Where relation between employer and one causing injuries to third person is not created by writing and evidence is conflicting or consists of circumstances from which different conclusions might be reasonably drawn, question whether right to direct mode and manner of doing work was reserved by employer is one for jury.

9. Master and servant $\S$ 316(1)—Where employment contract is ambiguous as to whether party injuring third person was independent contractor, resort may be had to parties' construction subsequent to its execution.

Where contract of employment is ambiguous as to whether party employed who injured third person was an independent contractor or an employé, resort may be had to construction put upon it by conduct of parties subsequent to its execution.

10. Automobiles $\S$ 244(26)—Evidence supported jury's finding that salesman injuring third person with automobile was employé of defendant.

In action for injuries caused by automobile, evidence held sufficient to support jury's finding that relation of master and servant existed between defendant and salesman operating automobile at time of injury.

11. Master and servant $\S$ 302(1)—To hold master liable for servant's acts, servant need not be engaged in direct performance of thing which is ultimate object of employment.

In order to hold master liable for servant's acts, it is not necessary that servant be engaged in direct performance of thing which is ultimate object of employment, since included within its scope are those acts which incidentally or indirectly contribute to service.

12. Master and servant $\S$ 302(1)—It was immaterial, in determining question of agency of salesman injuring third person, whether he was going on or returning from master's errand.

Where service was not performed at fixed place, it was immaterial, in determining question of agency of salesman injuring third person, whether he was going upon or returning from an errand undertaken in pursuit of his master's business.

13. Master and servant $\S$ 332(2)—Where evidence raises question whether employé injuring third person was doing acts contributing to service, issue is for jury.

Where evidence raises question whether employé injuring third person was engaged in acts contributing to service, issue is one for jury.

14. Appeal and error $\S$ 1066—Instruction that under statute no one under influence of liquor, or using drugs, shall drive vehicle, held not prejudicial error, where there was evidence of intoxication (Vehicle Act, $\S$ 112, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1421, $\S$ 29).

In action for damages for personal injuries caused by automobile, instruction read from Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) $\S$ 112, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1421, $\S$ 29, to effect that no person under influence of intoxicating liquor, or who is an habitual user of narcotic drugs, shall drive vehicle on public highway, held not prejudicially erroneous, where evidence tended to show driver's actions were influenced by liquor but there was no evidence that he was user of drugs.

15. Trial $\S$ 296(9)—Instruction that jury might consider plaintiff's health before injury, as compared with present condition, held not erroneous as assuming health was impaired by injuries, in view of other instructions.

In action for injuries caused by automobile, instruction that, in determining amount of damages, jury might consider plaintiff's health and condition before injury as compared with his present condition, held not erroneous as assuming that his health had been impaired by injuries, where court also told jury not to construe instructions as indicating court's view of facts, as those were for jury's determination exclusively.

16. Damages $\S$ 216(6)—Instruction jury could consider plaintiff's health before and after accident in determining damages held warrantable.

In action for injuries caused by automobile, instruction that, in determining damages, jury might consider plaintiff's health and condition before injury as compared with his present condition, held proper, where both plaintiff and his wife testified regarding an impairment of plaintiff's health since the accident, and therefore it was question for jury whether his condition was caused by injuries.

17. Damages ⚖️53—In action for injuries, plaintiff's worry over inability to pursue customary avocation was element of damages.

In action for personal injuries, plaintiff's worry over inability to pursue customary avocation was an element of damages which jury might consider.

18. Evidence ⚖️570—Jury was not concluded by physician's expert testimony, but could consider his attitude (Code Civ. Proc. § 1847).

In action for personal injuries, jury was not concluded by testimony of physician testifying as an expert regarding plaintiff's injuries, but could take attitude of witness into consideration under Code Civ. Proc. § 1847.

19. Evidence ⚖️570—Weight of expert witness' testimony was for jury.

In action for injuries, it was for jury to determine weight to be given testimony of physician testifying as expert regarding plaintiff's injuries.

20. Appeal and error ⚖️1004(1)—Jury's verdict cannot be set aside on subject of damages unless it was result of passion or prejudice.

Verdict of jury cannot be set aside on subject of damages, unless so plainly excessive on face of record as to warrant conclusion that it was result of passion or prejudice.

21. Appeal and error ⚖️1004(1)—Awards for personal injuries cannot be held excessive as matter of law because amount is larger than is usually allowed.

Awards for personal injuries cannot be held excessive as matter of law simply because amount may be larger than is ordinarily allowed in such cases.

22. Appeal and error ⚖️932(1)—In considering attack on verdict as excessive, reviewing court must treat conflicts in evidence as resolved in plaintiff's favor.

In considering an attack on verdict as excessive, reviewing court must treat every conflict in evidence as resolved in favor of plaintiff and give him benefit of every inference that can be reasonably drawn in support of his claim.

23. Damages ⚖️132(8)—$10,000 to carpenter 32 years of age receiving injuries making him unable to close hand, causing severe pain, necessitating operation, and affecting his health, held not excessive.

Verdict for $10,000 to plaintiff 32 years of age following trade of carpenter and earning $9 per day before injuries held not excessive, where he sustained, in addition to minor injuries, injuries to hand which made him unable to close his hand because tendons had become shortened and stiff, so that he could not work with safety on roofs or scaffoldings or use hand in nailing or other work necessary in his trade, and where he was confined to hospital for 18 days and suffered severe pain and had operation on hand and wrist and his health deteriorated after accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Curtis W. May against J. W. Emerson Farrell and the Edwards-Merritt Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, the Edwards-Merritt Company appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. Hizar and E. S. Torrance, both of San Diego, for appellant.

P. M. Andrews and Allen E. Rogers, both of San Diego, for respondent.

CASHIN, J. An action against defendants J. W. Emerson Farrell and Edwards-Merritt Co., a corporation, to recover damages for personal injuries. After a trial by a jury on the issues presented by the answer of the corporation, defendant Farrell having failed to answer, a verdict was returned against both defendants, and from the judgment entered thereon the corporation has appealed.

The testimony shows that at 5 o'clock p. m. on March 27, 1925, the plaintiff was injured while riding in an automobile owned and operated by L. E. Ryan. The injuries complained of were brought about by an automobile operated by defendant Farrell, which approached from the rear, striking the Ryan car, and caused the same to overturn.

It was claimed by the plaintiff that at the time of the accident Farrell was employed by appellant and acting within the scope of his employment. Appellant, which was a dealer in automobiles with its place of business in San Diego, denied the employment, and sought to show that for some time previous to the accident Farrell's only connection with the company had been that of an independent contractor, and that this relation ceased on the morning of the day the accident occurred.

[1-3] As ground for reversal it is first claimed that the complaint failed to state a cause of action against the corporation, in that no facts are pleaded showing that Farrell was acting within the scope of any contract of employment. In this connection it was alleged that Farrell was at all the times mentioned in the complaint an employé and servant of the corporation and acting within the scope of his employment, and, further, that—

"While he was in the employment of Edwards-Merritt Co., the said corporation, and while he was acting in the scope of said employment, he was operating and driving upon and along the said public highway one Chrysler automobile, and that said J. W. Emerson Farrell while so acting in the scope of his employment so carelessly and negligently drove and operated said Chrysler automobile" as to collide with the automobile in which the plaintiff was riding, causing the injuries and damage complained of.

We think the allegations were sufficient. No cases holding otherwise have been called to our attention except those instances where the acts charged, being ordinarily outside the scope of the servant's employment, were presumptively independent torts; for example, assaults upon third persons (Letts v. Hoboken R. W. & S. O. Co., 70 N. J. Law, 358, 57 A. 392; Thomas v. McGuinness, 94 Ill. App. 248; Davis v. Houghtellin, 33 Neb. 582, 50 N. W. 765, 14 L. R. A. 737; Campbell v. Northern Pac. Ry. Co., 51 Minn. 488, 53 N. W. 768; Smith v. Louisville, E. & St. L. Ry. Co., 124 Ind. 394, 24 N. E. 753); or, as in Snyder v. Hannibal & St. Joseph R. R. Co., 60 Mo. 413, cited by appellant, where children were invited and permitted to jump on and off the cars of a railway company, in which cases it was held that responsibility is not made to appear merely by an allegation that the servant in doing the act was acting within the scope of his authority. As held in Kuhl v. U. S. Health & Accident Ins. Co., 112 Minn. 197, 127 N. W. 628, the terms "scope of employment" and "course of employment," like negligence, are now generally regarded as conclusions of fact, and under liberal rules of pleading a complaint containing such allegations is sufficient to justify the admission of evidence in support thereof. As was said in Hains v. Parkersburg, M. & I. Ry., 71 W. Va. 453, 76 S. E. 843, "to require a specification * * * of * * * the particular duties with which" the servant "is charged, would impose upon the plaintiff more than is necessary for the accomplishment of the office and purpose of the" complaint—a "duty to allege matters lying peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendant and often beyond that of the plaintiff." And as held in Goldstein v. Healy, 187 Cal. 206, 201 P. 462, less particularity is required where the defendant, from the nature of and his relation to the facts, has full information concerning them. Moreover, in the present case no question as to the sufficiency of the complaint in this or other respects was raised by demurrer or at the trial. Evidence tending to supply any omissions from the complaint was received without objection, and the issue was submitted by the court's instructions to the jury. Under such circumstances an objection to the complaint cannot be urged for the first time on appeal. Greiss v. St. Investment & Ins. Co., 98 Cal. 241, 33 P. 195; Treanor v. Houghton, 103 Cal. 53, 36 P. 1081; Abner Doble Co. v. Keystone, etc., Co., 145 Cal. 490, 495, 78 P. 1050; Northwestern Mut. Fire Ass'n v. Pacific Wharf & Storage Co., 187 Cal. 38, 200 P. 934; Stewart v. Erskine-Bolst, 66 Cal. App. 461, 226 P. 644.

It is further contended that the evidence was insufficient to support a finding that the relation of master and servant existed. The evidence shows without conflict that Farrell, who was a salesman, had up to the day of the accident been engaged in selling automobiles for appellant. It was testified by him that at the time of the accident he, with Ray

Harrison, who had also been appellant's salesman, were returning to San Diego from Pacific Beach, where they had gone for the purpose of visiting prospective customers. He further testified that he was then in the employ of the appellant, receiving for his services as a salesman both a salary and a commission, and denied that he was discharged therefrom until after the accident. According to its president, Farrell upon the day of the accident had been employed by appellant as a salesman on commission only, and was discharged from his employment on the morning of that day. The testimony of its sales manager was to the same effect, each of these witnesses testifying that Farrell had previously received a salary, which ceased on March 1, 1925, and that after his discharge he was re-employed on April 10 of the same year. It further appears that Farrell with other salesmen was required to report at a fixed hour each morning and attend a daily sales meeting at the office of the company. In this connection the president of appellant, in response to a question on cross-examination as to whether Farrell in the conduct of his work could use his own time, gave the following answer: "No. All of our men have to report every morning to the sales manager just the same as if they are working on salary," and further stated that if they failed to report they would be discharged. According to these statements, in addition to requiring reports and attendance at sales meetings, appellant further sought to control the conduct of its salesmen in other respects; the grounds for the action taken in Farrell's case, according to the testimony, being his failure to report and also his indulgence in intoxicants on occasions immediately preceding his discharge. It was further shown from the record sheet produced by the sales manager that but one commission was earned by Farrell during the month of March, and that this was paid. In addition to this, however, the payment to him of additional sums was shown which, according to the witness, were loans or advances. One of these amounts was paid on April 4, 1925, after the date when it was claimed that Farrell was discharged and before the date of his claimed re-employment. In his work Farrell used for demonstration purposes an automobile which he had purchased and partially paid for under a sales agreement with appellant, the title to the car being retained by the latter.

[4] The above comprises substantially the evidence from which the jury concluded that Farrell was a servant and not an independent contractor. An independent contractor is one who in rendering service exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to the results of his work and not as to the means whereby it is to be accomplished (Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 P. 337; Moody v. Ind. Acc. Comm.

[Cal. Sup.] 269 P. 542); and when the essential object of the employment is the performance of the work the relation of master and servant does not exist unless the employer retains the right to direct the mode and manner in which the work shall be done (Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 P. 721). As was held in Western Metal Supply Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 407, 156 P. 491, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 390, the real test is to ascertain whether the employé was subject to the employer's orders and control and was liable to be discharged for disobedience or misconduct; and the fact that a certain amount of freedom of action is inherent in the nature of the work does not change the character of the employment where the employer has general supervision and control over it. Cameron v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 83, 159 P. 149; Sumner v. Nevin, 4 Cal. App. 347, 87 P. 1105.

[5] In the present case the contract of employment was oral, and, so far as shown, no express stipulation as to the right of the employer to control the mode and manner of doing the work was made. In the absence of such stipulation the existence or nonexistence of the right must be determined by reasonable inferences to be drawn from the circumstances shown by the evidence (Press Pub. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 190 Cal. 114, 210 P. 820); and in that connection certain facts have been held to possess an inferential significance. While the tendency of modern decisions is not to regard the manner of paying for the work done as decisive, this nevertheless is a circumstance bearing upon the question. Corbin v. American Mills, 27 Conn. 274, 71 Am. Dec. 63; Ruehl v. Lidgerwood, 23 N. D. 6, 135 N. W. 793, L. R. A. 1918C, 1063, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 680; Indiana Iron Co. v. Cray, 19 Ind. App. 565, 48 N. E. 808; Williams v. National Cash Register Co., 157 Ky. 836, 164 S. W. 112; Buckley v. Harkens, 114 Wash. 468, 195 P. 250; Dishman v. Whitney, 121 Wash. 157, 209 P. 12, 29 A. L. R. 460; 1 Thompson, Negligence, §§ 579, 626. As said in the note to Chicago, R. I. & Pac. Ry. Co. v. Bennett, 36 Okl. 358, 128 P. 705, 20 A. L. R. 678:

"It has been laid down that 'the manner of payment of the contractor, whether it be by the day, or in a lump sum, is not a material factor in determining the relation between the parties,' and that it does not matter 'whether the contractor is to be compensated by a lump sum, or a commission on the cost, or a per diem payment.' But it is manifest from the decisions that these sweeping statements need some qualification. The correct doctrine, so far as it can be expressed in general phraseology, is this: That the mode of payment is an element which has some bearing upon the question whether the person employed was an independent contractor, but does not afford a decisive test of the nature of his relationship to the employer."

[6-8] Another circumstance tending to negative the independence of the employé is the right of the employer to terminate the employment at any time. Press Pub. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., supra; Brown v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 174 Cal. 457, 163 P. 664. The fact that the salesman furnished his own transportation did not affect his status as an employé (Press Pub. Co. v. I. A. C., supra; Eng-Skell v. I. A. C., 44 Cal. App. 210, 186 P. 163); and where the relation is not created by a writing and the evidence is conflicting or consists of circumstances from which different conclusions might reasonably be drawn, the question whether the right to direct the mode and manner of doing the work was reserved by the employer is one for the jury (Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 127 P. 50; Sacchi v. Bayside Lumber Co., 13 Cal. App. 72, 108 P. 885).

[9, 10] In Barton v. Studebaker Corporation, etc., 46 Cal. App. 707, 189 P. 1025, it was held that an automobile salesman employed on a commission basis with no salary and no fixed hours, and over whom the company exercised no authoritative control, was an independent contractor for whose negligent acts the company was not liable. In the present case, however, there was testimony—which other evidence tended to corroborate—that at the time of the accident a salary as well as a commission was being paid, and evidence that the hours of the salesman were regulated to the extent which the character of the employment made reasonably possible. It also appears that the employer with the acquiescence of the salesman claimed and exercised the right of discharge. Where a contract of employment is ambiguous as to whether the party employed was an independent contractor or an employé, resort may be had to the construction put upon it by the conduct of the parties subsequent to its execution (Porter v. Withers Est. Co., 201 Mo. App. 27, 210 S. W. 109); and from all the circumstances shown an inference was not unreasonable that, subject to the freedom of action inherent in the nature of the work, it was understood that the right to direct the manner in which the same should be done was reserved by the employer. The question was properly submitted to the jury (Buckley v. Harkens, supra; Dishman v. Whitney, supra; Majors v. Connor, 162 Cal. 131, 121 P. 371), and we cannot say that its conclusion was unsupported.

[11-13] It is further claimed that the evidence was insufficient to show that Farrell at the time of the accident was performing a service for appellant. According to his testimony he was returning to San Diego after a visit to a prospective customer at Pacific Beach. It is not contended that the trip to the latter place would not have been within the course of his employment as a servant, but that the accident having occurred while returning to San Diego he was not then representing or engaged in the business of his employer.

In order to hold a master liable it is not necessary that his servant should be engaged in the direct performance of the thing which is the ultimate object of the employment, for also included within its scope are those acts which incidentally or indirectly contribute to the service. Kish v. Cal., etc., Auto Ass'n, 190 Cal. 246, 212 P. 27. Where the service is not performed at a fixed place, it might properly be held, as was suggested in the above case, that the day's employment commenced at the hour in the morning when the servant reported for duty, and terminated upon his return in the evening; and it is immaterial in determining the question of agency whether he was going upon or returning from an errand undertaken in pursuit of his master's business (Brimberry v. Dudfield Lumber Co., 183 Cal. 455, 191 P. 894; Jedlicka v. Shackelford [Mo. App.] 270 S. W. 125), it being sufficient, as above stated, that he was engaged in acts contributing to the service; and where the evidence raises the question whether he was so engaged the issue is one for the jury (Tuttle v. Dodge, 80 N. H. 304, 116 A. 627; J. R. High Hardware Co. v. Garlitz [Tex. Civ. App.] 265 S. W. 1059; Dillon v. Prudential Ins. Co., 75 Cal. App. 266, 242 P. 736).

[14] Appellant also contends that certain of the court's instructions were prejudicially erroneous. The court read to the jury that portion of the Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, § 112, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1421, § 29) which provides that—

"No person who is under the influence of intoxicating liquor or who is an habitual user of narcotic drugs shall drive a vehicle on any public highway within this state. * * *

It is urged that none of the evidence tended to show that Farrell at the time of the accident was under the influence of liquor or was a user of drugs. This is true as to the use of drugs, but evidence was adduced by appellant by which it sought to show the use of intoxicants during the several days immediately preceding the accident, and Farrell on cross-examination admitted such use on the evening previous to the accident. This, with evidence showing his reckless driving on the latter occasion, tended in some degree to show that his actions were influenced by liquor. These facts were relevant on the question of negligence, and the first portion of the instruction was not improper. While the latter portion was inapplicable, it cannot reasonably be said to have confused the jury to the prejudice of appellant. Dillon v. Prudential Ins. Co., supra.

[15, 16] Appellant further complains that the instruction by which the jury was told that, in determining the amount of damages, they might consider plaintiff's health and condition before the injury as compared with his present condition, assumed as a fact that his health had been impaired by the injuries alleged; and, further, that the instruction was improper in that no evidence was adduced from which the fact might reasonably be found. While such assumption might be implied if the instruction stood alone, the jury was also told not to construe the instructions as indicating the court's view of the facts, as these were for their determination exclusively. Furthermore, there was testimony by both the plaintiff and his wife indicating an impairment of his health since the accident. Whether this condition was caused thereby was a question for the jury, and the instruction was properly given.

[17] The giving of the following instruction is also assigned as error:

"You are instructed that worry over inability to pursue a customary avocation is an element of damages which may be taken into consideration."

That mental suffering occasioned by plaintiff's apprehension of future disability was caused by the injury was shown by his testimony and that of his wife. In view of such evidence the instruction was proper. Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134; Boa v. San Francisco, etc., Rys., 182 Cal. 93, 187 P. 2; Ryan v. Oakland Gas, etc., Co., 21 Cal. App. 14, 26, 130 P. 693.

[18-23] It is further claimed that the amount awarded as damages, viz., $10,000, was excessive, and shows that the verdict was the result of passion or prejudice. The testimony discloses that the plaintiff was 32 years of age, that he had a wife and family and was by trade a carpenter, which calling he had followed for some years, his wages at the time of the accident being $9 a day. By reason of the accident, in addition to minor injuries, all of the extensor tendons connecting with the thumb and fingers of his left hand, with the exception of the two connecting the small finger, were severed. He was confined to the county hospital for 18 days, during which time he suffered severe pain, and an operation on his hand and wrist was performed. According to his testimony and that of his wife, his health deteriorated after the accident, and he has since suffered from an affection of the heart, in addition to which, as stated above, the evidence shows that mental suffering was occasioned by his apprehension of future disability. The plaintiff further testified that he was unable to close his hand, owing to the fact that the tendons had become shortened and stiff; it being for that reason impossible for him with safety to work upon roofs or scaffoldings, or to use his hand in nailing or other work necessary in his trade. A physician, who was in attendance upon plaintiff at the county hospital, testified that the hand had 90 per cent. flexion, that the plaintiff had practically full use of the wrist and 70 to 80 per cent. use of the thumb, but that in his opinion the thumb would cause disability as a carpenter, and the hand as a unit would never be as good as before the injury. The last witness was the only physician who testified as to conditions existing at the time of the trial or whose opinion was asked as to the probable outcome of the injury. It is apparent from the record that his testimony was given reluctantly, and the conclusion was not unreasonable that with respect to the plaintiff he was not altogether a friendly witness. The jury was entitled to take the attitude of the witness into consideration (Code Civ. Proc., § 1847), and although testifying as an expert, the jury was not concluded thereby (Spencer v. Collins, 156 Cal. 298, 307, 104 P. 320, 20 Ann. Cas. 49; Linforth v. San Francisco Gas & Electric Co., 156 Cal. 58, 103 P. 320, 19 Ann. Cas. 1230; In re Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 P. 794); and it was for them to determine the weight to be given his testimony (Dunphy v. Dunphy, 161 Cal. 380, 119 P. 512, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 1230; Barnum v. Bridges, 81 Cal. 604, 22 P. 924). It is the rule that the verdict of the jury cannot be set aside on the subject of damages unless so plainly excessive on the face of the record as to warrant the conclusion that it was the result of passion or prejudice. Perry v. Angelus Hospital Ass'n, 172 Cal. 311, 156 P. 449; Anstead v. Pac. Gas. & Elec. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 487. There is no absolute rule for determining whether a verdict is excessive (Morgan v. Southern Pac. Co., 95 Cal. 501, 30 P. 601), and awards for personal injuries cannot be so held as a matter of law simply because the amount may be larger than is ordinarily allowed in such cases (James v. Oakland Traction Co., 10 Cal. App. 785, 103 P. 1082). As was said in Zibell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 254, 116 P. 513, 520:

"The only means of discovering the existence of passion and prejudice as influencing a verdict is by comparing the amount of the verdict with the evidence before the trial court. To say that a verdict has been influenced by passion and prejudice is but another way of saying that the verdict exceeds any amount justified by the evidence."

The question in the first instance is for the trial court, which in the present case denied a motion for a new trial on the above ground; and "in considering an attack upon a verdict as excessive, the [reviewing] court must treat every conflict in the evidence as resolved in favor of the respondent, and must give to him the benefit of every inference that can reasonably be drawn in support of his claim." Kimic v. San Jose-Los Gatos, etc., Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 273, 104 P. 312.

The injuries in the present case were similar in character, and extent to those received by the plaintiff in Perry v. Angelus Hospital Ass'n, supra., wherein an award of $11,500 was sustained; and after a review of the evidence before us we cannot say that they were not in view of the circumstances such as to justify the verdict of the jury. Furthermore, no error has been shown which supports the conclusion that the trial resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

TRIPP v. BOARD OF FIRE AND POLICE PENSION COM'RS OF CITY OF FRESNO et al. (Civ. 6441.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1928.

1. Mandamus ☞174—In proceeding to compel payment of fireman's pension, finding regarding plaintiff not being injured in discharge of duties held broad enough to cover matter of foot infection.

In proceeding for writ of mandamus to compel payment of pension to disabled fireman, finding that plaintiff's physical disability was not caused by reason of any bodily injury received in, or by any sickness caused by or result of any bodily injury received in discharge of duties as fireman held broad enough to cover matter of foot infection, if incorporated in petition by amendment, which, however, was never actually prepared and filed.

2. Municipal corporations ☞200—Under charter provision, fireman held not entitled to pension where disability occurred during time he was fireman, but not by reason of employment.

Under charter provision, providing for pension for firemen "who have been disabled or become superannuated in services of city," fireman was not entitled to pension where disability occurred during period of time he was employed as fireman, but not by reason of such employment.

3. Municipal corporations ☞200—Ordinance relating to firemen's pensions held not to illegally restrict provisions of city charter on subject; "disabled in service of city;" "superannuated in service of city."

Ordinance providing pension for firemen who shall become physically disabled by reason of bodily injury received in, or by reason of, sickness caused by discharge of duties of such person, held not to illegally restrict Fresno charter provision, section 26, providing for pension for firemen "who have been disabled or become superannuated in service of city," since phrase, "disabled in service of city," means "disabled by reason of bodily injuries received in or by reason of sickness caused by discharge of duties of such person," and "superannuated in service of city" includes age one acquires during his daily off duty periods as well as his hours of labor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action for a writ of mandate to compel payment of a pension by W. F. Tripp against the Board of Fire and Police Pension Commissioners of the City of Fresno, County of Fresno, and others. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Gallaher & Jertberg, of Fresno, for appellant.

Loren A. Butts, City Atty., of Fresno, for respondents.

KOFORD, P. J. Appellant prosecuted this proceeding in the superior court for a writ of mandamus compelling respondents to allow and pay appellant a pension as a disabled fireman of the city of Fresno. The petition alleged that appellant had been a regular member of the fire department from 1918 to 1927; that, under the terms of the city charter and ordinance passed in pursuance of said charter, appellant was entitled to a pension because his duties as a fireman exposed him to smallpox in the neighborhood of the firehouse to which he was assigned in 1924, and exposed him to influenza in 1925 and again in 1927, both of which diseases he contracted, and by reason of having contracted said diseases appellant was rendered physically unable to discharge his duties as fireman. At the trial in the superior court, appellant also testified that, while fighting a fire in 1926, he injured his foot, which resulted in a serious infection. Upon objection being made that this was outside the pleadings, appellant's counsel stated:

"Mr. Gallaher: I ask at this time to amend by inserting in connection with the paragraph that recites infection from smallpox and influenza, also an injury received to the left foot which resulted in an infection."

The court stated: "Very well, you may amend."

No actual written amendment was made, filed, or presented.

The superior court made its findings and judgment in favor of respondents, specifically finding, following the language of the petition, that the influenza and smallpox attacks which appellant had suffered were not contracted by him in the performance of his duties as fireman. The court also found in finding No. VI:

"The court further finds that plaintiff's physical disability was not caused by reason of any bodily injury received in, or by any sickness caused by, or the result of any bodily injury received in, or the result of any sickness caused by, the discharge of the duties of plaintiff as a member of the Fire Department of the City of Fresno."

[1] Appellant claims the court erred in not making a finding concerning the foot infection above referred to. We see no merit in this contention. If it be conceded that the court was obliged to make a finding on an amendment that was never actually prepared and filed, still the court could not be expected to be more specific than the amendment itself. Finding No. VI, however, is broad enough to cover the matter if incorporated in the petition by amendment, and finds upon the material and ultimate facts thus alleged.

Appellant apparently recognizes as binding on us the findings and decision of the court to the effect that appellant's disability was not caused by or in the performance of his duties as a fireman. The testimony showed his disability was caused by a hypertrophic attack of arthritis of the spine, and, while the cause of this was a matter of some conflict in the testimony of the expert witnesses, the court evidently took the view that it was caused by focal infection of the teeth or tonsils or by causes having no relation to or bearing upon his occupation or duties as fireman.

[2-5] Appellant upon this appeal contends that under the provisions of the city charter the pension should be forthcoming because it is undeniable from the evidence that his disability occurred, if not by reason of his employment, nevertheless while or during the period of time he was in such employment. Section 3 of the city ordinance, which is alleged and relied on in the petition of the appellant, provides a pension for any fireman who "shall become physically disabled by reason of bodily injuries received in, or by reason of sickness caused by, the discharge of the duties of such person," etc. It is claimed that this ordinance illegally restricts and limits the provisions of the city charter under which it was enacted; that the ordinance should not say "received in or caused by the discharge of duties" when the charter says "disabled or become superannuated in the service of the city." Section 26 of the Fresno Charter provides:

"The City Commission shall by ordinance provide for and establish a fund or funds for the relief and pensioning of members of the Police and Fire Departments who have been disabled or become superannuated in the service of the city, and shall provide for the administration of such fund or funds."

It is pointed out that section 2 of the same ordinance provides old age pensions under the authority of this same charter provision after 20, 25, and 30 years' service, respectively, in the department, without providing that such superannuation shall be caused by such service.

We do not see the same inconsistency in this that appellant professes to see. The language in the charter must be interpreted in its ordinary meaning and in accordance with the legislative intention. Black on Interpretation of Laws, c. V. The contention is for an interpretation which would entitle a fireman of one day's service to be retired upon a pension for permanent disability caused by sickness having no relation whatever to his employment, because disabled or superannuated while in the service. Such a radical departure from ordinary pensioning laws is not to be assumed to be the legislative intent without direct language to that effect. "Disabled in the service of the city" is properly understood to mean "disabled by reason of bodily injuries received in, or by reason of sickness caused by the discharge of the duties of such person." "Superannuated in the service of the city" is properly understood to include the age one acquires during his daily off duty periods as well as his hours of labor.

In State v. Board of Trustees, 192 Mo. App. 583, 184 S. W. 929, the expression "while in such service" was held not to mean "while a member of the fire department," so that, where a fireman was killed while off duty, his widow was not entitled to a pension under similar laws.

The appellant, having failed to prove a case within the terms of the ordinance pleaded, was properly denied the writ.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HODGES et al. (L. A. 10777.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 10, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨125—Judgment against surety on forfeiture of bail bonds, providing for summary judgment, held consent judgment, and not appealable (Pen. Code, §§ 1305, 1306, amended by St. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386; § 1278, amended by St. 1927, p. 1387).

Judgment entered in accordance with Pen. Code, §§ 1305, 1306, amended by St. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386, following on forfeiture of bail bonds furnished by surety company under St. 1927, p. 1387, amending Pen. Code, § 1278, to secure release of defendants, which bond provided for summary judgment against surety on forfeiture, held consent judgment, from which an appeal will not lie.

2. Bail ⇨77(2)—Judgment against surety under certified copy of minutes of court forfeiting bail bond held properly entered in name of county without notice (Pen. Code, § 1278, amended by St. 1927, p. 1387; §§ 1305, 1306, amended by St. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386).

Where defendant surety furnished bail bonds under Pen. Code, § 1278, amended by St. 1927, p. 1387, to secure release of defendants, which bonds provided for summary judgment against surety on forfeiture of bonds, judgment entered without notice in name of real party in interest, county of Los Angeles, following forfeiture of bond, was properly entered under Pen. Code, §§ 1305, 1306, amended by St. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386, where certified copy of minutes of forfeiting court was introduced before court entering judgment which was sufficient without formal written order of forfeiture.

3. Bail ⇨90—After judgment on forfeited bail bond, it is presumed order of forfeiture was regularly entered; surety being required to move to discharge forfeiture within 90 days (Pen. Code, §§ 1305, 1306, amended by St. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386).

Where judgment was entered against surety on bail bonds after forfeiture in accordance with Pen. Code, §§ 1305, 1306, amended by St. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386, it is presumed in support of judgment that order of forfeiture was regularly entered, and surety could not complain that bonds were improperly forfeited, but should have moved within 90 days allowed by section 1305 to discharge order of forfeiture if improperly made.

Action by the People against W. P. Hodges and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Seaboard Surety Corporation of America appeals. On motion to dismiss appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Arthur T. Stollmack, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Everett W. Mattoon and S. V. O. Prichard, both of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is a motion to dismiss an appeal prosecuted by the defendant surety company from a judgment entered in accordance with the provisions of sections 1305 and 1306 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927 (Stats. 1927, pp. 1385, 1386), following upon the forfeiture of certain bail bonds furnished by the appellant under the provisions of section 1278 of the same Code (Stats. 1927, p. 1387), to secure the release of the defendants Hodges and Loeb. Each of the bonds so forfeited provided that:

"If the forfeiture of this bond be ordered by the court, judgment may be summarily made and entered forthwith against the said Seaboard Surety Corporation of America and the said defendant, if he be a party to the bond, for the amount of their respective undertakings herein, as provided by sections 1305 and 1306 of the Penal Code."

Respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the judgment from which it is attempted to be taken is a consent judgment, from which an appeal will not lie. With this contention we are in complete accord. Hotchkiss v. Superior Court (Cal. Sup.) 269 P. 524; Erlanger v. S. P. Co., 109 Cal. 395, 42 P. 31; La Société Française, etc., v. Beardslee, 63 Cal. 160; Judnick v. Judnick, 47 Cal. App. 380, 382, 190 P. 480; People v. Perneti, 95 App. Div. 510, 88 N. Y. S. 714. The case of People v. Perneti, supra, presented a situation practically identical with the one now before us, and the court there held that an appeal would not lie.

[2, 3] Appellant's contention that the judgment was irregularly entered is without merit. It was properly entered, without notice, in the name of the real party in interest, viz., the county of Los Angeles (People v. De Pelanconi, 63 Cal. 409), and finds ample support in the minutes of the court declaring the forfeiture, a certified copy of which was introduced before the court entering the judgment. The introduction of a certified copy of the minutes or docket of the forfeiting court constituted, in our opinion, a sufficient compliance with the provisions of sections 1305 and 1306 of the Penal Code, for neither section requires the making of a formal written order of forfeiture. It is now too late for the appellant to complain that the bonds were improperly forfeited. People v. Perneti, supra, p. 717 of 88 N. Y. S. (95 App. Div. 510). Appellant should have moved, within the 90-day period allowed by section 1305, to discharge the order of forfeiture if improperly made. It will now be presumed in support of the judgment that the order was regularly entered.

The appeal is dismissed.

SMITH v. ANGLO-CALIFORNIA TRUST CO. et al. (S. F. 12685.) *

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Mortgages $\S$ 151(3)—Trust deed securing land purchaser's note for building loan, held prior to mechanics' liens for work done and materials furnished after deed was recorded.

Securities company, granting real estate purchaser's application for building loan in certain sum, accepting his promissory note in such amount secured by trust deed to take precedence of purchase-money deeds of trust, and opening building loan account in his name, held to have obligated itself to advance or pay to him or on his behalf the full amount thereof, so as to give priority to such deed over mechanics' liens for work commenced and materials furnished after recording deed.

2. Mortgages $\S$ 151(3)—Trust deed, recorded before commencement of work and furnishing of materials, for consideration passing thereafter, is superior to mechanics' liens, where advances are obligatory.

Where consideration for mortgage or deed of trust, recorded before commencement of work or furnishing of materials for which mechanics' liens are claimed, does not pass until afterward, and making of advances by mortgagee or beneficiary is obligatory, the lien of such instrument is prior and superior to mechanics' liens; it being a lien for whole sum advanced from time of its execution and recordation, not for each separate advancement from time thereof.

3. Trusts $\S$ 1—Mechanics' lien claimants cannot enforce on theory of trust pro tanto payment from undisbursed balance of building loan by lender not obligated to see to application of money advanced.

Security company being under no obligation by virtue of its contract with purchaser of realty to see to application of money advanced by it for building purposes, mechanics' lien claimants, knowing or charged with knowledge of recorded incumbrances, cannot enforce payment of their claims pro tanto from undisbursed balance in building loan account by virtue of any declared or implied trust, though loan was obtained for express purpose of improving property according to plans submitted with application, as they must have relied on such agreement as to amount to be advanced.

4. Contracts $\S$ 187(1)—Promisor must clearly manifest intent to benefit third party to entitle latter to sue on promise (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1559).

To give a third party, who may derive a benefit from the performance of a promise, an action thereon, there must have been an intent clearly manifested by promisor to secure some benefit to the third party, under Civ. Code, $\S$ 1559.

5. Liens $\S$ 7—Mechanics' lien claimants held equitably entitled to liens on undisbursed balance of building loan secured by trust deed prior to trust deeds securing entire purchase price of land.

Parties performing labor and furnishing materials for construction of houses, completed in substantial compliance with plans and specifications submitted to securities company with application by purchaser of realty for loan obtained only by giving trust deed prior to deeds of trust securing entire purchase price, held equitably entitled to lien on undisbursed balance in building loan account, especially where realty proved of but little value on sale under purchase-money deeds.

6. Estoppel $\S$ 52—Object of equitable estoppel is prevention of unconscientious and inequitable assertion or enforcement of claims.

The foundation of equitable estoppel is justice and good conscience; its object being to prevent unconscientious and inequitable assertion or enforcement of claims or rights, which might have existed or been enforceable by other rules of law unless prevented by estoppel, and its effect to create and vest opposing rights in party benefited from motives of equity and fair dealing.

7. Executors and administrators $\S$ 38—Undisbursed balance of building loan held not part of deceased borrower's estate but disburseable pro rata among mechanics' lien claimants.

Undisbursed balance of building loan to purchaser of realty did not become part of his estate at his death, so as to charge it with claims of general creditors, but should be paid into court for disbursement pro rata among persons legally and satisfactorily establishing their mechanics' lien claims against realty.

8. Estoppel §110—Equitable estoppel need not be specially pleaded.

The rule that estoppel, to be available as defense, must be specially pleaded, does not apply, where agreed statement of facts discloses special circumstances giving rise to equitable estoppel.

9. Appeal and error §1173(2)—Nonappealing mechanics' lien claimants cannot benefit from partial reversal of adverse judgment on other claimants' appeal.

Mechanics' lien claimants, not appealing from judgment adversely disposing of asserted severable rights and interests of respective claimants in certain fund by separate paragraphs, are in no position to derive any benefit for reversal of judgment in part, as appealing claimants could appeal only from portions of judgment affecting them, despite statement in notice of appeal that appeal is from whole judgment.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Mary H. Smith, administratrix of the estate of Calvin M. Smith, deceased, against the Anglo-California Securities Company, in which the Anglo-California Trust Company, J. H. McCallum and others, doing business under the name and style of the Western Furniture Manufacturing Company, and others, were made parties defendant on defendant's motion. From the judgment rendered, defendants McCallum and others appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part, with directions.

B. S. Gregory, Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche and Harry F. Sullivan, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Milton Marks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by certain of the above-named defendants from a judgment entered for the plaintiff in an action instituted to recover the sum of $4,090 from the defendant Anglo-California Securities Company. The action was tried upon an agreed statement of facts and upon the testimony of but one witness. It appears that Calvin M. Smith, now deceased, had entered into an agreement on or about May 10, 1926, with the A. J. Galbraith Realty Company, wherein and whereby the former agreed to purchase and the latter to sell for a total purchase price of $4,500 five lots or parcels of real property situate in the city and county of San Francisco. On June 26, 1926, and in furtherance of said agreement, the purchaser took title and executed and delivered to the seller, in payment of the agreed purchase price of said lots, his five several promissory notes, each in the sum of $900. As security for these purchase-money notes Smith, at the same time, executed and delivered five separate deeds of trust covering the lots so purchased by him. In the interim between Smith's agreement to purchase and the final consummation of the transaction, application was made by him to the Anglo-California Securities Company for a building loan with which, if granted, it was intended to improve the property. The securities company, after investigation and appraisal by its agent, granted to Smith a loan of $20,000. He gave to the securities company his promissory note in such sum, and, as security therefor, executed and delivered a deed of trust covering the five lots. This latter deed of trust, which named the Anglo-California Trust Company as trustee, was thereafter recorded on the same day as the several trust deeds executed and delivered as security for the payment of the purchase price of the lots. In the agreed statement of facts upon which, as we have said, the cause was tried, it is conceded by all parties to the action that the purchase-money trust deeds were intended to be, and are, subordinate to the trust deed delivered to the securities company as security for its loan granted for improvement purposes. It might also be said in passing that the securities company, upon the granting of the loan, opened in Smith's name a building loan account in the sum of $20,000, against which, as disclosed by the testimony of the sole witness in the case, checks were drawn and issued to Smith as the improvement work progressed. The construction of the buildings upon the five lots was practically completed on or about October 10, 1926, at which time there remained undisbursed in the building loan account the sum of $4,090. Within a few days after the completion of the buildings, Smith died, and his surviving widow, the plaintiff herein, was duly and regularly appointed administratrix of his estate. Several mechanics' lien claims, totaling approximately $5,633.30, were filed against the property for labor and materials furnished in the course of the construction work. The claimants of such liens made demand upon the securities company, after Smith's death, to withhold from the undisbursed funds in the building loan account sufficient to pay and discharge their claims. Proceedings looking to the foreclosure of such mechanics' lien claims were thereafter instituted and are apparently still pending and undisposed of. On April 9, 1927, the five lots were sold to the defendant Roth under and by virtue of the power of sale contained in the deeds of trust delivered to secure the several promissory notes executed by Smith in payment of the purchase price. After such sale there remained a deficiency upon the purchase-money notes totaling $2,441.75. By an assignment, the defendant McCallum is now the owner of all rights under the purchase-money notes and deeds of trust.

The instant action was brought by the administratrix of Smith's estate to recover from the securities company the balance of $4,090 remaining undisbursed in the building loan account existing in her intestate's name. Upon motion of the defendant Anglo-California Trust Company an order was made by the trial court, bringing into the action as parties defendant all persons asserting any interest in or lien upon the real property or advancing any claim to the money balance remaining in the building loan account. Each of the many defendants answered, and, as already stated, the cause went to trial upon an agreed statement of facts and the testimony of one witness.

The court below found the facts substantially as stated herein, and as conclusions of law therefrom declared that the plaintiff, as administratrix, was entitled to judgment against the Anglo-California Securities Company in the sum of $4,090; that the defendants Anglo-California Securities Company and Anglo-California Trust Company were entitled to a judgment and decree declaring the deed of trust delivered to the latter as trustee for the former to be a first charge or lien upon the real property and superior to the adverse claims of all the other defendants. It was also decreed that such other defendants were not entitled to a lien upon the sum of $4,090, for which amount judgment was directed for the plaintiff, remaining undisbursed in the building loan account. Thereafter judgment was entered in conformity with these findings of fact and conclusions of law. The defendants Anglo-California Securities Company and the Anglo-California Trust Company and several of the mechanics' lien claimants have not appealed. However, the appeal of the other defendants presents for consideration the correctness of the trial court's determination of the issues presented by this litigation.

[1,2] An examination of the authorities satisfies us that the court below did not err when it decreed the trust deed in favor of the Anglo-California Securities Company to be a first and prior charge upon the property described therein. It was apparently agreed by those concerned that this instrument was to take precedence over the purchase-money deeds of trust recorded concurrently therewith. In our opinion, the securities company, by granting Smith's application for a building loan in the sum of $20,000, accepting his promissory note in that amount secured by deed of trust, and opening in his name a building loan account, became obligated to advance or pay to Smith, or on his behalf, the full sum of $20,000. Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, 2 Cal. App. 288, 290, 291, 84 P. 58. In other words, the amount payable by the securities company under the terms of the loan agreement was not an undetermined or optional amount, but was at all times capable of definite ascertainment. The authorities, both in this state and elsewhere, are legion to the effect that, where a mortgage or deed of trust has been recorded prior to the commencement of work or the furnishing of materials, but the consideration therefor has not passed until after work has commenced or materials have been furnished, the lien of the mortgage or deed of trust is prior and superior to the mechanics' lien claims where the making of the advances is obligatory on the part of the mortgagee or the beneficiary. Fickling v. Jackman (Cal. Sup.) 265 P. 810; Tapia v. Demartini, 77 Cal. 383, 19 P. 641, 11 Am. St. Rep. 288; Hall v. Glass, 123 Cal. 500, 56 P. 336, 69 Am. St. Rep. 77; Valley Lumber Co. v. Wright, supra; Fuller v. McClure, 48 Cal. App. 185, 191, 191 P. 1027; Home Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Burton, 20 Wash. 688, 56 P. 940, 943; Blackmar v. Sharp, 23 R. I. 412, 50 A. 852, 855; Moroney's Appeal, 24 Pa. 372, 377. In other words, the mortgage or deed of trust, as against subsequent incumbrancers or mechanics' lien claimants, becomes a lien for the whole sum advanced from the time of its execution and recordation, and not for each separate amount advanced from the time of such advancement, although the right to enforce the collection thereof can only arise upon each advancement being made. A different rule prevails, however, where the advances are optional with the mortgagee or beneficiary and the lien of the mortgage or deed of trust is, in such case, postponed to the date or dates respectively as of which the advances actually are made. Fickling v. Jackman, supra; Fuller v. McClure, supra. These authorities, in our opinion, amply sustain the trial court's decision giving priority, as against the real property involved, to the trust deed securing the loan made to Smith by the Anglo-California Securities Company. The judgment of the court below, in so far as it declares the claims and liens of the several other defendants inferior and subordinate to the charge upon said real property created by the deed of trust executed and delivered to the defendant Anglo-California Trust Company, as trustee, for the defendant Anglo-California Securities Company, will, therefore, have to be affirmed.

[3] This conclusion does not, however, dispose of the principal issue presented by this litigation, which has to do with the respective rights or interests of the parties in and to the sum of $4,090 remaining undisbursed in the building loan account. Our research has failed to disclose a case directly in point either in this state or in other jurisdictions. In a situation such as confronts us herein it seems but reasonable to conclude that the mechanics' lien claimants, knowing or being charged with knowledge of the incumbrances of record against the real property, must have relied upon, excluding the possibility of the security ordinarily afforded by the filing of mechanics' liens, the agreement between Smith and the defendant securities company as to the amount to be advanced for building purposes. It is true, of course, that, although the loan was obtained by Smith for the express purpose of improving the property according to plans and specifications submitted with the application therefor, there is nothing in the nature of the agreement, or in its terms, that made it obligatory upon the securities company to see that the money advanced thereunder was, in fact, applied to payments for labor and materials furnished in the construction work. Hence, any payments made to or on behalf of Smith were in discharge of the agreement of the securities company and brought it under no liability to the lien claimants. It follows, therefore, that the right, if there be such right, to have the sum of $4,090 applied pro tanto in payment of the mechanics' lien claims cannot be enforced by virtue of any declared trust or one to be implied from the terms and conditions of the loan agreement. This conclusion necessarily flows from the proposition, just stated, that the securities company was under no obligation by virtue of its contract or agreement to see to the application of the money advanced.

[4] Nor do we think the lien claimants can assert such right solely by virtue of the agreement of the securities company to advance the full sum of $20,000, for it is now well settled in this state that to give a third party, who may derive a benefit from the performance of a promise, an action thereon, there must have been an intent clearly manifested by the promisor to secure some benefit to the third party. In other words, the promise or contract must have been one "made expressly for the benefit of a third person." Section 1559, Civ. Code, 6 Cal. Jur. 473, § 280, and authorities there cited.

[5] What we have said, however, need not necessarily prove fatal to the cause of the appealing mechanics' lien claimants if there exist any special circumstances warranting the imposition in their favor of a charge or lien upon the fund now in dispute. We are of the view that the money remaining undischarged in the building loan account opened in Smith's name by the securities company should, in accordance with established principles of equity, be so charged. And this by reason of those special circumstances and conditions consisting of representations and conduct upon one side and of action founded thereon upon the other. That the lien claimants must have relied upon the fund to be advanced to Smith by the securities company, and not alone upon the individual capacity of Smith or their right to a last lien upon the premises, as a means of obtaining payment for their labor and materials, is supported by every reasonable inference deducible from the surrounding circumstances. Smith was engaged in building upon land for which he had not paid the purchase price and which was charged with and subject to the several deeds of trust executed and delivered to secure the entire purchase-money. The incapacity of Smith to build without a prearranged loan was emphasized by the existence of these purchase-money incumbrances and attested by the agreement with the securities company for a loan to be used expressly for building purposes. It is also reasonably apparent from the record herein that this loan could not have been obtained without giving the deed of trust for its security priority over the purchase-money deeds of trust. Moreover, the record tends to show that the houses for the construction of which the building loan account was opened have been completed in substantial compliance with the plans and specifications submitted to the securities company in connection with the application for the loan. It requires very little showing, therefore, to produce the conclusion that, without confidence in the payment to Smith of the full amount of the loan contracted for, the lien claimants would not have extended credit for their labor and materials. The reasonableness of such expectations on the part of the lien claimants must naturally have suggested itself both to Smith and the securities company. They should have known that the consummated agreement for the money to be advanced to or on behalf of Smith as the buildings progressed, under a deed of trust taking priority over the statutory liens available to those contracting with him or the general contractor, would constitute a material inducement to them in supplying labor and materials. As if in express recognition of the reasonableness of these expectations, the practice was to make payments from, or withdrawals upon, the building loan account only as the work progressed and after the appraiser for the securities company had, in the line of his duty, reported progress warranting a payment.

[6] To concede, therefore, as has been done, that there was no intention on the part of Smith or the securities company to create a trust in favor of the lien claimants by the terms of the agreement for the loan, and that this agreement made it no wrong, actionable on behalf of such lien claimants, for the securities company to withhold the money, or any part thereof, does not, in our opinion, answer the conditions presented by the special facts and circumstances stated. Smith and the securities company by their conduct may be said to have induced, or contributed to induce, the lien claimants to enhance the value of the real property by their labors and materials, and it would be inequitable and unjust, it seems to us, to permit Smith or his personal representative to withhold, at this time, any part of the fund upon which the lien claimants must surely have relied for reimbursement. The fact that the real property itself has proved of but little value upon sale under the purchase-money deeds of trust lends added support to this conclusion. The foundation of equitable estoppel is justice and good conscience. As stated in 2 Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (4th Ed.) p. 1636, § 802:

"Its object is to prevent the unconscientious and inequitable assertion or enforcement of claims or rights which might have existed or been enforceable by other rules of the law, unless prevented by the estoppel; and its practical effect is, from motives of equity and fair dealing, to create and vest opposing rights in the party who obtains the benefit of the estoppel."

[7] To permit of an appropriation by the personal representative of Smith of the $4,090 in dispute would, by reason of the circumstances attending the transaction, work a grievous wrong to the appealing lien claimants having an equity therein and give such personal representative an unconscientious advantage over such lien claimants. Nor do we think this sum of money should become a part of Smith's estate and thus become charged with the claims of general creditors. The court below should have, in our opinion, ordered and directed the securities company to pay this amount into court, to be thereafter disbursed, pro rata, among those persons having legally and satisfactorily established their lien claims against the parcels of real property hereinabove referred to.

[8] In announcing our conclusion in this case, we are not unmindful of the rule which requires that an estoppel, to be available as a defense, must be specially pleaded. This rule is not, however, without its exceptions. It has been held, for instance, that the rule is without application where the complaint discloses a state of facts which amount to an equitable estoppel. Haynes v. Indio Levee District, 46 Cal. App. 436, 440, 189 P. 475. The agreed statement of facts upon which the instant case was tried discloses, as we have already shown, certain special circumstances which, in our opinion, give rise to what might well be termed an equitable estoppel. In view of this situation, the rule above stated may properly be said to be inapplicable herein.

[9] For the guidance of the court below it is proper to state herein that the nonappealing lien claimants are not in a position to derive any benefit from the reversal in part of the judgment. Lake v. Superior Court, 187 Cal. 116, 118-120, 200 P. 1041, 1042. In the cited case it is declared that:

"An appeal by only a portion of the defendants, however broad in terms the notice of appeal may be, is, in legal effect, an appeal only from a portion of the judgment affecting them and gives jurisdiction to the appellate court to reverse or modify the judgment only in so far as it affects the interests of the appellants."

The judgment in the instant case by separate and numbered paragraphs adversely disposes of the asserted severable rights and interests of the respective lien claimants in and to the sum of money in dispute. It necessarily follows, therefore, that the respective appealing lien claimants could prosecute an appeal only from such portions of the judgment as affect them, and this despite the statement in their notice of appeal that the appeal is "from the whole and from each and every part of that certain judgment given and made herein. * * *

In accordance with the views herein expressed, that part of the judgment appealed from which declares the trust deed executed and delivered to the Anglo-California Trust Company as trustee for the Anglo-California Securities Company to be a first charge or lien upon the real property described therein, is hereby affirmed. That part of the judgment awarding the sum of $4,090, remaining undischarged in the building loan account, to the plaintiff Mary H. Smith, as administratrix of the estate of Calvin M. Smith, deceased, is reversed, with directions to the court below to proceed, as suggested herein, so as ultimately to cause said sum of $4,090 to be applied in liquidation of the liens of the appealing lien claimants.

Ex parte ROSENCRANTZ. (Cr. 3157.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Criminal law § 1213—Provision authorizing life imprisonment, without right to parole, on fourth conviction for felony, held not cruel and unusual punishment (Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066; Const. Cal. art. 1, § 6; Const. U. S. Amend. 8).

Provision of Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066, for life imprisonment, without eligibility to parole, on conviction of any felony after three previous convictions, held not to constitute such cruel and unusual punishment, under Const. Cal. art. 1, § 6, and Const. U. S. Amend. 8, as to invalidate law; the deprivation of right to parole being neither cruel nor unusual, being simply a favor granted by the people to those committed to penal institutions as punishment for crime.

2. Criminal law § 1201—Law providing for life imprisonment, without right to parole, on fourth conviction for felony, held not unconstitutional as authorizing unreasonable punishment (Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066).

Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066, providing for life imprisonment, without eligibility to parole, on conviction for a felony after three previous convictions therefor, held not unconstitutional as providing a punishment beyond the bounds of reason, in view of offense committed.

3. Constitutional law §203—Law providing for life imprisonment, without right to parole, on fourth conviction for felony, held not unconstitutional as ex post facto (Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066).

Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066, providing for life imprisonment, without right to parole, on conviction for felony after three previous convictions therefor, held not unconstitutional and void as being ex post facto by reason of application to crimes committed prior to its enactment or conviction before such time.

4. Constitutional law §250—Law providing for life imprisonment, without right to parole, on fourth conviction for felony, held not denial of equal protection (Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066; Const. art. I, § 11).

Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066, providing for life imprisonment, without right to parole, on conviction for felony after three previous convictions therefor, held not in violation of Const. art. I, § 11, requiring all general laws to have a uniform operation; such provision affecting alike all offenders similarly situated, and therefore not depriving any one of the equal protection of the laws.

5. Habeas corpus §50—Excessiveness of sentence under statute providing for life imprisonment will not be considered on habeas corpus until expiration of term for which applicant might have been lawfully imprisoned (Pen. Code, § 476a; § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066).

Excessive sentence, under Pen. Code, § 644, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1066, providing for life imprisonment on fourth conviction for felony, without right to parole, even assuming such provision to be unconstitutional and void, will not be considered on habeas corpus until after expiration of term for which applicant might have been lawfully imprisoned after conviction of fraudulently making and uttering a check, without sufficient funds to meet same, in violation of Pen. Code, § 476a.

Original application for habeas corpus by Evelyn Rosencrantz. Writ denied.

Howard K. James, of Alameda (W. L. Albert, of Oakland, of counsel), for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Emery F. Mitchell and Wm. F. Cleary, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

CURTIS, J. The petitioner is held in custody by the warden of the state prison at San Quentin under and by virtue of a commitment issued out of the superior court of the county of Alameda. This commitment was issued upon a judgment of conviction of petitioner of the crime of fraudulently making and uttering a check upon a bank without sufficient funds to meet the same, a felony, as defined by section 476a of the Penal Code, after three prior convictions of a felony. The first of said prior convictions was for fraudulently issuing a fictitious check on or about March 8, 1916; the second, for fraudulently drawing a check on or about January 12, 1920, without sufficient funds to meet said check; and the third, for making and passing a fictitious instrument on or about April 15, 1923. The judgment of imprisonment, which was dated June 8, 1928, directed that:

"Whereas E. Rosencrantz had been duly convicted in this Court of the crime of Felony, to-wit: a violation of Section 476a of the Penal Code and three prior convictions of Section 476a of the Penal Code of California, she therefore be confined in the state prison of the State of California at San Quentin, as prescribed by law, and that she be remanded to the custody of the Sheriff of the County of Alameda and be by him taken and delivered to the Warden of the state prison of the State of California at San Quentin."

In 1923, the Legislature of this state enacted a new section to the Penal Code of this state, to be known as section 644, which section, in part, read as follows:

"Every person convicted in this state of any felony who shall previously have been three times convicted, whether in this state or elsewhere of the crime of robbery, burglary, rape with force and violence, arson or any of them, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state penitentiary for not less than life. * * *

In 1927 this portion of said section was amended to read as follows:

"Every person convicted in this state of any felony, who shall have been previously three times convicted, either in this state or elsewhere, of any felony, shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than life and shall not be eligible to parole. * * *"
St. 1927, p. 1066.

It is contended by petitioner that she is imprisoned in the state prison at San Quentin by virtue of the provisions of section 644 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927; that said section of the Penal Code is unconstitutional and void, and therefore and for these reasons her imprisonment and restraint is illegal.

The grounds upon which petitioner bases her contention that said section 644 is unconstitutional and void are: (1) That the punishment of life imprisonment without the privilege and right of parole is cruel and unusual; (2) that section 644 of the Penal Code is unconstitutional and void, in that it not only prescribes a greater punishment for a subsequent offense, but the extent of the punishment prescribed for a subsequent offense by said section after prior conviction goes beyond the bounds of reason, in view of the offenses committed; (3) that said section 644, in so far as it relates to the charge against petitioner, is unconstitutional and void as being ex post facto.

We will consider these grounds in the order in which they are presented by petitioner.

[1] First. Cruel and unusual punishment is in contravention both of the Federal and State Constitutions. Amendment 8 of the U. S. Constitution; section 6 of article 1 of the Constitution of California. Life imprisonment in the state prison cannot be said to be either cruel or unusual. It has been in use not only since the foundation of our state, but ever since the formation of our national government such punishment has been employed both by the several states and the federal government as one of the penalties imposed upon those who have been found guilty of crime. Neither can it be said that the deprivation of petitioner of the right to parole is either cruel or unusual. It has only been at a comparatively recent date in the history of our state that any prisoner has been granted the favor of parole. The right to parole is simply a favor granted by the people of the state to those committed to our penal institutions as punishment for crime. The withholding of this favor by the Legislature from any particular class of criminals cannot be said to inflict upon those from whom the privilege has been denied a punishment either cruel or unusual. The granting or withholding of the privilege of parole to any particular class of prisoners is largely a matter of expediency which is left to the lawmaking branch of our government, and the courts will not interfere with the Legislature in the exercise of such power. People v. Oppenheimer, 156 Cal. 733, 106 P. 74; McDonald v. Massachusetts, 180 U. S. 311, 21 S. Ct. 389, 45 L. Ed. 542; People v. Stanley, 47 Cal. 113, 117, 17 Am. Rep. 401.

[2] Second. The second ground upon which petitioner bases her right to be released from her imprisonment is that the extent of such punishment prescribed for the subsequent offense, after three prior convictions of a felony, goes far beyond reason and therefore the imprisonment imposed upon her is illegal. In support of this contention, petitioner refers to Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (8th Ed.) p. 1231, where we find the following statement:

"A police measure must fairly tend to accomplish the purpose of its enactment, and must not go beyond the reasonable demands of the occasion."

Immediately following this sentence is the following:

"But a large discretion is necessarily vested in the Legislature, to determine not only what the interests of the public require, but what measures are necessary for the protection of such interests."

We think these two sentences taken together on the whole contain a correct statement of the law upon the subject. A statute like that enacted by section 644 of the Penal Code is frequently referred to as habitual criminal legislation and such legislation has been generally upheld by the courts of this and other jurisdictions.

"An habitual criminal statute is a thing of modern creation, and while there are many rules of law which may seem inconsistent with its purpose and the procedure adopted to compass it, it is nevertheless sound in principle and sustained by reason. Aside from the offender and his victim there is always another party concerned in every crime committed—the state; and it does no violence to any constitutional guaranty for the state to rid itself of depravity when its efforts to reform have failed. The true ground upon which these statutes are sustained is, that the punishment is awarded for the second offense only, and that in determining the amount or nature of the penalty to be inflicted, the Legislature may require the courts to take into consideration the persistence of the defendant in his criminal course." 8 R. C. L. p. 284.

In McDonald v. Massachusetts, supra, a statute was sustained providing for punishment of imprisonment for the term of 25 years of any person convicted of a felony after such person had been twice previously convicted of crime. In the case of People v. Oppenheimer, supra, the defendant while undergoing a sentence of imprisonment in the state prison of this state was charged with an assault with a deadly weapon under section 246 of the Penal Code, making such offense committed by one imprisoned in a state prison of the state punishable with death. He was found guilty as charged and the extreme penalty imposed upon him. The judgment against him was affirmed by this court. A statute even inflicting the death penalty will be declared invalid only in those cases where the punishment is "so disproportionate to the offense for which it is inflicted as to meet the disapproval and condemnation of the conscience and reason of men generally, 'as to shock the moral sense of the people.'" People v. Oppenheimer, supra. Can it be said that a statute or a section of the Code prescribing a punishment of life imprisonment, without the right of parole, for those found guilty of the commission of a felony, after they have been three times previously convicted of a felony, is so disproportionate to the offense for which it is inflicted that it shocks the moral sense of the people? We think not. Society is not only entitled to be protected from the depravity of those criminally inclined, but it is the first and highest duty of government to secure to its citizens the enjoyment of their lives and property against the unlawful aggression of the criminal class, who, if unrestrained, would despoil the law abiding both of life and property. When a person has proven himself immune to the ordinary modes of punishment, then it becomes the duty of government to seek some other method to curb his criminal propensities that he might not continue to further inflict himself upon law-abiding members of society. This we think may be done even to the extent of depriving him permanently of his liberty. We have been cited to no authority by petitioner which would make it illegal to impose a life sentence upon her as punishment for her fourth conviction of a felony, and we doubt whether any exist. The state of Kentucky has enacted a statute providing that the punishment of one convicted for a third time of felony shall be fixed at confinement in the penitentiary for life, and the same has been sustained by the Supreme Court of that state. Herndon v. Commonwealth, 105 Ky. 197, 48 S. W. 989, 88 Am. St. Rep. 303. A similar statute was enacted by the Legislature of the state of Ohio and was sustained by the Supreme Court of that state. Blackburn v. State, 50 Ohio St. 428, 36 N. E. 18. With these authorities supporting the validity of enactments similar to section 644 of the Penal Code, and with none to the contrary, we are unable to agree with petitioner that the extent of her imprisonment is beyond reason and therefore illegal. In our opinion, the judgment of life imprisonment imposed upon petitioner finds support both in law and in reason.

[3] Third. It will be observed that the three prior crimes with which petitioner was charged and convicted were committed by her prior to the amendment of section 644 of the Penal Code, under which petitioner was prosecuted and the sentence of life imprisonment imposed. For this reason the petitioner contends that said section of the Code, as amended, in so far as it applies to the crimes committed prior to its enactment, or to prior convictions rendered before its passage, is objectionable as being ex post facto. This same question has frequently been before the courts of this state, and they have uniformly upheld such legislation as not being subject to said objection. The following statement from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations (8th Ed.) p. 553, has been either directly cited, or in principle approved by the decisions of this court:

"And a law is not objectionable as ex post facto which, in providing for the punishment of future offenses, authorizes the offender's conduct in the past to be taken into the account, and the punishment to be graduated accordingly. Heavier penalties are often provided by law for a second or any subsequent offense than for the first, and it has not been deemed objectionable that in providing for such heavier penalties the prior conviction authorized to be taken into account may have taken place before the law was passed. In such cases it is the second or subsequent offense that is punished, not the first. * * * " Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 429, 432; People v. King, 64 Cal. 338, 30 P. 1028; People v. Smith, 36 Cal. App. 88, 90, 171 P. 696; People v. Camperlingo, 69 Cal. App. 466, 471, 231 P. 601; People v. James, 71 Cal. App. 374, 378, 235 P. 81.

We do not regard this to be an open question any longer in this state.

[4] It is intimated in some of the briefs filed on behalf of petitioner that section 644 of the Penal Code is in contravention of section 11 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state requiring that all general laws shall have a uniform operation. There is no merit in such a contention, as the section of the Code in question affects alike all offenders similarly situated, and therefore does not deprive any one of the equal protection of the laws. McDonald v. Massachusetts, 180 U. S. 311, 313, 21 S. Ct. 389, 45 L. Ed. 542; People v. Smith, 36 Cal. App. 88, 89, 171 P. 696; People v. Finley, 153 Cal. 59, 61, 94 P. 248; People v. Carson, 155 Cal. 164, 169, 99 P. 970.

[5] A further point is made by the Attorney General against the release of petitioner from her imprisonment, and that is that, even assuming section 644 of the Penal Code to be unconstitutional and void, still she would not be entitled to such release until the expiration of the time for which she could be lawfully confined by virtue of her conviction under section 476a of the Penal Code. This point is well taken. The commitment shows that petitioner was convicted of the crime denounced in section 476a, and the judgment is that she be confined in the state prison as prescribed by law. Even if we disregard that portion of the commitment, referring to the prior convictions of felony, we still have a valid commitment under section 476a against the petitioner, and not until the expiration of the term for which she may be lawfully imprisoned for the violation of said section 476a, would petitioner be entitled to release from her imprisonment. In re Morck, 180 Cal. 384, 181 P. 657. In that case this court said:

"It is the established practice of the supreme court not to consider any question of excess of sentence until the expiration of the time for which the prisoner may be lawfully confined. * * * It is clear, therefore, that a writ should not be granted at this time."

The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

In re SCOTT.

SCOTT v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

(S. F. 13073.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Mandamus ☞166—Applicant for writ of mandate had right to file reply or answer to return, though it might have but little evidentiary value (Code Civ. Proc. § 1091).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1091, authorizing applicant for writ of mandate to countervail answer by proof either in direct denial or by way of avoidance, applicant for such writ had right to file a reply or answer to return, though it might have but little evidentiary value in controverting allegations thereof.

2. Attorney and client ☞75(1)—Client had right to change attorneys having no relation to subject-matter of action whether or not valuable services were rendered or moneys advanced.

In absence of any relation of attorney to subject-matter of action other than arising from employment, client had absolute right to change attorneys at any stage of action, without regard to whether attorney had rendered valuable services under his employment or that client might have been indebted to him therefor or for moneys advanced.

3. Attorney and client ☞76(1), 148(2)—Attorney did not, by virtue of contingent fee agreement, acquire interest in subject-matter of action, preventing client from revoking employment; "power coupled with interest" (Civ. Code, § 2356).

Attorney did not, by virtue of employment contract providing for compensation by payment of one-half of net recovery of money and property obtained, acquire such interest in subject of agency or subject-matter of the action within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 2356, as to prevent client from revoking his employment as attorney in proceeding, since a "power coupled with an interest" must be an interest in the thing itself, and the power must be ingrafted on an estate in the thing, and power and interest must be united in same person.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Power Coupled with an Interest.]

4. Attorney and client ☞75(1)—Laywoman is not estopped from changing attorneys because of having misstated legal effect of employment contract to one of original attorneys.

Laywoman, having executed agreement with attorney providing for compensation to attorney by the payment of one-half of amount recovered, is not estopped from thereafter changing attorneys by reason of having misrepresented to another attorney subsequently associated therewith the legal effect of such written instrument as creating interest in subject-matter of action.

5. Attorney and client ☞75(1)—Delay of seven months in applying for mandate to compel substitution of attorney held not such laches as precluded relief.

Delay of seven months in applying for writ of mandate to compel court to substitute attorneys following the denial of a motion therefor in the lower court held not such laches as precluded relief, in absence of showing any injury or disadvantage had resulted because of delay.

In Bank.

Original application for writ of mandate by Maud Scott, also known as Marion Scott against the Superior Court in and for the County of Alameda and another. Writ granted.

Wm. J. Cullinan and Stanley C. Burke, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Leo R. Friedman and Robert E. Fitzgerald, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, C. J. Petitioner seeks a writ of mandate to compel the respondent court and judge to grant a motion, duly made in the court below, for substitution of attorneys in proceedings relating to the probate of the last will and testament of Leon Morrison, deceased. An alternative writ was granted, and the respondents interposed a general and special demurrer to the petition, and, at the same time, filed an answer by way of return to the writ. Petitioner thereupon asked leave to file a reply or answer to the return. It was received over the objection of the respondents, subject to a reserved decision whether or not it should be filed.

[1] The right of the petitioner to file such a reply or answer to the return is well settled. In a proceeding for mandamus, "on the trial, the applicant is not precluded by the answer from any valid objection to its sufficiency, and may countervail it by proof either in direct denial or by way of avoidance." Code Civ. Proc., § 1091; McClatchy v. Matthews, 135 Cal. 274, 67 Pac. 134. Petitioner's reply to the answer and return is therefore ordered filed. It may have little "evidentiary value" in controverting the allegations of the return, as is contended by the respondents, but that fact does not prevent its consideration by the court for whatever it may be worth.

[2] We deem it unnecessary to specially consider the contentions raised by the specifications of the special demurrer that the petition here is uncertain, ambiguous, and unintelligible. The points thus raised which are worth considering relate to matters reached by the general demurrer. The others relate to facts, some of which are matters of record, and all of which are easily ascertainable, if an amendment were deemed necessary. They do not appear of sufficient importance to prevent an immediate consideration of the application on its merits. Much of the discussion by the respondents would be far more effective and persuasive if this were an appeal from an order of the lower court instead of an application for the exercise of the discretionary power of this court in issuing an original writ. The petitioner has an absolute right to change her attorneys, in the absence of any relation of the attorneys to the subject-matter of the action, and it is necessary only for her to request such change in order to justify the court in making an order therefor. Code Civ. Proc., § 284; Woodbury v. Nevada, etc., Ry. Co., 121 Cal. 165, 53 P. 450. We are therefore but little concerned over the effort of the respondents to prevent a consideration of the application on its merits, which consideration primarily needs to be addressed to the legal effect of a purported assignment made by petitioner to H. L. Hagan, one of the attorneys who formerly represented her in certain litigation concerning the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased.

Leon Morrison died in the county of Alameda on or about the 20th day of June, 1921, leaving a considerable estate. By his last will and testament, made a few days before his decease, but not discovered until some time later, his estate was devised and bequeathed to Maud Scott, also known as Marion Scott, the petitioner in this matter. Before the discovery of the will, Marion Scott entered into a written agreement with H. L. Hagan, an attorney at law, in which agreement, after reciting that Marion Scott had certain claims against the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased, and the administrator of his estate, based upon promises and agreements made prior to the death of the deceased, Marion Scott agreed to employ Hagan as her attorney to prosecute said claims for her. By further provisions she agreed to give Hagan, "as compensation for said services, one-half of the net recovery of money and property obtained by judgment or compromise of the said claims." By the further terms of the agreement Hagan accepted the employment, and it was stipulated that, as the attorney in the prosecution of the claims and in the management of any litigation based thereon, he should "have the powers and duties prescribed for an attorney at law by the laws of the state of California."

Pursuant to his employment, Hagan commenced a proceeding in equity in the superior court, in and for the county of Alameda, wherein Maud Scott, this petitioner, was plaintiff, for the purpose of compelling the production of the last will and testament of Leon Morrison. Surety after the relation of client and attorney was entered into, as set out in the agreement above referred to, Maud Scott executed and delivered to Hagan a writing, by the terms of which she assigned and set over to Hagan "one-half of the net recovery of all money and property received" by her from the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased. Subsequent to the execution and delivery of this assignment, the will of Leon Morrison was filed in the respondent court. Opposition to the petition was filed by the Attorney General in behalf of the people of the state of California, and by two groups of persons claiming to be the surviving heirs of the decedent Morrison. The proceedings resulting in the admission of the will to probate are reviewed in the decision of this court in Estate of Morrison, 193 Cal. 1, 242 P. 939.

Subsequent to the employment of Hagan by the petitioner, she requested Hagan to associate Milton T. U'Ren with himself as an attorney in the proceedings. It is alleged in the answer of the respondents in connection with that request that petitioner stated to U'Ren that she desired to associate him with Hagan as her attorney, and that she had theretofore transferred and set over to Hagan a one-half interest in and to all the property constituting the estate of the decedent, Morrison, and that Hagan was then the owner and possessed of such one-half interest; and that she further stated to U'Ren that Hagan had agreed that, if U'Ren would associate himself as attorney for petitioner, Hagan would, by written instrument, transfer to U'Ren a one-half interest in and to the assignment from petitioner to Hagan. The respondents allege that it was upon these representations that U'Ren associated himself with Hagan as attorney for petitioner in the proceedings in the probate court.

In this connection, it is alleged in the reply of petitioner to the return that the purported assignment to Hagan, entered into 1½ months after the relation of attorney and client between petitioner and Hagan began, was executed at the special instance and request of Hagan, and that at the time of its execution petitioner was without the aid and assistance of separate counsel, and executed the assignment without knowing the true nature of its purpose or its effect, and was without knowledge of the terms of the assignment and without freedom of action in the matter, until the attorneys Cullinan and Burke, whom she now seeks to have substituted, called her attention to the terms of the purported assignment.

Hagan made an assignment to U'Ren of one-half of whatever interest he had acquired by virtue of the assignment from petitioner to himself, and thereafter Hagan and U'Ren represented the petitioner in matters relating to the estate of Morrison. It is alleged by the respondents that Hagan and U'Ren, as attorneys for petitioner, performed a vast amount of labor in the matter, and, relying upon the statements and representations of petitioner that the assignment made by her conveyed to Hagan a one-half interest in petitioner's interest in Morrison's estate, expended more than $1,300 in petitioner's behalf, and that certain proceedings by way of contest of the will of Morrison are still pending before the superior court.

The petitioner, on or about September 8, 1927, employed William J. Cullinan and Stanley C. Burke, attorneys at law, to represent her in all matters relating to the estate of Morrison, deceased, giving them full power as attorneys "to prosecute and collect any right, title, interest or claim" she might have in and to the estate. With matters in this shape, the petitioner requested Messrs. Hagan and U'Ren to agree to the substitution of attorneys. They refused, upon the ground that Hagan held "a fifty per cent. contingent contract from Miss Scott." Petitioner thereupon applied to Judge Church, of the respondent court, to make an order substituting Messrs. Cullinan and Burke as her attorneys in all matters connected with the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased. According to the answer and return, the motion was considered on the affidavits and other documents set forth in the petition for writ of mandate filed here, and other and additional testimony and evidence, upon which Judge Church decided and held that the expression, "one-half of the net recovery of all money and property received by said party of the second part from the above-named estate," set forth in the assignment from Marion Scott to Hagan, was intended to mean by the parties, and did mean in said instrument, one-half of the interest of said Scott in and to said estate of said Leon Morrison, deceased, and that said instrument created in Hagan a power coupled with an interest, and that the subsequent employment by Marion Scott of U'Ren, together with the assignment by Hagan to U'Ren at the direction of Marion Scott, created in U'Ren a similar power coupled with an interest. It is also alleged that the judge decided and determined from the evidence that the petitioner here was estopped and precluded, as against Hagan and U'Ren, and particularly as against U'Ren, from claiming that the assignment from her to Hagan was not an assignment of one-half of the interest of petitioner in and to the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased, and did not create a power coupled with an interest.

The order denying the motion for substitution was made on or about the 10th day of November, 1927. Application to this court for a writ of mandate was not made until 7 months later. During the intervening period, Hagan and U'Ren, it is alleged, have continued to act as petitioner's attorneys in the estate of Morrison. These facts are pleaded by the respondents in support of the further allegation that petitioner has been guilty of laches and has caused an estoppel to arise which prevents the commencement, at such a late date, of any proceeding to substitute attorneys in the place of Hagan and U'Ren.

This is not an appeal from Judge Church's ruling, and, unless it be determined that petitioner transferred and assigned to attorney Hagan an interest in the property involved in the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased, petitioner is clearly entitled to a writ directing the respondents to make the order of substitution of attorneys prayed for. Section 284 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the attorney in an action or special proceeding may be changed at any time upon the order of the court upon the application of either client or attorney, after notice from one to the other.

"The rule must be considered as settled in this state, under the above provision of the code, that in the absence of any relation of the attorney to the subject-matter of the action, other than that arising from his employment, the client has the absolute right to change his attorney at any stage in the action." Gage v. Atwater, 136 Cal. 170, 172, 68 P. 581, 582.

The same decision lays down the further rule that:

"The fact that the attorney has rendered valuable services under his employment, or that the client is indebted to him therefor, or for moneys advanced in the prosecution or defense of the action, does not deprive the client of this right. Section 1021 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the mode and measure of compensation of attorneys is left to the agreement of the parties, and in the absence of any other agreement in reference thereto there arises the ordinary money obligation which exists upon the employment of one person in the service of another."

Therefore, in this case, the facts that Hagan and U'Ren performed a "vast amount of labor" and expended for and in behalf of petitioner several hundred dollars, pass out of our consideration.

[3] We are of the view that Hagan did not acquire such an interest in the "subject of the agency," or subject-matter of the action, within the meaning of section 2356 of the Civil Code, as to prevent petitioner from revoking his employment as an attorney in the proceeding. A power coupled with an interest must be an interest in the thing itself; the power must be ingrafted on an estate in the thing, and the power and interest must be united in the same person. Hunt v. Rousmanier's Administrator, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. Ed. 589. By the terms of the first agreement between petitioner and Hagan, petitioner employed Hagan in his capacity as an attorney at law to prosecute certain claims against the estate of Leon Morrison, deceased, and agreed to give him "as compensation for said services one-half of the net recovery of money and property obtained" for her by his services [italics added], giving to Hagan the powers and duties prescribed for an attorney at law by the laws of the state. It cannot be successfully argued that this transaction amounted to the assignment to Hagan of an interest in the subject of the action. By the second agreement or assignment, petitioner set over and assigned to Hagan merely "one-half of the net recovery" of money and property received by her from the estate of Morrison. By virtue of that assignment, Hagan had no more than an interest in enforcing the claims of the petitioner against the Morrison estate, for upon his efforts depended his compensation as attorney for his client, the claimant. But the interest which he had in the money or property secured for his client, a part of which he was to get as compensation for his services, was an interest in that which was to be produced by the exercise of his power as attorney for his client, and did not amount to an interest in "the subject of the agency" within the meaning of section 2356 of the Civil Code, supra, which acts to prevent the revocation by the principal of the power of an agent coupled with an interest in the subject of the agency. Boehm v. Spreckels, 183 Cal. 239, 247, 191 P. 5; Flanagan v. Brown, 70 Cal. 254, 259, 11 P. 706. Hagan's interest was only a right to share the proceeds which might result from the execution of his power. He did not have a power coupled with an interest. In the case last noted the court cited the case of Hartley and Minor's Appeal, 53 Pa. 212, 91 Am. Dec. 207, as being "destructive in this connection." In that case a party gave to Hartley and Minor a power of attorney to collect and receive all money and property coming to her as an heir of a deceased person, with power to convey her interest in the real estate of the decedent, etc., the said Hartley and Minor to receive for their services one-half of the net proceeds of her interest in said estate which might be collected or received by them as her attorneys. Litigation arose over the transaction, and Hartley and Minor claimed the power was irrevocable by their principal, under the theory that it was a power coupled with an interest. The trial court decided against their contention, and on appeal the Supreme Court held that the power and the interest could not co-exist. The court said:

"The interest the appellants would have would be in the net proceeds collected under the power, and the exercise of the power to collect the proceeds would ipso facto extinguish it entirely, or so far as exercised. Hence the appellants' interest would properly begin when the power ended."

We conclude, therefore, that petitioner's assignment to Hagan did not raise an agency coupled with an interest within the meaning of section 2356 of the Civil Code. U'Ren acquired no greater interest in the transaction than Hagan had. Neither of these attorneys is therefore in position to resist the desire of petitioner for a substitution of attorneys on the ground of a power or agency coupled with an interest, and the respondents, answering for them, should grant her motion.

[4] We are not strongly impressed with the contention of the respondents that petitioner is estopped from seeking a substitution of attorneys by her representations to U'Ren concerning the purported assignment of an interest to Hagan. According to the records of this court Mr. U'Ren was admitted to practice law in this state many years ago. The volumes of the decisions of this court disclose that he has been prominent in the conduct of many important cases. We are not prepared to hold that a professional nurse, a laywoman, is estopped from exercising her legal right to change her counsel for the alleged reason she may have misstated to a practicing attorney of experience the legal effect of an existing written instrument prepared by another attorney.

[5] Neither are we in sympathy with the contention of the respondents that the relief sought here should be denied on the ground of the laches of the petitioner in making the application, following the denial of her motion in the court below. It is true that petitioner waited several months, but it is not shown in the return that any injury or disadvantage has been wrought to the respondents by the delay. In her reply to the return, petitioner, by her counsel, alleges that she did not know the true extent of the assignment prepared by Hagan until she received the independent advice of the counsel she is now seeking to have substituted for her former attorneys.

The conclusions we have reached render it unnecessary to consider the further contentions of the petitioner.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

We concur: PRESTON, J.; CURTIS, J.; SHENK, J.; RICHARDS, J.; SEAWELL, J.; LANGDON, J.

DEMOCRAT-HERALD PUB. CO. v. PETTIT et al. (Civ. 5772.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 9, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1928.

1. Sales ⚡243—Proof of defendant's acquisition of title from plaintiff's vendee, given possession with power of disposition, held admissible under simple denial without pleading estoppel (Civ. Code, § 1142).

In action by vendor to recover printing press from good-faith purchaser from vendee, engaged in business of buying and selling printing machinery, defendant was entitled to introduce proof of acquisition of title by purchase from one having possession and power of disposition, under Civ. Code, § 1142, under simple denial of plaintiff's title and right of possession without necessity of pleading estoppel, though statute is based fundamentally on principles of estoppel which prevent seller from rescinding after buyer has disposed of the property.

2. Sales ⚡234(8)—Vendee's authority to sell property purchased so as to invest title in subvendee may be implied (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Vendee's authority from his vendor to sell property purchased so as to invest subvendee with title under Civ. Code, § 1142, may be implied as well as expressed.

3. Sales ⚡234(8)—Seller, delivering printing press to vendee in business of buying and selling printing machinery, and permitting vendee to retain possession, impliedly authorized resale (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Seller of printing press, delivering possession of press to vendee engaged in business of buying and selling printing machinery, impliedly authorized resale under Civ. Code, § 1142, permitting vendee, who has possession and power of disposition to transfer title to subvendee, notwithstanding vendor's rescission, in view of original seller's permission to vendee to retain property in return for postdated check.

4. Sales ⚡234(8)—Sale by vendee, engaged in selling printing machinery, of press delivered to him by seller, passed title to bona fide subvendee, notwithstanding seller's rescission (Civ. Code, § 1142).

Seller of printing press, who delivered possession thereof to vendee engaged in business of selling new and secondhand printing machinery and permitted vendee to retain it on condition that he would forward postdated check, held not entitled to recover the press as against bona fide subvendee, since vendee's sale thereof passed title under Civ. Code, § 1142, as sale by one having possession with power of disposition, notwithstanding seller's rescission.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Democrat-Herald Publishing Company against Raymond C. Pettit, the Pacific Printing Machinery Company, and J. De Menezes & Son, etc. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants, except the two first named, appeal. Reversed, and new trial ordered.

A. Q. Lomba and G. E. Jackson, both of Oakland, for appellants.

Herbert Choynski, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant Pettit was the sole proprietor or manager of the Pacific Printing Machinery Company, engaged in the business of buying, repairing, reconditioning, and reselling new and secondhand printing machinery. Appellants purchased from said Pettit, May 29, 1925, at his place of business in San Francisco, a certain printing press, paid for it, and had it delivered and set up in their place of business in Oakland, on or before June 27, 1925. Thereafter, in August, 1925, respondent commenced this action against appellants and defendants for the recovery of the said press, claiming that it had never parted with title to the same, but that the press had been delivered to Pettit upon a conditional sale agreement, reserving title in respondent until full payment of the sale price, which had not been made. The complaint alleged ownership and right of possession, and the answer of appellants contained only denials. Defendants Pettit and Pacific Printing Machinery Company were not served with summons, and were not parties to the trial.

The transactions between respondent and Pettit accompanying and following the delivery of the printing press to Pettit are outlined as follows: Pettit wired to respondent "an offer on the press on a 30 day basis," asking respondent to ship it if satisfactory. Respondent answered that it would accept his offer upon deposit of $100 and the signing of a contract. A contract was prepared by respondent and sent to Pettit for his signature about May 6, 1925. It provided for payment of the balance of the purchase price in 30 days and that the title should remain in respondent until paid. Pettit replied by sending $100 and a $700 promissory note payable in 30 days and the agreement signed with changes or a new agreement to some different effect but resembling the one received by him in form and color. The alteration or change in the contract made by Pettit was not noticed by respondent. It shipped the press directly to Pettit, and forwarded a uniform straight bill of lading, dated May 15, directly to Pettit, who received the bill of lading and the press about May 29. This is the same date as the contract of sale from Pettit to appellants. On June 10, Pettit wired respondent:

"Will you supply bill of sale on Huber Press in return for postdated check payable July first, cannot finance sale to our customer otherwise."

Respondent replied to this wire as follows:

"If you will send certified check for seven hundred five dollars and forty four cents, principal and interest to July first, with check dated July first by your banker, and authorize our changing agreement to eliminate motor as stated in our last letter, we will forward bill of sale on receipt of your voucher."

Following this, respondent heard nothing more from Pettit, but Pettit completed the resale of the press to appellants. He retained all the purchase price paid by appellants and failed to pay to respondent the amount he had promised to pay for the purchase of the press. At the trial, his whereabouts was unknown. The evidence also disclosed that respondent, as well as appellants, knew that Pettit was in the business of buying and selling used machines.

Appellants contend that they obtained a good title by their purchase from Pettit under several rules, including the rule laid down in Civil Code, § 1142, which reads:

"Where the possession of personal property, together with a power to dispose thereof, is transferred by its owner to another person, an executed sale by the latter, while in possession, to a buyer in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, for value, transfers to such buyer the title of the former owner, though he may be entitled to rescind, and does rescind the transfer made by him."

The principle embodied in this section is well established (Estrich on Installment Sales, § 151), and has been the guiding rule in many decisions in this state. In applying this principle, these decisions have often treated the facts as an equitable estoppel. Sometimes they seem to be based chiefly on Civil Code, § 3543, which provides:

"Where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer."

In some cases they are based solely on the principle of law stated in Civil Code, § 1142, meaning that title actually not fictitiously passed by reason of this principle. Among this last-named group of decisions are Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, 211 P. 267; Commercial Acceptance Trust v. Bailey (Cal. App.) 261 P. 743; Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64 (1861).

Respondent's answer to this contention is that appellants did not plead estoppel in their answer as a defense and that the case was not tried as though this point were an issue. Most of the time at the trial was devoted to identifying the press and to ascertaining the exact transaction between the respondent and Pettit as if to determine whether title had passed between these two. Appellants' counsel, however, did bring out evidence of all the elements essential to the operation of Civil Code, § 1142. Some but not the greater part of the evidence came in over the objection that it was immaterial, but at no time was any objection made that expressly directed attention to the necessity of pleading such facts as an estoppel. The record does not show that appellants' counsel at the trial claimed an estoppel by name, but it does show that he put forward the claim of title by reason of the provisions of Civil Code, § 1142.

[1] It is held in this state that an equitable estoppel as a defense must be pleaded, but there seems to be no good reason why this rule of decision should be applied to Civil Code, § 1142. While the rule of that section may be said to be based fundamentally on the principles of equitable estoppel, its language does not say that the owner of the property shall be estopped under the named conditions from asserting his title against the innocent buyer, but it says that the owner's title itself is transferred to such buyer under the named conditions. This section is found in an article of the Code named "What Operates as a Transfer," and in a chapter named "Transfer of Personal Property." This being one method of transferring title prescribed in the Code, a simple denial of plaintiff's title and right of possession should permit proof to be given of the acquisition of title by this method as well as by the method of acquiring property by a direct transfer from the original owner. Furthermore the operation of the rule of that section may as well be called a sale by agent as a sale by estoppel. See Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, at 491, 211 P. 267.

[2-4] The original owner's authority to sell, mentioned in Civil Code, § 1142, may be implied as well as expressed. Carter v. Rowley, 59 Cal. App. 486, at 489, 211 P. 267; State Finance Co. v. Isaacson (Cal. App.) 260 P. 580; Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64; Spooner v. Cummings, 151 Mass. 313, 23 N. E. 840; Gump Investment Co. v. Jackson, 142 Va. 190, 128 S. E. 506, 47 A. L. R. 82, at page 94; Estrich on Installment Sales, § 151.

"The consent of the owner to a disposition of his property may be inferred from acts, as well as given in direct terms. It may be inferred when the owner gives such evidence of the authority of disposal as usually accompanies such authority according to the custom of trade and the general understanding of business men. Thus, the delivery of goods to a merchant, engaged in the sale of articles of a similar kind, is such evidence of the bestowal of the right to dispose of the same, as to protect the purchaser from the possessor. The possession under such circumstances is evidence, not that the possessor is owner, but that he has received authority from the owner to sell." Wright v. Solomon, 19 Cal. 64, at 76, 79 Am. Dec. 196.

Respondent knew that Pettit was in the business of selling presses, knew that he intended to offer for sale this press, both from knowing the nature of his business and from the exchange of telegrams. Respondent must therefore be held to have authorized a resale by Pettit. Whatever may be said about whether respondent transferred the title of the press to Pettit, it undoubtedly transferred the possession which is the thing mentioned in Civil Code, § 1142.

It follows, therefore, that the judgment appealed from should be reversed. A new trial is ordered.

HARKER v. RICKERSHAUSER et al.
(Civ. 3234.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 14, 1928.

1. Evidence ⇨383(7)—Recitals of trustee's deed that mortgagors had defaulted held not conclusive against mortgagors' claim that condition rendering trust deed void had been performed.

Where deed of trust given to protect mortgagees against levy of execution on realty received in trade with mortgagors recited that, if mortgagors paid judgment, or caused execution to be released from property, deed of trust should be void, and that recitals respecting default contained in trustee's deed on sale thereunder should be conclusive, recitals of mortgagors' default in making payments contained in trustee's deed to mortgagees was not conclusive against mortgagors' claim that execution had been released to mortgagees' knowledge before trustee's deed was executed and that trustee's deed was therefore void.

2. Mortgages ⇨209—Trustee under deed of trust is agent of both parties.

A trustee under a deed of trust is the common agent of both parties.

3. Mortgages ⇨101—Word "or" in deed of trust reciting it should be void on happening of specified contingencies held not construable as "and."

Where deed of trust given to protect mortgagees against levy of execution on realty received in trade with mortgagors recited that, if mortgagors paid judgment or caused execution to be released from property, deed of trust should be void, mortgagees' contention that word "or" should be read as "and" could not be sustained, since trust deed clearly indicated that performance of either condition would be sufficient; word "or" usually implying an alternative.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Or.]

4. Mortgages ⇨101—Whether "or" should be read as "and" in deed of trust depends primarily on parties' intent.

Question whether the word "or" should be read as "and" in a deed of trust is one primarily of ascertaining parties' intention, and substitution of one for the other is, in effect, relief against mistake.

5. Mortgages ⇨97—Precise language of deed of trust will be altered by construction only if it sets at naught parties' obvious intent.

The precise language of written agreements, such as deeds of trust, will be altered or modified by rules of construction only where, if allowed to stand, it would set at naught obvious intention of parties.

6. Ejectment ⇨139—Mortgagees' expenditures on mortgaged property, after condition rendering trust deed void was performed by mortgagors, held not recoverable as voluntary.

Where deed of trust was rendered void by mortgagors obtaining release of execution on realty traded in exchange for realty with mortgagees, and to secure the obtaining of which release the trust deed was executed, mortgagees' expenditures on property covered by trust deed and purporting to be authorized thereby, with knowledge of such release, were voluntary and not recoverable.

7. Ejectment ⇨84(2)—In action for possession, proof that trustee's deed under which defendants claimed was void, though not pleaded in complaint, held admissible in avoidance of defense.

In action to recover possession of land in which defendants' answer claimed title under sale by trustee under deed of trust held by defendants, proof that trustee's deed was void was admissible in avoidance of such defense, though such invalidity was not pleaded in complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Action by Mabel E. Harker against F. J. Rickershauser and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco, and Huston, Huston & Huston, of Woodland, for appellants.

John Cooper Packard, of Los Angeles, and S. W. Packard, for respondent.

TUTTLE, Justice pro tem. This is an action brought to recover possession of 350 acres of land in Yolo county. The complaint alleges that plaintiff is now, and ever since the 7th day of February, 1922, has been, the owner thereof; that defendants, on or about the 8th day of May, 1923, entered into said land and ousted plaintiff therefrom; and that defendants now wrongfully withhold possession of said premises. Judgment for possession is prayed for. The answer denies the ownership by plaintiff. As a further defense, defendants set up the execution of a certain deed of trust by plaintiff, covering said property; that a default occurred on behalf of plaintiff in the performance of certain condition therein; that a sale of said property under said trust deed was had; and that defendant F. J. Rickershauser purchased the same, and that he is now the owner thereof.

The trial court found that said trust deed was null and void, and judgment was entered for plaintiff, decreeing her to be the owner of said property, and that she recover possession thereof. From this judgment defendants appeal.

It appears from the record that in the month of January, 1922, plaintiff was the owner of certain real property in Los Angeles, which she agreed to trade with defendants for the 350 acres of land in Yolo county, above referred to. Pursuant to said agreement, plaintiff executed and delivered to defendants a deed to her said property, and defendants conveyed said Yolo county property to plaintiff. The whole transaction appears to have been consummated by March 1, 1922, on which date the deed to plaintiff was recorded. During the negotiations between said parties, it developed that there was outstanding a judgment against J. B. Harker, husband of plaintiff, in the sum of $7,200 or thereabouts, and that execution had theretofore been levied against the interest of said Harker in the Los Angeles property involved in said trade, said property standing on the records at the time of said levy in the name of plaintiff. For the purpose of protecting defendants from the levy of said execution, a trust deed was executed by plaintiff and her said husband, covering said Yolo county property, and containing the following provision:

"In the execution, delivery and acceptance of this trust deed it is expressly understood and agreed between all parties hereto, that if the parties of the first part pay said judgment or cause the said execution to be released from said property first herein described, then the said note and this trust deed to become null and void and of no effect."

A note for $7,200, due six months after date, was executed in connection with said trust deed.

Plaintiff introduced in evidence her deed from defendant, testified that defendants were in possession of the premises described therein, and rested. Defendants thereupon introduced in evidence the said trust deed and a deed from the trustee named therein, and given pursuant to a sale had under the provisions thereof, and rested. Plaintiff, in rebuttal, then introduced in evidence a certified copy of the release of the levy of execution above referred to, dated February 27, 1922. There is also testimony to the effect that the judgment under which said execution was levied was satisfied September 30, 1922. The facts above recited with reference to the release of the levy of the execution were found by the court to be true. The court also found that said sale under the trust deed was made after defendants knew that said execution had been released and the judgment under which the same was levied had been satisfied.

[1] It is first contended by appellants that the trustee's deed and the recitals therein were a conclusive and complete defense to the action, and "that said deed and its recitals in this action could not be attacked, qualified or disproved by plaintiff." The trust deed contained the following provision:

"And in the event of the sale of said property, or any part thereof, and the execution of a deed or deeds therefor under these trusts, then the recitals therein of default, that the beneficiary or holder of the note had given notice of the default and election to sell the described premises under the powers of the deed of trust, to satisfy the debt, was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder for three months prior to the notice of sale, due publication of the notice of sale, due and proper posting of the notice of sale, and also publication of notice of postponement, if the sale was postponed; that the sale was made to the highest bidder; that the purchase-money was paid; and any such deed or deeds with such recitals shall be effectual and conclusive, as against the said parties of the first part, their heirs or assigns, and all other persons; and the recital of the receipt of the purchase-money contained in any deed executed to the purchaser, as aforesaid, shall be a sufficient discharge to such purchaser from any obligation to see to the proper application of the purchase-money, according to the trusts provided in this instrument."

The deed of the trustee contained recitals of all the facts referred to in the foregoing provision.

The trust deed also contained the following references to the judgment and execution levied pursuant thereto:

"This deed of trust, made this 11th day of February, 1922, between Mabel E. Harker and J. B. Harker, of the first part, D. K. Gault, party of the second part, and F. J. Rickershauser, party of the third part, witnesseth:

"That whereas, Ward Rice has heretofore obtained judgment against Mocalwa Investment Company and J. B. Harker, upon which said judgment there is now due $7,200.00, or thereabouts; and

"Whereas, an execution has heretofore been issued on said judgment and levied upon all of the interest of J. B. Harker in the following described property, to wit:

"Lot 122, Westlake Park Tract, as per map recorded in book 12, page 15, miscellaneous records of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, which third party is about to purchase; and

"Whereas, J. B. Harker disclaims any interest in said described land and Mabel E. Harker claims to be the sole and exclusive owner thereof as her separate property; and

"Whereas, J. B. Harker and Mabel E. Harker are both desirous of selling said property to third party subject to said execution and the claims of Ward Rice arising therefrom; and

"Whereas, by reason of the premises and the hereinafter contained covenants on third party's part, the said Mabel E. Harker and J. B. Harker have agreed to pay to said party of the third part the amount of the balance due on said judgment, in gold coin, with interest, according to the terms of one certain promissory note executed and delivered by the said party of the first part, said note being in words and figures as follows:

 "7200.00

Los Angeles, Cal. February 1, 1922.

"Six months after date, for value received, we, and each of us, promise to pay F. J. Ricker-shauser, or order, at 1225 Citizens National Bank Building, Los Angeles, California, the sum of seven thousand two hundred and no/100 dollars, with interest at the rate of one per cent. per annum from date until paid, interest payable at maturity, and if not paid to be compounded and bear the same rate of interest as the principal; and should the interest not be paid when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note. Principal and interest payable in gold coin of the United States. This note is secured by a deed of trust to D. K. Gault, of Los Angeles, California.

Mabel E. Harker.

"J. B. Harker.

"This trust deed may be used as security for any additional sums coming due under said judgment in favor of said Ward Rice."

* * * * *

"In the execution, delivery and acceptance of this trust deed it is expressly understood and agreed between all parties hereto, that if the parties of the first part pay said judgment or cause said execution to be released from said property first herein described, then the said note and this trust deed to become null and void, but if said first parties fail to pay said judgment or cause the release of said execution within six months from date hereof, then third party assumes and agrees to pay said judgment, or so much thereof as at said time remains due and unpaid, on or before one year thereafter.

"The payment of said judgment by third party shall not be a prerequisite to the foreclosing of this trust deed."

The trustee's deed does not refer in any manner or particular to the last-mentioned provisions. It recites that "there has been a default in the payment of money advanced in accordance with the provisions of said trust deed." The whole intent and purpose of executing said trust deed was, as both parties admit, to secure the payment of the judgment or the release of the execution levied pursuant thereto. It was given as security for the performance of either of said acts by the first party named therein, and upon such performance it is expressly provided that the instrument shall "become null and void."

As there were clearly no recitals contained in the trustee's deed with reference to the said judgment and execution, there is little or no force in the contention made by appellants. Even assuming that such recitals could be established by inference, they would not be conclusive in an action between the parties to the trust deed.

[2] A trustee under a deed of trust is the common agent of both parties (Ainsa v. Mercantile T. Co., 174 Cal. 504, 163 P. 898), and the theory upon which the courts have proceeded in construing recitals in trustee's deeds is that the grantor under the trust deed is bound by the delegation of such authority as is given to the trustee in the exercise of his trust. This includes the execution of a deed pursuant to a sale, and the inclusion in said deed of such recitals as the parties may agree upon, and may include a clause relative to the conclusiveness of such recitals as to truth of the facts stated therein. Such recitals are conclusive where an innocent third party is the grantee in the trustee's deed (Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, 164 Cal. 613, 130 P. 15), but they are not conclusive as between the parties to the trust deed. (Seccombe v. Roe, 22 Cal. App. 139, 133 P. 507). In the instant case the trust deed was given as security for the performance of either of two acts upon the part of the trustor. It is admitted by both parties that one of said acts, to wit, the release of the levy of execution, was performed sixteen days from the date of the said trust deed, and the court found, upon sufficient evidence, that the beneficiary knew of the performance at or about the date it took place. If, notwithstanding such knowledge, defendant proceeded to have a sale made of the premises under such trust deed, this was palpable fraud upon the trustor, and under such circumstances plaintiff was entitled to go behind the recitals of the trustee's deed and prove the facts, even though they might be inconsistent or contradictory to such recitals. Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, supra. The court did not err in permitting plaintiff to prove these facts.

A number of cases have been cited by appellant upon the question of the conclusiveness of the recitals in the trustee's deed. None of these referred to construed a provision that upon the performance of a certain act by the trustor the trust deed shall become null and void. In the cases cited, the trustee's deeds were, at the most, merely voidable in an action between the parties. Hence they would pass title, though subject to direct attack by one of the parties. This is clearly set forth in Seccombe v. Roe, 22 Cal. App. 139, 133 P. 507. The case of Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, supra, involves facts similar to the case under consideration. The complaint was an ordinary one to quiet title. The defendant set up a deed to himself from a trustee and executed in pursuance of a sale had under a trust deed. Fraud was not pleaded, but the Supreme Court held that plaintiff was permitted to introduce evidence upon the question as to whether there had been a default under the trust deed, if such proof established fraud.

Appellants contend that this action is one brought to recover possession merely, and is in the nature of ejectment, and that under such circumstances the recitals in the trustee's deed are conclusive, citing Seccombe v.

Roe, supra, and other cases. What was said by the court in the case last mentioned on this question was quoted from Mersfelder v. Spring, 139 Cal. 593, 73 P. 452, where plaintiff sued in ejectment and defendant appeared with a general denial. Plaintiff relied upon a deed executed by a trustee under a deed of trust. This deed contained recitals similar to these in question, and the court held that the deed passed the legal title and plaintiff had made out a case in ejectment. The court proceeded to add, however, that these recitals did not preclude the inquiry, in an equitable proceeding, into the fairness of the sale or other matters which on equity principles might entitle the injured party to relief.

[3] It is next urged by appellants that the clause found in the trust deed in question "that if the parties of the first part pay said judgment or cause said execution to be released from said property first described herein, then the said note and this trust deed become null and void," is to be so construed that the word "or" is to be read as "and." Usually, the copulative "or" implies an alternative, and in the instant case, should either of the contingencies occur, the note and trust deed become null and void. The rule which should guide the court in this connection is clearly set forth in 2 C. J. 1388, subd. 2, and is as follows:

"Ordinarily these words are in no sense interchangeable terms, but, on the contrary, are used in the structure of language for purposes entirely variant. In order to effectuate the intention of the parties to an instrument, a testator, or a Legislature, as the case may be, the word 'and' is sometimes construed to mean 'or.' This construction, however, is never resorted to except for strong reasons and the words should never be so construed unless the context favors the conversion."

[4, 5] The question is primarily one of ascertaining the intention of the parties. The substitution of one of these words for the other is, in effect, affording relief upon the ground of mistake. In this case we cannot say that there was any mistake in the use of the word "or" as it appears in the instrument. On the contrary, the preamble to the trust deed indicates clearly that the release of the execution was of far more importance than the payment of the judgment. If the payment of the judgment was the prime and only consideration, why was mention made of the release of the execution, when it is elemental that the payment of the judgment would operate, ipso facto, to release the levy of the execution? In the matter of altering or modifying, by rules of construction, the solemn engagements of parties, our courts uniformly have acted with reluctance and hesitation, and it is only where, if the precise language were allowed to stand, it would set at naught the obvious intention of the parties, have they substituted, by construction, one word for another. See City of Cor- ona v. Merriam, 20 Cal. App. 232, 128 P. 769; Robinson v. S. P. Co., 105 Cal. 526, 38 P. 94, 722, 28 L. R. A. 773.

[6] Appellants contend that they are entitled to reimbursement for money they have expended in connection with the property in Yolo county. This was done, they claim, under the provisions of the trust deed. The court found that these expenditures were made subsequent to February 27, 1922, the date when the Los Angeles property was released from the levy of the execution, and at a time when defendants knew of said release. The findings of the court, which are sustained by ample evidence, are as follows:

"That it is true that defendant F. J. Rickershauser paid moneys due on taxes and also moneys due under said agreement made by him with adjoining landowners, for alleged reclamation purposes, and also paid money to make said land productive; that each and every one of said payments so made by defendant F. J. Rickershauser were made by him without the consent, knowledge or authority of plaintiff or of her husband, J. B. Harker; and all of which payments were made subsequent to the 2nd day of March, 1922, and after the trust deed above set out had become null and void and of no force or effect; that it is true that defendant F. J. Rickershauser did not receive back any of the moneys so paid out by him directly from plaintiff or from J. B. Harker, but it is true that he did receive certain moneys as rent for said property, which said moneys he never paid, nor offered to pay to plaintiff."

It also appears that the rental from said Yolo county property, subsequent to the date last mentioned, and up to the date of the trial, was used to defray a considerable part of this expense. The release of the execution was placed on record in the office of the recorder of Los Angeles county on said date, and thereafter, as expressly provided in the trust deed, said instrument was null and void. If defendants made expenditures purporting to be authorized by said trust deed, they must be held to be voluntary in character, and not recoverable. 30 Cyc. 1298-A. It will be observed that the answer does not contain any specific prayer for relief in respect to this matter, nor is there any defense or counterclaim based upon such expenditures.

[7] In the instant case, plaintiff, in making out her case, rightly ignored the trust deed, and simply proved the deed to her from defendants. The trust deed was void, and had been from and after February 27, 1922, and a trustee's deed thereunder passed no title whatever. When defendants introduced their trustee's deed and rested, plaintiff was entitled, and had the right, to attack the same upon legal or equitable grounds. No other or further pleading was required, as such matter could be proved in avoidance of the defense set up in the answer. Jose Realty Co. v. Pavlicevich, supra.

Numerous other points are urged as grounds for reversal. We have carefully examined each of them, but find them lacking in substantial merit. On the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings, we are of the opinion that the record is sufficient in this respect.

We are satisfied that the learned trial judge was correct in his conclusions, and that the judgment should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

MORRIS et ux. v. TURLEY. (Civ. 5158.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 7, 1928.

1. Forcible entry and detainer § 29(4)—Evidence held to support finding of forcible entry, where fence defendant constructed encroached on plaintiff's property, and its construction damaged plaintiff's sidewalk and building (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1159, subd. 1, 1160, subd. 1).

In action for forcible entry and detainer, where defendant erected fence which encroached on plaintiff's property, and which resulted also in damage to plaintiff's sidewalk and house during its construction, evidence held to support finding of forcible entry under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1159, subd. 1, 1160, subd. 1, providing, respectively, that person is guilty of forcible entry who by any kind of violence or circumstances of terror enters on real property, and that person is guilty of forcible detainer who, either by force, menace, or threats of violence, unlawfully holds or keeps possession of real property acquired peaceably or otherwise.

2. Forcible entry and detainer § 24(1)—Forcible entry is gist of action, and detainer averment is stated as mere continuation or consequence of first act.

In action alleging forcible entry and detainer, the forcible entry is the gist of the action, and the averment of forcible detainer is not stated as an independent ground for relief, but as a mere continuation or consequence of the first act.

3. Appeal and error § 1071(1)—Finding sufficient as to forcible entry in action also alleging detainer held not reversible error, allegation of detainer being surplusage (Code Civ. Proc. § 633).

In action for forcible entry and detainer, though there was confusion of findings of fact and conclusions of law, contrary to Code Civ. Proc. § 633, such did not constitute ground for reversal; finding of forcible entry alone being sufficient to allow recovery, allegation of detainer being mere surplusage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank C. Collier, Judge.

Action by Herman R. Morris and wife against Dora A. Turley. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed. Superseding opinion in 268 P. 441.

Frank G. Tyrrell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Thomas S. Bunn, of Los Angeles, and W. Blair Gibbens, of Ocean Park, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. In 1923 the parties to this action constructed a division fence between their adjoining residence properties, of which they were in actual peaceable possession until and including January 21, 1925. On the date last mentioned four or five men employed by the appellant entered respondents' premises and removed said fence, and in so doing broke and removed a portion of a concrete walk, and cut off and removed part of a composition arch which formed a portion of respondents' house. Although disputed by the parties, it was alleged by the plaintiffs, and the trial court found, that in rebuilding the fence the defendant deprived plaintiffs of a portion of their property. This proceeding was thereafter instituted against the defendant under subdivision 1 of section 1159 and subdivision 1 of section 1160 of the Code of Civil Procedure, alleging forcible entry and forcible detainer. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant appeals.

The portion of said sections relied upon by the plaintiffs provide, respectively, that:

"Every person is guilty of a forcible entry who either—

"1. By breaking open doors, windows, or other parts of a house, or by any kind of violence or circumstance of terror enters upon or into any real property. * * *

"Every person is guilty of a forcible detainer who either—

"1. By force, or by menaces and threats of violence, unlawfully holds and keeps the possession of any real property, whether the same was acquired peaceably or otherwise. * * *

Appellant insists that the evidence presented did not justify a finding of forcible entry or forcible detainer. The findings of the trial court recite:

That "while the plaintiffs were so in possession of said land and premises, the defendant, with violence and a strong hand, and by the assistance of four or five men, entered upon the property in the possession of the plaintiffs and in a forcible manner removed the above mentioned fence from its then position and rebuilt it upon a new straight line; * * * that by the removal of said fence the defendant deprived the plaintiffs of, and the defendant did herself take, the possession of a wedge-shaped strip of land, having as its apex the point constituting the northwesterly corner of the above described lot; * * * and that the defendant in the same manner and at the same time removed a portion of plaintiffs' building, and caused other portions of the said walk to be cracked and broken, and scattered débris over plaintiffs' lawn, impairing the appearance of plaintiffs' premises; and at the same time and in the same manner cut off and removed a portion of the composition arch forming a part of plaintiffs' building; and that the defendant unlawfully withholds and keeps possession of the strip of land above described and has so held possession thereof at all times since January 21, 1925."

It was adjudged that the plaintiffs recover possession of the strip of land so taken, and the sum of $300 damages, with their costs. The substance of this finding and judgment is that the defendant forcibly entered, and that she unlawfully retains possession of a portion of the plaintiffs' premises. It is not seriously contended that there is a forcible detainer thereof.

[1] Resolving all intendments in favor of the judgment below, and accepting as true the plaintiff's evidence, it appears that between 8 and 9 o'clock in the morning several men moved the party fence about 8½ inches onto plaintiffs' property, and that in so doing they sawed off 10½ inches of the arch, cut about 8 feet from a pipe which was embedded in cement, and chopped 8 or 10 inches off of the concrete sidewalk to a distance of about 90 feet from the front of the building, breaking roof drains and obstructing drainage. Plaintiff H. R. Morris testified that "it looked just like a cyclone struck through there, carrying mud and stuff, and cement that they left there." Another witness swore that he "saw a gang of men just naturally heaving the fence up, and tearing down the arch"; that "they pulled up the fence, and it fell down, and in a few minutes I saw them with the other men on the ladder cutting the arch." A builder testified that it would be necessary to rebuild the entire walk for a distance of 40 feet, to bond a new arch to the building, embed the post in cement, and replaster and restucco a considerable area, which would first require the tearing off of other plaster and stucco work, and that the cost of reconstruction would be $300. The plaintiff Morris testified that he was over sixty years of age, and that his health was "not very good"; that he forbade them to move the fence, but did not say more because they were young men, and he feared trouble with them.

We think the evidence amply supports the finding of forcible entry. As was held in Knowles v. Crocker Estate Co., 149 Cal. 278, 86 P. 715:

"When a person enters upon land in the actual peaceable possession of another, with a number of men acting under his direction and control, with such a display of force and accompanied by such instant acts as are calculated to intimidate the occupant from resisting their intrusion and maintaining his possession, such conduct is sufficient to constitute a forcible entry within the purview of the statute."

[2] It is conceded that the evidence does not warrant a finding, nor did the court find, that there was a forcible detainer, and appellant argues that the finding that defendant "unlawfully withholds and keeps possession of the strip of land," being silent as to force, is insufficient and therefore mere surplusage, and that in any event it is but a conclusion of law. As to the first objection, it has been held that in an action alleging forcible entry and forcible detainer, the forcible entry is the gist of the action, and the averment of forcible detainer is not stated as an independent ground for relief, but as a mere continuation or consequence of the first act. Preston v. Kehoe, 15 Cal. 318; Thompson v. Smith, 28 Cal. 532; McMinn v. Bliss, 31 Cal. 122. And our Supreme Court, in Adams v. Helbing, 107 Cal. 298, 40 P. 422, quoting from Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 P. 186, said:

"If the complaint, as in the present instance, sets forth two or more grounds for relief, either of which is sufficient to support a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, a finding upon one of such issues is sufficient, and a failure to find upon the other does not constitute a mistrial, or render the decision 'against law.'"

[3] Confusion of findings of fact and conclusions of law contrary to the provisions of section 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is not a ground for reversal, if the judgment is manifestly right. Spencer v. Duncan, 107 Cal. 423, 40 P. 549; Butler v. Agnew, 9 Cal. App. 327, 99 P. 395. And where the findings are otherwise sufficient, they will not be held defective by the inclusion of matter which may be rejected as surplusage. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 P. 868. The findings and judgment in the instant case do not contemplate or require any active compliance upon the part of appellant. The fact is obvious that by her forcible entry and moving of the fence onto the respondents' premises they were damaged, and in removing the fence and reconstructing the arch, fence, sidewalk, etc., they must necessarily incur an expense of $300. Hence, if the disputed finding be disregarded, the finding and judgment as to forcible entry and the damage incident thereto are sufficient, and are supported by the record before us.

The judgment is affirmed.

WISE v. MAXWELL HARDWARE CO.
(Civ. 6259.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Nov. 15, 1928.

1. Municipal corporations $\S$ 821(17)—What is temporary and reasonable use of sidewalk by abutting owner for reception of merchandise is fact question for jury.

Though an abutting owner has right to a temporary and reasonable use of sidewalk in front of his premises for the reception of merchandise, what is a temporary and reasonable use, and the manner of its exercise, are questions of fact depending on circumstances of particular case, to be determined by jury.

2. Trial $\S$ 142—Only where deduction to be drawn from evidence, even if undisputed, is inevitable, is court authorized to withdraw question of negligence from jury.

If conceded facts are such that reasonable minds may differ on question of negligence, question is one of fact for jury, and it is only where deduction to be drawn is inevitably one way or the other that court is authorized to withdraw question from jury.

3. Municipal corporations $\S$ 821(17)—Evidence held to require submission to jury of abutting owner's reasonable and safe use of sidewalk as to pedestrian injured by falling over merchandise thereon.

In action for injuries to pedestrian by falling over merchandise left on sidewalk in front of defendant's place of business on direction of defendant's receiving clerk, evidence held sufficient to take case to jury on question of defendant's reasonable and safe use of sidewalk.

4. Municipal corporations $\S$ 808(2)—Defendant, whose clerk instructed independent contractor to deposit goods on sidewalk, held liable for injuries to pedestrian.

Rule that abutting property owner is not ordinarily liable for injuries resulting from obstructions on sidewalk created by independent contractor held not applicable, where goods delivered to defendant were left on sidewalk in front of defendant's place of business on instructions of defendant's receiving clerk, who receipted therefor, and pedestrian fell over goods so deposited.

5. Municipal corporations $\S$ 821(25)—Pedestrian's failure to see merchandise on sidewalk over which she fell held not contributory negligence as matter of law, but presented jury question.

The mere fact that pedestrian, who had on other occasions seen goods piled on sidewalk in front of defendant's premises, failed to see merchandise over which she stumbled because she was not looking where she was going, held not to constitute contributory negligence as matter of law, but question was for jury to determine under evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Warren V. Tryon, Judge.

Action by Anna M. Wise against the Maxwell Hardware Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Breed, Burpee & Robinson and Bestor Robinson, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Eugene K. Sturgis and Cyril W. McClean, both of Oakland, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for personal injuries. Defendant, a corporation, is engaged in the business of selling hardware and other goods to the general public. It maintains a store in the city of Oakland, the main entrance to which faces on Washington street, a busy retail district, and the merchandise in which it deals is received and delivered by trucks and other vehicles in front of such entrance. On December 23, 1925, about 12:30 p. m., a truck belonging to the Madewell Manufacturing Company, operated by one of its employees, arrived at the sidewalk elevator of defendant company with certain hardware to be delivered to it. The driver of the truck made his presence known to defendant's receiving clerk, who was in the basement of defendant's store at the time. Because of orders of the police department, requiring sidewalk elevators to be closed during the midday rush hours, and by reason of the fact that the streets were crowded with Christmas shoppers, and also because certain employees of the company were absent, the driver was requested to put the goods on the sidewalk. Included in the merchandise so delivered was a pile of roof capping. It consisted of pieces of galvanized iron, V-shaped, about 10 or 12 feet in length and 8 or 10 inches in height, wired together. It was not crated or protected in any manner, and its color was almost the same as that of the sidewalk. The merchandise was placed parallel to the curb of the street and at a distance variously estimated at from 4 to 18 inches from the outer edge thereof. Between the hours of 1 and 2 o'clock p. m. of the day mentioned, plaintiff was walking along the outer edge of the sidewalk within 18 inches of the curb when she tripped over the capping and fell, sustaining injuries consisting of contusions, lacerations, and a fracture of the bones of the forearm which required treatment for a period of over six months. The injury is permanent in character. Trial was had by jury, which resulted in a verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $3,000. From this judgment defendant appeals. As ground for reversal it is first claimed that defendant was not guilty of negligence as the mere placing of goods near the curb of a street for a short period of time constitutes neither negligence nor the creation of a nuisance, and that there is no evidence to sustain the implied finding of the jury on these two questions. It is further claimed that even assuming there was negligence in leaving the roof capping on the sidewalk, such negligence was that of an independent contractor for which defendant could not be held liable.

[1, 2] While it is true that an abutting owner on a street has the right to a temporary and reasonable use of the sidewalk in front of his premises for the reception of merchandise, the question of what is a temporary and reasonable use and the manner of its exercise are questions of fact depending upon all the circumstances of the particular case, to be determined by the jury under proper instructions. Fisher v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 21 Cal. App. 677, 681, 132 P. 767; 19 Cal. Jur., p. 139. It is very rare that a set of circumstances is presented which enables a court to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has or has not been shown, and it is only where the deduction to be drawn is inevitably one way or the other, that the court is authorized to withdraw the question from the jury. This is true even where there is no conflict in the evidence if different conclusions on the subject can be rationally drawn therefrom. If the conceded facts are such that reasonable minds might differ upon the question as to whether or not one was negligent, the question is one of fact for the jury. Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 P. 1006; Johnson v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 154 Cal. 294, 97 P. 520. It is a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 P. 513.

[3] Here there was evidence to show that defendant company maintained two sidewalk elevators in front of the entrance to their premises, one of which was open at the time of the accident. It also appears that the street was a busy shopping district and the goods had remained on the sidewalk for over two hours. There was also evidence to show the manner in which the merchandise was arranged, its character, and the likelihood of it being seen and of pedestrians falling over it. These and all the other facts and circumstances were proper for the jury to consider in determining the question of the reasonable and safe use of the sidewalk.

[4] Nor is there any merit in the claim that the negligence was that of an independent contractor. There can be no question that an abutting property owner is not ordinarily liable for injuries resulting from obstructions created by an independent contractor. Where, however, he knows of the dangerous condition, or as a careful, prudent man should have known of it, the rule is otherwise. Frassi v. McDonald, 122 Cal. 400, 55 P. 139, 772; Wile v. Los Angeles Ice Storage Co., 2 Cal. App. 190, 83 P. 271; Heath v. Manson, 147 Cal. 694, 82 P. 331; 19 Cal. Jur., p. 138. Here there was evidence to show that the receiving clerk receipted for the goods and gave instruction for their deposit on the sidewalk.

[5] The further claim is made that plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law. In this connection it is claimed the evidence shows that plaintiff had at other times seen goods piled on the sidewalk, and at the time of the accident she was not looking where she was going, but was paying attention to children and passers-by, near the center of the sidewalk. Plaintiff had a right to a safe sidewalk; she also had a right to be where she was, and the mere fact that she failed to see the merchandise did not constitute contributory negligence on her part as a matter of law. There was evidence to show that the merchandise was of a low height and the same color as the sidewalk, which facts might account for lack of visibility. Mere abstraction on her part did not constitute contributory negligence. Du Val v. Boos Bros. Cafeteria Co., 45 Cal. App. 377, 187 P. 767; Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 103 P. 190. The question of contributory negligence was one for the jury to determine. Whether or not plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is similar to the question relating to plaintiffs' negligence. From the facts as presented reasonable men might draw different inferences. Under such circumstances the question becomes one of fact. It is a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference but that defendant was guilty of contributory negligence. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., supra.

And, finally, it is claimed that the court erred in the giving and refusing to give certain instructions. We have examined the instructions and they fully and fairly state the law upon the issues involved.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STANICH. (Cr. 1715.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 13, 1928.

1. Chattel mortgages $\Leftrightarrow$ 230—Removing mortgaged personal property from county without written consent of mortgagee is felony (Pen. Code, § 538).

Removal of mortgaged personal property from county without written consent of mortgagee constitutes a felony, under Pen. Code, § 538.

2. Criminal law $\Leftrightarrow$ 970(7)—Defendant, not having raised by demurrer questions, which could have been so raised, cannot raise such questions for first time on motion to strike judgment of conviction from record.

Where defendant did not raise objections that statute of limitations had run, or that there was misjoinder, in that two felonies were charged, or technical objection regarding phraseology of information on demurrer at time of trial, he cannot be heard to raise such questions for first time on motion to strike judgment of conviction from record.

3. Indictment and information $\Leftrightarrow$ 59—Where acts constituting offense are sufficiently stated, failure to name offense does not vitiate.

Where acts constituting offense are sufficiently stated, failure to give name to offense, or failure to give its proper legal appellation, is merely defect of form, and does not vitiate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Eliot Craig, Judge.

Enid Stanich pleaded guilty to charge of committing a felony, and afterwards filed a motion to strike from the record the judgment of conviction. From an order denying the motion, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Josiah Coombs, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

YORK, J. [1] Several years ago the defendant was in court to answer to a felony information, which was at least not a model information. It started out with an attempt to charge "incumbering mortgaged property, a felony," but failed to allege that such incumbrance was made without giving notice in writing to the person holding the mortgage, or to whom the second mortgage was to be given. However, the information also did allege the removal of the same mortgaged personal property from the county wherein the first mortgage was given, without the written consent of the mortgagee, which fact as alleged constituted a felony. Pen. Code, § 538.

The information was sufficient as to the removal charge, even if it was defective as to the first charge; and it was misleading and subject to demurrer for uncertainty as to which of the two alleged charges of felony was to be relied on, and as to whether it was meant to be made on two counts or on one count only. However, the record discloses the fact that no demurrer of any kind was ever filed, and the defendant pleaded "guilty as charged in the information," was sentenced to the penitentiary as for one offense only, has served his sentence, was released upon parole, and, his term of parole having then expired, his attorney on May 26th last, for the first time, made an objection to the form of the information by filing a notice of motion to, and did appear in the superior court to make a motion to, strike from the record the judgment of conviction, on the ground that the court did not have jurisdiction of the offense, basing such motion on the ground that the information failed to charge an offense under the statute at the time the defendant was convicted.

The superior court denied the motion, and the matter comes to this court on appeal from such order denying the motion of the defendant. None of the cases cited cover a similar record or situation, unless we can consider decisions rendered when the question of the sufficiency of the information is raised in hearings on petitions for writs of habeas corpus filed when the defendant is still in custody serving his term.

The rule laid down in the habeas corpus cases, which we will hereafter quote, seems to be applicable because in the instant case no question was raised in the superior court as to the sufficiency of the information. As was said in Ex parte Grenall, 153 Cal. 767, quoting from page 770, 96 P. 804, 806:

"Counsel for respondent contends that, if there is in this state such an offense or crime as that of which petitioner was convicted, the insufficiency of the complaint is immaterial on habeas corpus, citing Ex parte Ruef, 150 Cal. 665, 89 P. 605. The rule of the Ruef Case has never been applied by this court to proceedings in courts of inferior, as distinguished from courts of general, jurisdiction. To the contrary, it has been the uniform practice to consider on habeas corpus the question of the sufficiency of the complaint in such inferior courts, and to discharge the prisoner where such complaint failed to show a public offense under the laws of the state. This matter was fully considered in Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212, where the distinction between the two classes of courts was stated, and where the prisoner was discharged solely because of the insufficiency of the complaint in this regard. That decision has never been modified. In the Ruef Case we were considering the question with relation to a proceeding pending in a court of general jurisdiction, the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, while here we have a proceeding in a court which has uniformly been treated as an inferior court, a justice's court. Ex parte Kearny, 55 Cal. 212."

As was said in Kitts v. Superior Court, 5 Cal. App. 469, 90 P. 980, and in the opinion by the court in the case of Harris v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. App. 15, quoting from page 31, 196 P. 895, 901:

"We think the true rule is that where an indictment purports or attempts to state an offense of a kind of which the court assuming to proceed has jurisdiction, the question whether the facts charged are sufficient to constitute an offense of that kind will not be examined into on habeas corpus. Here the indictments clearly attempt to charge extortion, a crime defined by section 518 et seq. of the Penal Code, and within the jurisdiction of the superior court."

Quoting further from Harris v. Superior Court, supra:

"The rule so declared in the Ruef Case has since been uniformly followed by this court. See, also, In re Hughes, 159 Cal. 360, 362, 113 P. 684. It was expressly held to apply in regard to the remedy by prohibition in Whitney v. Superior Court, 182 Cal. 114, 187 P. 12. In the case at bar the indictment clearly attempted to charge the offense on the part of an executive officer of agreeing to receive a bribe, a crime defined by section 68 of the Penal Code, and it was for the superior court, in the exercise of its jurisdiction and subject to review on appeal from the judgment, to determine as to the sufficiency of the facts stated to show such crime. The alleged defect in the indictment is not available as a ground for prohibiting the superior court from proceeding with the trial of the cause."

[2, 3] The judgment on the plea of guilty is just as good as on a plea of not guilty and verdict against the defendant. Although it is true that the defendant does not waive jurisdiction by a plea of guilty if the court never acquired jurisdiction, however, it appears to this court upon an examination of the entire record that the defendant could have demurred at the time of the trial upon any of the grounds which he has raised at this time, and that he cannot now be heard to raise for the first time on this motion the questions, first, that the statute of limitations had run against the crime charged; or, second, that there was a misjoinder in that two felonies were charged in the information; or, third, that the phraseology of the information was such that it might be construed so that the defendant would be charged with a felony in an allegation in which was commingled an allegation of an act which was not a felony, there being no separate count setting forth the charge that the defendant removed mortgaged property out of the county where the property had been mortgaged. The allegation was that he had incumbered mortgaged personal property with intent to defraud, etc. These objections would not, of course, be on the ground that the information did not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, but would be technical objections to the phraseology of the information, in that it was uncertain or did not give the defendant a chance to prepare his defense. There is no question but that it was a felony to remove mortgaged personal property from the county as alleged in the information, and it may be that the court considered his plea of guilty only as a plea to this charge as he was sentenced as for one offense only. "Where the acts constituting an offense are sufficiently stated, a failure to give any name to the offense, or a failure to give its proper legal appellation is merely a defect of form which does not vitiate." 14 Cal. Jur. p. 54; People v. Izlar, 8 Cal. App. 600, 604, 97 P. 685.

There being nothing in the record to show otherwise, the order of the trial court denying the motion to set aside judgment herein is affirmed.

LONDON v. ROBINSON et al. (Civ. 6306.) ★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 14, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 14, 1929.

1. Municipal corporations ☞601—Ordinance amending previous zoning ordinance providing that provisions were not retroactive as to existing permits did not preclude erection of building under permit theretofore issued.

Where original zoning ordinance provided that its provisions were not to be retroactive so far as existing permits were concerned, and provided for application of provisions to any area thereafter transferred to another district, restrictive provisions of amending ordinance, containing no provision making the change retroactive, did not operate to forbid erection of building for which a permit had been issued prior to passage of ordinance.

2. Municipal corporations ☞601—Zoning ordinance applied only from effective date.

A zoning ordinance enacted by municipality applied only from date on which it took effect.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

Action by L. London against L. B. Robinson and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Tum Suden & Tum Suden, of San Francisco, for appellants.

C. F. Nichols and Carl E. Day, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. In this action the plaintiff sought a decree restraining the owner, Robinson, and the contractor, Moren, from erecting a building on Hillpoint avenue near Parnassus avenue in San Francisco. In his complaint the plaintiff alleges that such erection would be in violation of certain zoning ordinances.

Heretofore Ordinance 5464 (N. S.) was enacted. Thereafter the defendant Robinson purchased a lot on Hillpoint avenue, adopted plans and specifications for the erection of a building, entered into a contract therefor, and a building permit was issued to him. All fees were paid, and thereafter the building contract, together with plans and specifications, was filed for record in the recorder's office at 11:15 a. m. on July 27, 1925. In the meantime such proceedings were had that Ordinance 6708 (N. S.) was framed and was passed by the board of supervisors during the afternoon of July 27, 1925. By the terms of the charter of the city of San Francisco the last-named ordinance took effect August 7, 1925. On August 13, 1925, this suit was commenced. It is based on the theory that, after the enactment of Ordinance 6708 (N. S.), the right of the defendants to proceed with the erection of the building ceased. The trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed.

[1] Among other contentions, the defendants assert that they have not violated any ordinance. We think the assertion is well founded. Turning first to the provisions of the ordinance first enacted, it will be found that section 9 was not intended to make unlawful buildings and uses then in existence or use. Turning next to the provisions of section 17, it is clear that the entire section is addressed to buildings not constructed, but for which permits had theretofore been duly issued. The language used in that section shows clearly that it was addressed to situations as they existed on the date that Ordinance 5464 took effect, and not otherwise. Furthermore, that section clearly indicates that said ordinance was not to be retroactive so far as said permits were concerned. That same ordinance provided that alterations or changes in districts might be made. Then in the second paragraph of section 11 we find the following:

"If any area is hereafter transferred to another district * * * the provisions of this ordinance in regard to the premises or building existing at the time of the passage of this ordinance shall apply * * * in such transferred area."

If it be said that the passage just quoted refers to "premises and buildings," but does not mention uncompleted buildings, still the plaintiff is not helped, because there is then no provision making the change retroactive, as that passage does not contain retroactive language.

[2] Turning to the amending Ordinance No. 6708 (N. S.), it will be found that it is wholly silent regarding its provisions having any retroactive effect. The amendment is confined to a direct reference to Ordinance No. 5464 (N. S.), and then adds that it is amended as follows:

"Section 6 of the use of property zone maps, constituting a part of said ordinance, is hereby ordered changed so as to place both sides of Hillpoint avenue from Parnassus avenue to its northerly termination and extending to the depth of the rear lot lines, in the first residential district instead of the second residential district."

As stated above, it took effect August 7, 1925. Under well-established rules, it spoke only from that date. In 43 C. J. 574, the general rule is stated as follows:

"As is the case with statutes, ordinances or by-laws operate in the future only, and are never to be given a retroactive effect if susceptible of any other construction. An intention that a statute or an ordinance shall have a retroactive operation is not to be presumed, but must be manifested by clear and unequivocal language, and in case of doubt the statute or ordinance must be construed to have a prospective effect only."

In the same text at page 344 we find the following:

"Zoning regulations ordinarily have no retroactive effect unless the authorizing legislation specifically so states. By force of statute or ordinance zoning regulations may not have the effect of revoking permits for buildings granted prior to their adoption."

The rule last stated is the rule of construction concerning the effect of ordinances in general prescribing building regulations. 43 C. J. 330.

It follows that the defendants were within their rights in proceeding to erect the building in controversy; that their rights have not been lost; and that the judgment should be reversed. It is so ordered.

In re NOVOTNY'S ESTATE. (Civ. 6236.)★

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 15, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 10, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 14, 1928.

1. Wills ☞310, 400—Probate judge weighs testimony and circumstances attending execution of will, and his determination on sufficient testimony that witness was not present is final.

It is the function of the probate judge to weigh testimony and circumstances attending the execution of the will, and probate court's determination on sufficient testimony that attesting witness was not present at execution of will cannot be reversed on appeal.

2. Wills ☞302(1)—Determination of probate court denying probate, under conflicting testimony as to presence of witnesses when will was executed, held justified.

Probate court's decision denying probate to will under conflicting testimony as to whether attesting witnesses were present at time will was executed held warranted under evidence, where attorney, who testified in behalf of will, was instrumental in procuring appointment of his son-in-law as guardian under the will.

3. Attorney and client ☞20—Court, in will contest, could permit counsel, representing surviving husband, as contestant, to represent husband as guardian ad litem for minor daughter.

In proceedings for contest of will, court did not err in permitting counsel for surviving husband of deceased, as contestant, to also represent surviving husband in his capacity as guardian ad litem for minor daughter, since court, in exercise of his discretion, may permit counsel for contestants to cross-examine witnesses.

4. Wills ☞400—Refusal to admit testimony in will contest held not ground for reversal, where court permitted stipulation that witness would testify as claimed.

In will contest, court's refusal to admit testimony impeaching one of attesting witnesses held not ground for reversal, where court permitted stipulation that witness, if present, would testify according to counsel's statement in offer of proof.

5. Wills ☞305—Statement of testatrix of purpose to make will protecting mother held immaterial in will contest based upon noncompliance with requirements concerning execution.

In proceeding for contest of will on ground that formal requirements of execution were not complied with, testimony that testatrix had expressed purpose of making will to protect her mother held immaterial.

6. Wills ☞292—In will contest, exclusion of evidence that no unreasonable compensation could be paid attorney's son-in-law for services as trustee held not error.

In will contest, in which it was claimed that will was executed, in the absence of one of the attesting witnesses, court did not err in refusing to hear proof that there could be no unreasonable compensation paid attorney's son-in-law for services as trustee, since amount of compensation would be determined by order of court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Arthur Keetch, Judge.

Proceedings by Charles Lantz for the probate of the will of Grace L. Novotny, deceased. Before probate, contest was filed by Gustave Novotny on his own behalf and as guardian ad litem for Jean Ann Novotny. From judgment denying probate, proponent appeals. Affirmed.

Winslow P. Hyatt, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Hibbard & Kleindienst, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. This is an appeal by proponent from a judgment denying probate to the instrument offered as the last will and testament of Grace L. Novotny, deceased. Before probate, a contest was filed by the surviving husband on his own behalf and as guardian ad litem of his minor daughter, Jean Ann Novotny. The contest was tried before a jury, and resulted in a disagreement. The court then set the hearing of the formal proof of the will before himself, and as a matter of grace permitted counsel for the contestants to cross-examine the witnesses. Frances Avery, one of the subscribing witnesses, called by the court, testified, in substance, that she had known Mrs. Novotny for about three and one-half years before her death, and in the capacity of a practical nurse had helped to take care of the deceased as well as her infant child, Jean; that about three days before the execution of the will Mrs. Novotny's mother had visited her daughter, and raised "Ned in general" because her daughter was married to Mr. Novotny, and "wanted her to leave him," because "all he married her for was what she had," and "told her daughter that she had no business to get married until she was dead"; that on the following day, at the request of Mrs. Novotny, she called Mr. Lantz, an attorney, and the proponent of the will, who came and talked with the deceased alone for about an hour. Two days later, and on August 2d, Mr. Lantz returned, and asked Mrs. Avery to leave the room, and during her absence therefrom, and while caring for the child, Mr. Lantz called her back; that, when she returned to the room, proponent was holding a white paper in his hand, which he asked her if she would sign. When she answered in the affirmative, he asked Mrs. Novotny if she wanted the witness to sign, and Mrs. Novotny said, "Why, will you?" to which she also replied in the affirmative. The witness further testified that proponent then inquired who would be the other witness, and answered his own question by suggesting his son, who was waiting in an automobile outside. While Mrs. Avery was getting pen and ink, Mr. Lantz called his son. A soon as the son came in, Mrs. Avery signed the paper, and immediately left the room. She further testified that she did not see the other witness, Mr. Lantz's son, sign, nor did she see Mrs. Novotny sign, nor did Mrs. Novotny say she had signed, or that the instrument was her will; that all she saw at the time was one sheet of paper without a cover, whereas it appears that the instrument proposed consisted of three pages and cover. She also says that, when Mr. Lantz placed the sheet of paper before her for her signature, he folded it, and that she did not even read the attestation clause. In this connection the stenographer of proponent testified that she typewrote the will for her employer, and handed the pieces of paper to him without fastening them together. There was also testimony substantiating what appears from the face of the signature itself, to wit, that a line drawn under the signature of Grace L. Novotny was drawn after the signature was appended. On cross-examination by counsel for proponent Mrs. Avery was questioned as follows:

"Q. Now, do you remember Mr. Lantz asking the question of Mrs. Novotny what that was when he handed her that paper?"

"A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And what did she say?"

"A. He says, 'Do you remember what you got in your hands or what you are signing?' And then she asked him, and he says, 'Why, it is your will.'

"Q. Let me get that wording, just that answer again, please. (The reporter read the answer.)

"Q. Isn't it a fact that Mr. Lantz asked Mrs. Novotny at that time the question 'What is this?' and is it not a fact that Mrs. Novotny said 'That is my will?'" (No response.)

"Q. Did you understand the question? A. Read the question over again, please. (The reporter read the question.)

"A. He asked her if she knew what she was signing or what this paper was, and she hesitated, she didn't know, and he says, 'Isn't it a fact you are signing your will?'

"Q. And what did she say to that?"

"A. 'Oh.'

"Q. What is that?"

"A. 'Oh.'

"Q. She just said 'Oh,' and then after that she asked you to write—to sign your name to it?"

"A. No, not after that. She asked me before that."

The other subscribing witness, C. Chapman Lantz, testified that the will was signed by Mrs. Novotny and declared to be her last will in the presence of himself and Mrs. Avery, and that they signed in the presence of each other.

In general, the will devised all of the property to Charles Lantz, but, nevertheless, in trust for the purpose of paying the income to Mrs. Novotny's mother during her lifetime, or in the event that her husband died before she did without adequate provision for their daughter, for the purpose of distributing the income to the daughter and mother in a proportion to be determined by the trustee. The will also provided for the termination of the trust and the distribution of the funds to the daughter Jean Ann Novotny, after the death of her grandmother, and upon attaining her majority. The husband was left nothing. Charles Lantz was also nominated guardian of the estate of the daughter, in the event one became necessary, and, in the event of the resignation, death, or disability of Charles Lantz, T. A. Box, Jr., shown by the testimony to be proponent's son-in-law, was to act as trustee, and also as executor in the place of Mr. Lantz, under the same circumstances. Mr. Lantz's testimony shows that he recommended his son-in-law to Mrs. Novotny for the appointment, and wrote his name into the will with pen and ink in blank spaces provided therefor.

[1, 2] In this situation appellant urges three reasons as grounds for reversal: First, that the formal proof of the will was complete and all statutory requirements complied with; second, that the court erred in permitting the guardian ad litem of the minor daughter to participate in opposing the probate of the will; and, third, that the court erred in refusing to permit proponent to introduce certain additional testimony.

In support of his first contention, the appellant asserts that, even though Mrs. Avery had stepped into the kitchen, i. e., into another room of the apartment at the time Mrs. Novotny signed the will, she was nevertheless in the presence of the testatrix and "of the other witness to the will." He also argues that, when from some cause or another a subscribing witness to a will testifies contrary to the solemn act of attestation, the testimony should be weighed with grave suspicion. While it is true that there was no door between the bedroom, in which it is said Mrs. Novotny signed the instrument, and the kitchen, yet the wall between the two, according to the plat which was introduced, practically covered the head of the bed. Mrs. Avery was positive in her assertion that she was not present when Mrs. Novotny signed the instrument, and also that she did not acknowledge it to be her signature. It is undoubtedly the function of the probate judge to weigh the testimony and all of the circumstances attending the execution of the purported will for the purpose of deciding whether Mrs. Avery was present when the instrument was signed by the deceased, or whether the deceased acknowledged it to be her signature. That court having determined, upon sufficient testimony, that she was not present, it certainly cannot be said that as a matter of law we can declare the contrary. It may well be true that under some circumstances the probate judge should view with suspicion the testimony of a subscribing witness who denies the solemn act of attestation, yet it must not only be borne in mind that the witness here says she had no opportunity to read the attestation clause or see the instrument which she was witnessing, but also that the attorney who was in charge of the formalities of execution, and into whose keeping the will was intrusted, and whose son was called by his own suggestion, was to profit by the terms of the will. While he was not a beneficiary or legatee for his own use, nevertheless the fees to be paid him for acting as executor, also as trustee and perhaps as guardian of an estate shown by the testimony to approximate $20,000, may have been properly considered by the court in relation to other circumstances as tending to throw doubt upon the testimony of proponent and his son, C. Chapman Lantz. Courts go so far as to say that, where there is the confidential relationship of attorney and client between the testatrix and a beneficiary, coupled with activity of the latter in the preparation of a will, a presumption of undue influence arises. Estate of Witt, 198 Cal. 407, 420, 245 P. 197. With this rule in mind it is obvious that the probate judge was fully justified in viewing with caution testimony of the attorney and his son. We find nothing inconsistent with this view in either the Estate of Tyler, 121 Cal. 405, 53 P. 928, or Estate of Dow, 181 Cal. 106, 183 P. 794, relied upon by appellant. In both of the authorities cited, the trial court held the will to have been executed with proper formalities. In the Tyler Case the only subscribing witness alive had forgotten the details attending the execution, and it was held that a presumption of due execution arose upon proof of the signatures of the testator and witnesses. In the Dow Case the court, after pointing out that the will was actually signed in the bodily presence of the testatrix, says:

"The most that can be said in favor of the appellant on the question as to whether or not the subscribing witness, Kinsman, signed the will when the testatrix was asleep is that the evidence upon this point is so conflicting that the finding of the trial court upon the question is conclusive on this court."

So here, the finding of the court cannot be disturbed.

[3] The next attack of appellant upon the judgment is conclusively repulsed by the authority of the Estate of Relph, 192 Cal. 451, 221 P. 361. To use the language of the appellant, the point made is:

"The court erred in permitting the guardian of the infant Jean Ann Novotny to participate in opposing the probate of the will of her mother, the guardian having a personal interest, adverse to his ward."

In the case mentioned the Supreme Court says:

"When a will is contested before probate there are two separate and distinct proceedings pending before the court. One is the petition for the probate of the will; the other is the contest of the probate of the will. (Estate of Latour, 140 Cal. 414, 73 P. 1070, 74 P. 441; Estate of McDermott, 148 Cal. 43, 49, 82 P. 842; Estate of Cullberg, 169 Cal. 365, 146 P. 888.) The petition for the probate of a will is distinctly a proceeding in rem. (Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 585, 150 P. 989; Estate of Allen, 176 Cal. 632, 169 P. 364.) The petitioner or proponent appears therein as plaintiff and tenders to all of the world all of the issues of fact relevant to the ultimate question of the validity of the will. While all persons interested in the estate are in a sense parties defendant thereto, there are no defendants in the sense of active parties litigant in this proceeding. It is in a sense an ex parte proceeding, in which the burden rests upon the petitioner to prove all the material allegations of his petition, whether denied or not, and the responsibility is upon the court to guard and protect the interests of all persons interested therein. * * * In the proceeding for the probate of the will, as distinguished from the proceedings upon the contest, the evidence and the issues of fact are solely for the consideration and determination of the court, even though a jury may have been demanded and impaneled for the trial of the issues upon the contest. (Estate of Latour, supra; Estate of McDermott, supra.) The contestants are not parties to this proceeding and have no right to appear therein (Estate of Latour, supra), but the trial court, having itself the right to cross-examine the witnesses produced therein, may, in the exercise of its discretion, permit counsel for contestants so to do. (Estate of Cullberg, supra.) But when such permission is granted it is as a matter of grace and not in recognition of a right possessed by contestants."

It could not possibly have affected the rights of appellant whether the counsel to whom the grace was extended represented the surviving husband alone or the husband in his individual capacity and as guardian ad litem of his minor daughter.

[4] Appellant also assigns the refusal of the court to admit certain testimony as reason for a reversal. The first instance complained of consists of an offer upon the part of the appellant to produce a witness who would testify that Mrs. Avery had "told her that Mr. Lantz had been there and that Grace had made her will," to which the court replied:

"It may be stipulated that Mrs. Peterson would so testify if she were here, because I heard what she said in the other case," [the contest] "and it would not affect my decision in the matter in the slightest."

A recital of the circumstances is sufficient to demonstrate that appellant has nothing of which to complain.

[5, 6] Counsel next offered testimony to show that Mrs. Novotny, in conversation with friends, had expressed the purpose of making a will to protect her mother during the latter's lifetime. Counsel has not pointed out to us in what manner the proffered testimony would have borne upon the question of the due execution of the will, and we can perceive no way in which it could have been enlightening to the court below. Nor are we able to find any merit in the complaint of appellant that the court refused to hear proof that there could be no unreasonable compensation paid to Mr. Lantz for his services as trustee, for the reason that the amount of compensation would be determined by order of court.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte BRYANT.

District Court of Appeal, First District,
Division 2, California. Nov. 16, 1928.

1. Criminal law ☞238—Proof of defendant's abandonment of children warranted justice in holding defendant to answer to superior court, notwithstanding absence of direct testimony that nonsupport was willful (Pen. Code, § 270).

Proof of defendant's abandonment and nonsupport of children, without direct testimony that nonsupport was willful or without lawful excuse, warranted justice in holding defendant to answer to superior court, under Pen. Code, § 270, where defendant did not establish that nonsupport was excusable.

2. Witnesses ☞293—Statute making proof of father's abandonment of children prima facie evidence abandonment was willful held not to require self-incrimination (Pen. Code, § 270; Const. art. 1, § 13).

Pen. Code, § 270, making proof of father's abandonment and desertion of children prima facie proof that abandonment was willful and without excuse merely fixes quantum of evidence necessary to establish guilt, and does not violate Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that no person in criminal case shall be compelled to be a witness against himself.

3. Criminal law ☞108(1)—Venue of prosecution of father for abandonment of children was properly laid in county of residence of mother who had custody of children and supported them (Pen. Code, § 270).

In prosecution of father for abandonment of children under Pen. Code, § 270, venue was properly laid in county where mother resided, where children were in her custody and maintained by her.

4. Criminal law ☞108(1)—Venue of prosecution for child desertion is properly laid in county where children are supported (Pen. Code, § 270).

Venue of offense of child desertion, denounced by Pen. Code, § 270, is properly laid and proved in county where defendant's children were supported and maintained.

Application by Albert Bryant for habeas corpus, to be directed to the Sheriff of San Benito County. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

James Snell, of Hollister, for petitioner.

A. M. Runnells, Dist. Atty., of Hollister, for respondent.

PRESTON, Justice pro tem. Albert Bryant, the petitioner, is now in the custody of the sheriff of San Benito county, and seeks his release on habeas corpus.

The facts revealed by the record are briefly these: Petitioner is the father of two minor children. He abandoned his wife and these two children in San Benito county in 1922. His wife obtained a divorce in San Benito county in 1924, and the custody of the children was awarded to her, and she and the children since 1924 have continuously resided, and now reside, in Hollister, San Benito county, Cal. Petitioner has been absent from San Benito county since 1922 and his whereabouts unknown to his wife and children, and he has not since 1922 contributed anything whatever towards the support of said children, nor has he visited or attempted to visit or communicate with them since 1924. In July, 1928, petitioner was located, arrested, brought back to San Benito county, and charged with a violation of section 270 of the Penal Code. The charging part of the complaint which was filed in Hollister township, San Benito county, is as follows:

"That said Albert Bryant on or about the 19th day of July, 1928, at and in said County of San Benito, State of California, who was then and there the father of two minor children, to wit, Alberta Bryant and Edna Bryant, did wilfully, unlawfully and without lawful excuse, omit to furnish said minor children with necessary food, clothing, shelter, medical attendance and other remedial care."

A preliminary examination was had before the justice of the peace of said township, and the petitioner was held to answer to the superior court for failing to support his minor children, and, in default of bail, was committed to the custody of the sheriff. Thereafter, and on the 30th day of July, 1928, the district attorney of San Benito county filed an information against him, charging him with the same offense. The case has not been tried in the superior court. On August 8, 1928, the petition for a writ of habeas corpus was filed in this court.

[1] The first contention made on behalf of petitioner is that the evidence produced at the preliminary examination fails to show that any public offense has been committed. This contention is grounded entirely upon the fact that there was no direct testimony introduced at the preliminary examination that petitioner's failure to support his children was "willful and without lawful excuse." The statute itself, however (section 270, Pen. Code), makes this proof unnecessary. Mrs. Bryant testified that petitioner abandoned her and the children in 1922, and since that time has contributed nothing to the support of the children. This proof meets all the requirements of the statute.

The statute itself (section 270) makes proof of abandonment or desertion of a child by the father, or proof of the father's omission to furnish his child with necessary food, clothing, shelter, or medical attendance, or other remedial care, prima facie evidence that such abandonment, desertion, or omission was "willful and without lawful excuse." The petitioner offered no evidence to overcome the prima facie showing made by the prosecution; therefore the justice of the peace was warranted in holding petitioner to answer to the superior court.

[2] Petitioner contends that section 270, in so far as it attempts to make proof of abandonment, desertion, or omission, etc., prima facie proof that such omission or abandonment was willful and without lawful excuse, is in violation of that part of section 13, art. 1, of the Constitution, which states that "no person shall * * * be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law." We cannot agree with this contention. Section 270 merely fixes the quantum of evidence which, until overcome, establishes beyond a reasonable doubt the guilt of a defendant charged with a violation of that section; it does not compel a defendant to be a witness against himself.

The same principle is involved in section 1105 of the Penal Code. Under that section, when the people have proved the killing, and no evidence has been given tending to prove justification, they have performed the task imposed upon them, and have proved prima facie the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt.

By reason of the statutory rule of evidence laid down in section 1105 the prima facie case of the prosecution can be overcome only by proof of justification, excuse, or circumstances of mitigation. People v. Rodrigo, 69 Cal. 601, 11 P. 481; People v. Mize, 80 Cal. 41, 22 P. 80. Likewise, by reason of the statutory rule of evidence laid down in section 270, the prima facie case of the prosecution can be overcome only by proof that the omission on the part of petitioner to furnish his children necessary food, clothing, etc., was not willful and was excusable.

[3, 4] It is also contended that the evidence fails to show that any offense was committed in the county of San Benito. There is no merit in this contention. The venue of the offense denounced by section 270 of the Penal Code is properly laid and proved in the county where the children were supported or maintained. Here the children were in the custody of their mother and maintained by her in San Benito county. The mother's place of residence determines the question as to jurisdiction. 20 Cal. Jur. 425, and cases there cited.

Other contentions made on behalf of petitioner are without merit and require no discussion.

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of San Benito county.

PEOPLE v. THOMAS. (Cr. 3158.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1928.

Homicide §145—Law presumes guilty intent, where uncontradicted evidence in murder case showed defendant was actuated by deliberate and premeditated malice (Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 1).

Where uncontradicted evidence in murder case showed that defendant was actuated by deliberate and premeditated malice and was bent on killing, and defendant did not testify or offer any evidence in his own behalf, nor give any explanation or excuse for committing the offense, law presumes guilty intent, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 1.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Fred V. Wood, Judge.

Samuel Thomas was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jay Maurice, of Oakland, Henry Meadows, Frank Larche, and Larche & Mannin, all of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, and Earl Warren, of Oakland, for the People.

SHENK, J. The defendant was charged with the murder of Rose Lewis on April 29, 1928, in the county of Alameda. The jury found him guilty as charged and fixed the extreme penalty. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The case is submitted for decision on the transcript alone.

On and prior to the day of the homicide the deceased was residing at the home of a Mrs. Quintero on Fifth street, between Center and Chester streets, in the city of Oakland. Two doors removed from the Quintero home Hazel Taylor and Ruby Kelly resided. The defendant entertained some animosity toward Ruby Kelly, the cause for which is not disclosed by the evidence. He also knew Hazel Taylor. About 8 o'clock on the evening of April 29, 1928, the deceased and Ruby Kelly were standing on the front porch of the house occupied by Mrs. Kelly. The defendant approached them and inquired concerning the whereabouts of Hazel Taylor. Mrs. Kelly replied that Hazel Taylor had gone out with a young man living next door. The defendant then walked to the corner of Fifth and Center streets, and the deceased started to her home. Mrs. Kelly warned the deceased not to go home at that time, because she believed that the defendant by his actions meant trouble, and invited the deceased into her house. The deceased said, "No, I am going home," and she proceeded to do so. Ruby Kelly then went into her own home, locked the door, and peered out of her front window, which was only a few feet from the front sidewalk. She saw the deceased walking on the sidewalk toward her own home. She then saw the defendant walking at a fast pace, approach the deceased from behind, and heard him address the latter with a vile epithet, saying, "I am going to kill you." He then violently assaulted the deceased, striking her to the ground three times, and kicking her body. She also heard the deceased say, "Oh, I am not the girl." Another eyewitness heard the defendant say to the deceased, "——— don't look back and don't say a word," and heard the deceased reply, "I am not the woman you want: the woman is in the house, downstairs." Death ensued a short time after the assault. A post mortem examination disclosed that the deceased had been stabbed with a sharp instrument which penetrated the heart.

The record shows without contradiction that the defendant was actuated by deliberate and premeditated malice, and was bent upon killing. He did not testify or offer any evidence in his own behalf, and has advanced no explanation or excuse for his heinous offense. Under these circumstances the law presumes a guilty intent. Code Civ. Proc., § 1962, subd. 1. The defendant was fairly tried and convicted under full and appropriate instructions of the court. No error appears in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

George W. HICKS and Gertrude R. Hicks (His Wife), Plaintiffs and Respondents, v. George Osborne WILSON, Defendant and Appellant. (S. F. 12443.) *

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 20, 1928.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, James M. Troutt, Judge.

Knight, Boland & Christin, Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, and J. W. Radil, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Grove J. Fink, of San Francisco, and Albert L. Johnson, of Modesto, for respondents.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant Wilson from a judgment against him in an action brought to recover $3,000 alleged to be due for money paid to defendant Cokely, a realtor, as agent for defendant Wilson, on account of the purchase of real property. Defendant Wilson, the owner of the real property, refused to execute a deed conveying the same to plaintiffs. Wilson offered the sum of $600 to plaintiffs, and upon their refusal to accept the tender he placed the money in the bank and gave notice of the deposit.

The trial court found: That on November 2, 1920, Cokely was duly empowered and authorized, in writing, to sell the real property in question. That thereafter, and during the month of November, 1920, the plaintiffs entered into a binding contract of purchase of said property. That the authorization of the agent included the following: "I authorize said W. H. Cokely to accept a deposit on account of the purchase price of said property and give receipt therefor in my name." That plaintiffs, during the month of November, 1920, deposited with and in the hands of the defendant Cokely, as the agent of defendant Wilson, and for and on account of said defendant Wilson, the sum of $3,000 as a part of the purchase price of the property, for which payment a receipt was duly issued by the agent. That on December 1, 1920, defendant Wilson was apprised of the fact that plaintiffs were making payments, on account of the purchase price, to Cokely, and on December 2, 1920, after receiving information from the plaintiffs as to the payments by them to Cokely, defendant Wilson received the sum of $500 from his agent Cokely on account of said purchase price. That thereafter, by letter of December 27, 1920, to plaintiffs, defendant Wilson attempted, for the first time, to repudiate the actions of his agent, Cokely.

It was also found that the delivery of the $3,000 by the plaintiffs to defendant Cokely, as agent for defendant Wilson, was made prior to the delivery of the premises involved by defendant Wilson to plaintiffs and prior to defendant Wilson's notice to plaintiffs not to pay any more money to said Cokely; that, at all times between November 2, 1920, and December 27, 1920, the defendant Wilson held out Cokely as his agent for the consummation of the sale herein and in the beginning expressly told plaintiffs to do business with him. It is also found that defendant Wilson refused and still refuses to deliver a deed to the property and also refuses to return to plaintiffs their partial payment of $3,000 made upon the purchase of the premises.

On substantially the same facts this case has been before this court on a prior appeal (Hicks v. Wilson, 197 Cal. 269, 240 P. 289), where this court adopted the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, in which that court answered and met every argument made by appellants upon the present appeal. We decline to discuss these same arguments again. This is the third occasion upon which the overcrowded calendars of the appellate courts of this state have been further burdened with this case. The record discloses that the merits of the case are entirely with the plaintiffs, as is also the law. The case presented upon the second trial, as the findings herein set forth will indicate, differs in no substantial particular from the case set forth in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal upon the former appeal, which opinion and decision was considered and approved by this court in the decision we have cited. There is no possible justification for a second appeal, after the first decision stating the law of the case, and clearly and emphatically discussing the arguments made by appellant, and differentiating from the instant case the authorities upon which he relies. The plaintiffs in this case have been deprived of their money now for about eight years, due to this protracted litigation.

The judgment is affirmed, with the addition of a fine of $250, to be paid by appellant for a frivolous appeal.

RANKIN v. DE BARE. (S. F. 12003.) ★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Limitation of actions §55(6)—Where trespass is of permanent nature, entire cause of action accrues when trespass is committed, as regards limitations.

Where injury or trespass is of a permanent nature, all damages, past and prospective, are recoverable in one action, and entire cause of action accrues when injury is suffered or trespass committed, as regards limitations.

2. Limitation of actions §32—Where defendant constructed building resting partly on plaintiff's lot, May 1, 1917, action for damages commenced January 5, 1923, held barred (Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 2).

Where defendant constructed building on his lot, which rested partly on plaintiff's adjoining lot, on or about May 1, 1917, action for damages and for restitution of premises, commenced January 5, 1923, held barred under Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 2.

3. Injunction §113—Where building resting partly on plaintiff's lot was built in 1917, plaintiff commencing action in 1923, could not have mandatory injunction because of delay.

Where defendant's building, resting partly on plaintiff's lot, was constructed about May 1, 1917, and plaintiff commenced action for damages and for restitution of premises January 5, 1923, case was not one for mandatory injunction to compel defendant to remove his building from portion of plaintiff's land, in view of plaintiff's long delay in asserting his rights.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action for damages and for restitution of premises by Augustus H. Rankin against Joseph De Bare, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Reversed.

James T. O'Keefe, of Redwood City, J. E. McCurdy, of San Mateo, and John Ralph Wilson, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph F. O'Malley and Albert Picard, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHENK, J. On January 5, 1923, when this action was commenced, the plaintiff was the owner of lot 15, block 1, Hillcrest, in Daly City, San Mateo county. At the same time the defendant was the owner of the adjoining lot 16. In 1914 a two-story building was constructed on the defendant's lot. Subsequently and prior to May 1, 1917, this building was reconstructed and added to on the side of and adjoining the plaintiff's property. In 1918 the plaintiff purchased lot 15, which was improved with a one-story building. On November 27, 1922, the plaintiff served upon the defendant a notice that the latter's building was encroaching upon the plaintiff's property to the extent of an inch and one-half, or thereabouts, to the damage of the plaintiff, and demanded a removal of defendant's building to the extent of such encroachment within 10 days. Upon a refusal of the defendant to comply with the notice and demand, this action was brought for damages and for restitution. The defendant answered, denying the encroachment, and by cross-complaint sought to quiet his title to the northeasterly three inches of lot 15. The court found against the defendant on his cross-complaint and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $350 as damages. From this judgment cross-appeals have been taken. The court further found that "the defendant constructed a large building on lot 16, and a portion of said building is and ever since May 1, 1917, has been on said plaintiff's lot 15."

The principal contention made by the plaintiff on his appeal is that the judgment is inconsistent with and in conflict with the findings, in that no provision is made in the judgment for restitution to the plaintiff of that part of his lot which is occupied by the defendant's building and does not compensate the plaintiff for future damages. The defendant, in support of his appeal, contends that the judgment is excessive, and that the plaintiff's cause of action is barred by subdivision 2 of section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes a period of three years for the commencement of an action for trespass upon or injury to real property.

[1-3] Considering the defendant's appeal first, it is beyond dispute that the defendant's building rested on plaintiff's lot to the extent of an inch or two along the boundary line between the two lots. There is no merit in the contention that the defendant's occupancy has been of such character as to vest in him title by adverse possession, but the contention that the plaintiff's cause of action is barred must be sustained. The record shows that the injury or trespass is permanent in character. Where the injury or trespass is of a permanent nature, all damages, past and prospective, are recoverable in one action, and the entire cause of action accrues when the injury is suffered or the trespass committed. Williams v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 150 Cal. 624, 89 P. 599; Kafka v. Bozio, 191 Cal. 746, 218 P. 753, 29 A. L. R. 833. The trespass was committed, according to the evidence and findings, on or about May 1, 1917. Three years expired on May 1, 1920, and as this action was not commenced until January 5, 1923, the cause of action was barred. Further, in view of the plaintiff's long delay in asserting his rights, the case is not one for a mandatory injunction to compel the defendant to remove his building from the said portion of plaintiff's land (see Rothaermel v. Amerige, 55 Cal. App. 273, 275, 203 P. 833).

The judgment is reversed.

HEITER v. HIRSCHFELD. (S. F. 12212.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 24, 1928.

Automobiles ☞ 244(50)—Evidence as to contributory negligence of pedestrian, struck by automobile while crossing street to safety zone, sustained judgment of nonsuit.

In action for damages for personal injuries to pedestrian, struck by automobile while crossing from sidewalk to safety zone, evidence relative to contributory negligence was such as to sustain judgment of nonsuit.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Margaret E. Heiter against Merwin H. Hirschfeld. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Leon Samuels and Daniel A. Ryan, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. E. Reardon, Wm. M. Abbott, and K. W. Cannon, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. The appeal was taken from a judgment of nonsuit, entered at the close of plaintiff's testimony upon motion of defendant. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries received when she was struck by defendant's automobile while she was crossing from the sidewalk on the northerly side of Hermann street, a few feet west of the point where the lines of Market and Hermann streets meet, to a "safety zone" located in said Market street, just north of the car tracks of the street railways laid thereon. From said safety zone plaintiff planned to board an approaching car going west on Market street. Defendant's automobile was also proceeding in a westerly direction.

Defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the grounds that the evidence showed conclusively that defendant was free from negligence and that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Although the order granting the nonsuit is general in terms, the judge, in dismissing the jury, made the statement that he had determined as a matter of law that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and we are of the view that the judgment of nonsuit must be sustained on said ground.

The only testimony as to the facts of the accident was given by plaintiff and by defendant, who was called by plaintiff as a witness under the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure. The accident occurred at approximately five minutes after midnight on May 18, 1923. Plaintiff had been walking westerly on the northerly side of Market street, waiting for the approach of a J car, which she wished to board. Upon reaching a place a few feet beyond the point where the northwesterly line of Market street and the north line of Hermann street join at an obtuse angle, plaintiff looked back in an easterly direction on Market street and observed a J car and defendant's automobile approaching on Market street, both being approximately 200 feet east of the point from which she observed them. She started into the street, walking obliquely in a southwesterly direction towards the safety zone, which was elevated a few inches above the level of the street, to board the approaching car. The shortest distance between the point where plaintiff left the sidewalk and the eastern end of the safety zone was 45 feet. Plaintiff, however, did not adopt such a course, but instead proceeded obliquely in a southwesterly course, which would require her to cover a distance of over 60 feet before reaching the safety zone. She testified that she kept her eyes on the automobile and street car continuously from the time she stepped from the curb until she reached a point near the safety zone, where she was struck; that when she took her eyes off the automobile it was about 6 feet from her, and she believed it was far enough away to give her time to get onto the safety zone; that she "stepped lively," but the left bumper or wheel of the automobile struck her, just as she was about to place her right foot on the elevated safety zone, causing her to suffer a comminuted fracture of the left leg.

Defendant, who is a physician, when examined as plaintiff's witness under the provisions of section 2055, Code of Civil Procedure, testified that he was driving his automobile, which was a Cleveland touring car model, in a westerly direction on Market street at a moderate rate of speed, estimated by him as 15 miles an hour. He was traveling about 2½ feet from the north line of the safety zone, which, by reason of the intersectional conditions, was the usual and proper place to drive. He did not observe plaintiff until he was 20 feet west of the east end of the safety zone. She was then 15 feet ahead of him and about 3 feet north of the right-hand side of his automobile, and, according to defendant, plaintiff was running in the direction of the safety zone. Plaintiff denied that she ran at any time, but admitted that she "stepped lively." Defendant turned the car to the right and immediately applied his brakes upon seeing plaintiff step in front of his car, and brought the automobile to a stop in approximately 17 feet, 2 feet beyond the point where the left front wheel or bumper struck plaintiff.

Defendant further testified that the intersection was "very poorly lighted," and that plaintiff wore dark-colored clothes; that his lights were standard equipment with which the machine was delivered to him, throwing out light 75 to 100 feet, and the brakes were in perfect condition. Both plaintiff and defendant united in testifying that there was no traffic at the intersection at the time of the accident, except defendant's automobile and the approaching J car which plaintiff wished to board. Plaintiff declared herself unable to estimate the speed of defendant's car. The only testimony given on this subject was the testimony of defendant, which was that he was not exceeding 15 miles an hour when defendant came within the compass of the rays of his headlights, and that he immediately applied his brakes upon discerning the presence of plaintiff.

Plaintiff repeatedly testified that, as she measured the situation, she thought she had time to reach the safety zone ahead of the approaching automobile, which she was watching as she hurried across the street. No evidence is offered and no claim is made that she was misled in any way by defendant increasing the speed of his car. The unfortunate injury inflicted upon her, which was a serious one, was occasioned by an error of judgment on her part. It would appear from the record before us that the only reasonable thing for defendant to do was to attempt to stop, as he was unable to tell what course plaintiff would take upon finding herself in a situation of imminent peril. He did, however, in the moment that was left him to act before the plaintiff was struck, attempt to avoid the accident by turning his car to the right.

We have examined the evidence in this case in the light of the well-established rules that should govern trial courts in passing upon motions for nonsuits, and we are of the opinion that we cannot say that the trial court committed error in granting the motion in the instant case.

The cases relied on by appellant, especially Collom v. Bloch, 70 Cal. App. 33, 232 P. 486, are not controlling here, because in those cases a different state of facts existed requiring the entry of a different judgment. In Collom v. Bloch, supra, the decedent attempted to cross in front of an automobile 45 or 50 feet distant from him, but in that case the distance to be traversed by decedent before he reached a position of safety was shorter than in the instant case. In the case herein, the distance between the curb and the point where appellant planned to step onto the safety zone was over 60 feet. The defendant's automobile was 6 feet from her when she reached the path of the automobile, not nearly 45 or 50 feet, as in Collom v. Bloch, supra.

Judgment affirmed.

DE HAVEN v. KUHN. (Sac. 4112.) *

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Evidence $\hookrightarrow$ 441(9)—Written contract for sale of sheep covered all sheep sold, and seller could not introduce oral evidence regarding price of dry ewes.

Contract whereby seller agreed to sell buyer about 2,200 ewes and their lambs for $6.37½ per head, after shearing, held to cover 1,769 ewes with lambs and 363 dry ewes delivered at time of seller's performance, so that seller, suing for amount due, could not introduce evidence that buyer orally agreed to pay seller for dry ewes at rate of $9 per head.

2. Sales $\hookrightarrow$ 363—In action for price of sheep, court properly directed verdict for defendant paying into court amount satisfying terms of written contract.

In action for price of sheep in which written contract introduced covered all ewes and lambs sold, court properly directed verdict for defendant, where defendant paid into court an amount sufficient to fully satisfy terms of written contract.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; H. S. Gans, Judge.

Action for money due upon sale and delivery of sheep by D. O. De Haven against Alfred Kuhn. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, for appellant.

McCoy & Wetter, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. [1, 2] In this action judgment was rendered and entered upon a directed verdict by a jury in defendant's favor. The action was one commenced by the plaintiff for the recovery of a sum of money alleged to be due from the defendant to the plaintiff as the result of a transaction for the sale and delivery by plaintiff to defendant of 3,903 sheep, for which it was alleged the defendant agreed to pay the sum of $25,821.75, of which sum, according to the averments of the complaint, no part had been paid except the sum of $2,000. Defendant's answer to the complaint denied that he owed the plaintiff any greater sum than $22,837.82 as a result of said transaction, which latter sum the defendant paid into court, and by agreement of the parties the same was delivered to the plaintiff, leaving the question of whether any further balance remained due to be determined upon the trial of the case. During the trial the plaintiff introduced in evidence the following written agreement:

"Corning, Cal., March 26, '27.

"I hereby agree to sell to Alfred Kuhn about 2200 ewes and their lambs at $6.37½ per head after shearing.

"$100.00 is hereby received on deposit.

"D. O. De Haven."

The plaintiff further offered to prove that, at the time of the delivery of the sheep referred to in said writing, there were delivered 363 dry ewes, for which the defendant orally agreed to pay plaintiff at the rate of $9 per head. It is apparently conceded that the 363 dry ewes formed a portion of the band of sheep which were delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant at the time of the plaintiff's performance of his aforesaid written agreement. It is the plaintiff's contention that, because the written agreement for the sale of this band of sheep refers only to "2200 ewes and their lambs at $6.37½ per head," the said agreement does not include the dry ewes, which were delivered at the same time, and which he insists should have been paid for at the higher rate. The plaintiff's complaint as originally drawn appears to have reference to a single transaction between the parties for the purchase and sale of a band of 3,903 sheep, composed of 1,769 ewes with lambs, at the purchase price of $6.37½ per head, and 363 dry ewes, at $9 per head. Upon the trial plaintiff asked leave to amend the verbiage of his complaint on the face thereof so as to render the transaction one for the purchase and sale of 3,901 sheep, consisting of 1,769 ewes with lambs, at the price of $12.75 a pair, and 363 dry ewes, at $9 a head. The amendment being allowed, the plaintiff's counsel undertook to have the plaintiff testify to the details of an oral transaction, whereupon the defendant's counsel objected upon the ground the transaction was evidenced by a writing, which he produced, and which the plaintiff proceeded to offer in evidence. The writing having been thus offered and admitted, counsel for plaintiff undertook to show a contemporaneous oral understanding with relation to the 363 dry ewes, which he claimed were to be purchased at a different price per head than that stated in the written agreement, to which effort on his part objection was made that, having counted upon a single transaction for the purchase and sale of said band of sheep, and such transaction having been shown to have been put in writing, and the plaintiff having introduced in evidence such writing, he was not to be permitted to vary its terms by oral evidence. After an extended colloquy between counsel and the court, from which the latter became satisfied that there was but one transaction between the parties, and that the written agreement between them covered and related to the precise number of sheep which the plaintiff was to sell and deliver, and which he actually did deliver to the defendant, the trial court refused to permit the plaintiff to show orally that the 363 dry ewes were not enumerated in, and covered by, the written agreement between the parties to the transaction. It therefore directed the jury to return a verdict in the defendant's favor. We are unable to say in this state of the record that the trial court was in error in the interpretation which it thus gave to the agreement in writing between these parties for the sale and delivery of this band of sheep. If this view be correct, the trial court was not in error in directing a verdict in the defendant's favor, the evidence otherwise showing that the payment into court by the defendant was of an amount sufficient to fully satisfy the terms of the written agreement.

The judgment is affirmed.

LATRONICA v. GENNONI. (Sac. 4139.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1928.

Partnership ⇨ 218(3)—Evidence as to partnership relation between parties living together illicitly as husband and wife held insufficient for submission to jury.

Evidence, in action for purpose of establishing existence of partnership, relative to partnership relation existing between parties living together illicitly as husband and wife, held insufficient for submission to jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Action by Giovanni Latronica, as special administrator of the estate of Marianna B. Latronica, against Antone Gennoni, also known as Antonio Giannoni. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Anthony Devoto and Devoto & Richardson, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

G. P. Ross, of Los Banos, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff, as special administrator of the estate of Marianna B. Latronica, deceased, commenced this action against the defendant for the purpose of having it established that a partnership existed between the deceased and the defendant, commencing in January, 1911, and continuing to the time of the death of said deceased, on or about February 19, 1925, and for an accounting between the defendant and the estate of said deceased with relation to the properties of said partnership, and for a division thereof between the parties to this action. The defendant by his answer denied the existence of such partnership. The trial court granted a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's testimony, which, in so far as it bore upon the question of the existence of any such partnership, consisted solely of the evidence of the defendant himself when called as a witness for the plaintiff, under the provisions of the Code permitting his examination as such. From the judgment in the defendant's favor which followed the order of the court granting such nonsuit plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The facts of the case briefly stated are these: At some time during the year 1911 or 1912 the defendant and Marianna B. Latronica began living together illicitly as husband and wife; the defendant having then a wife living, which fact was known to the deceased when she entered into, and continued to live in, such illicit relation. The defendant was conducting a farm and dairy business in the vicinity of Los Banos, and the deceased lived with him on the farm, doing the cooking and helping with the work for about ten years, and up to the time when a divorce was obtained by the defendant's wife, and some time thereafter the deceased and the defendant entered into a legal marriage, which continued until the death of the former, in February, 1925. We have examined the record herein with a view to determining whether any substantial evidence was presented on behalf of the plaintiff showing the existence of any partnership agreement or relation between the defendant and the deceased during the period of their illicit relationship and prior to their aforesaid marriage, and we have failed to find any tangible evidence thereof which would have justified the trial court in refusing to grant the motion for a nonsuit. The defendant, as we have seen, was practically the only witness in support of the plaintiff's case. He had denied in his sworn answer the existence of the alleged partnership. He was not asked when a witness as to whether or not such partnership existed, and his entire testimony goes no further than to the extent of showing that the deceased and he lived and worked together upon his ranch as though they were husband and wife, each being aware of their illicit relationship. Whatever property was accumulated during the period of such relationship stood at all times in the name of the defendant, and was wholly dealt with by him as his individual property. From the time when the parties were married, and thereafter up to the time of her death, whatever interest the deceased had in such property after said marriage was a community interest therein, to which the husband succeeded upon her death.

In the absence of any sufficient or substantial evidence tending to show either an agreement to form a partnership, or a course of conduct from which the existence of a partnership between the parties prior to their marriage could be implied, we are of the opinion that the trial court properly granted the defendant's motion for nonsuit, and that the judgment based thereon must be, and the same is hereby, affirmed.

1. Automobiles ⇨245(88)—Contributory negligence of motorist whose driver did not, before entering intersection, see defendant's automobile, striking plaintiffs, approaching from right, held for jury.

In action for injuries suffered by plaintiff when her automobile was struck by defendant's automobile approaching from right after plaintiff's automobile had entered street intersection, contributory negligence of plaintiff, in that her driver, when stopping before entering intersection, did not see defendant's automobile, where plaintiff's car was closed car and street was obstructed by large truck, held for jury.

2. Witnesses ⇨267—Trial court has large discretion in allowing cross-examination.

Trial court has large discretion in matter of allowing cross-examination.

3. Witnesses ⇨269(6)—Restricting cross-examination, which extended entirely beyond subject of direct examination, as to automobile collision, held not abuse of discretion.

In action for injuries suffered in automobile collision, in which defendant testified that truck forced him into wrong side of street, court's restriction of cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses, who had come out of doorway into which truck was backed, immediately upon hearing crash of collision, which cross-examination extended entirely beyond subject of direct examination and was an attempt to go into what witness had seen when he left doorway and went to scene of collision, held not abuse of discretion.

4. Witnesses ⇨372(1)—Where defendant's witness was openly hostile to plaintiff, proper exercise of discretion of judge was to allow considerable freedom in cross-examination.

In action for injuries suffered in automobile collision, where defendant's eyewitness to accident was openly hostile to plaintiff and there was an attempt made by plaintiff to impeach his testimony, proper exercise of discretion of trial judge under such circumstances was to allow considerable freedom in cross-examination.

5. Appeal and error ⇨882(8)—Where testimony objected to by defendants was permitted to remain in record upon defendant's insistence, they cannot claim on appeal they were prejudiced by original ruling admitting evidence.

Where testimony objected to by defendants was permitted to remain in record upon insistence of defendants when plaintiff moved to strike out questions and answers to which objections had been made, defendants cannot claim on appeal that they were prejudiced by original ruling admitting evidence.

6. Trial ⇨132—Failure to direct jury to disregard plaintiff's counsel's remark, to effect he thought defense would be put in, held not error, where counsel withdrew remark and amended statement.

In action for injuries sustained in automobile collision, court's failure to immediately direct jury to disregard remark of plaintiff's counsel, made when explaining to court that it was impossible for him to secure attendance of certain witness as follows, "I had no idea that the case would be concluded so soon. I thought that there would be a defense put in," held not error, where counsel immediately withdrew remark and amended his statement when objection was made thereto, and court in final instructions told jury to disregard all statements of counsel to court or to each other.

7. Damages ⇨132(2)—$20,000 to woman 50 years old sustaining severe injuries, probably permanent in character, loss of earning capacity, and incurring over $2,500 medical expenses, held not excessive.

Verdict for $20,000 to woman 50 years of age, who had been conducting profitable business before accident, held not excessive, where she expended over $2,500 for medical attention, sustained fractured skull rendering her unconscious for days and irrational for weeks, and where she required guardian and constant attendant at time of trial, seven months after accident, and would probably never be able to resume employment requiring concentration, and where she suffered broken bones in her right hand, and teeth in her lower jaw were so loose as to require extraction.

Action for damages for personal injuries by Mary S. Sellers, by Edith Schee, her guardian ad litem, against the Wood Hydraulic Hoist & Body Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Bronson, Bronson & Slaven, Roy A. Bronson, and E. D. Bronson, Jr., all of San Francisco, and Myron Harris, of Oakland, for appellants.

Jesse Nichols, of Oakland, and Ford, John, son & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment against them for $20,000 in an action for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff as the result of an automobile collision at the intersection of Third avenue and East Eleventh street, in the city of Oakland, Cal.

The plaintiff was riding in a Ford coupé driven by her chauffeur. This automobile was proceeding south on the west side of Third avenue. The testimony shows that as it approached the north curb of Eleventh street it slowed down and stopped momentarily and then proceeded to cross the street slowly. The defendant corporation's Hudson automobile, driven by its employé, defendant Lynn, approached the crossing along the center of Eleventh street at a rapid rate of speed, according to the testimony, traveling east and was some 60 or 80 feet west of the intersection at the time the Ford coupé entered it. The testimony shows clearly that the Ford coupé had the right of way over the Hudson automobile approaching from the right. Indeed, no argument is made by appellants that the record does not establish the negligence of defendants, but the position is taken that contributory negligence was shown. The day was clear and the street was dry. The coupé had passed the center of the intersection when the Hudson car crashed into it, striking it in the side toward the rear. The Ford coupé was overturned and the plaintiff was seriously injured. In the brief filed by the appellant Lynn but one point is argued: That the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence by imputation to her of the alleged contributory negligence on the part of her driver. Appellant Lynn also adopts the points urged by the appellant corporation in its opening brief. The corporation appellant adopts the argument of Lynn on contributory negligence and urges other points of alleged error which we shall consider hereinafter.

[1] There is no merit in the argument that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. It is based entirely upon the proposition that at the time the driver of the Ford coupé stopped before entering the intersection, he did not see the Hudson automobile. It is urged that if he had looked, he must have seen. This conclusion does not necessarily follow from the record. The evidence shows that he was driving a closed car, which must have obstructed the view to some extent (Marini v. Southern Pacific, 201 Cal. 392, 257 P. 74), and it also appears that the street was obstructed by a large truck. Furthermore, as urged by respondent, it clearly appears from the testimony of disinterested witnesses that even if the driver of the Ford automobile had seen the approaching Hudson car at that time, there would have been no occasion for him to hesitate in crossing for he had the right of way and the Hudson was between 60 and 80 feet away and he could not judge of its speed. The jury has found upon the issue of contributory negligence in favor of the plaintiff, and appellants' contention that a verdict should have been directed for the defendants on the ground of contributory negligence is entirely without merit.

[2, 3] It is urged upon the appeal that the trial court committed prejudicial error in restricting the cross-examination of the witness Harley. The witness Harley was called by plaintiff for but one purpose, to contradict defendant Lynn as to the presence of a truck which Lynn claimed had backed into the doorway out of which Harley came immediately upon hearing the crash of the collision, and the presence of which truck Lynn claimed had forced him on to the north side of Eleventh street just prior to the collision. The cross-examination, which was restricted by the trial court, extended entirely beyond the subject of this direct examination and was an attempt to go into what the witness had seen when he left the doorway and went to the scene of the collision. The trial court had a large discretion in the matter of allowing cross-examination, and there is no showing made of an abuse of such discretion.

[4, 5] It is urged also that the trial court erred in allowing too extensive cross-examination by the plaintiff of the defendants' witness Ginsberg. It is urged that the cross-examination of this witness by the plaintiff extended beyond the scope of the direct examination. Ginsberg was an eyewitness to the accident; he was openly hostile to the plaintiff, and there was an attempt made by the plaintiff to impeach his testimony. Under such circumstances, a proper exercise of the discretion of the trial judge would be to allow considerable freedom in cross-examination. However, conceding that the cross-examination permitted in this instance was too broad, the appellants may not avail themselves of the error because of the facts which we shall state. Objection was made by the defendants to some of the cross-examination of this witness, but the objections were overruled. Later in the trial, when counsel for plaintiff stated that it was impossible for him to secure the immediate attendance of a witness upon whom he relied to impeach the testimony of Ginsberg, he also stated that under the circumstances he would not delay the submission of the case, but would dispense with the testimony of this impeaching witness and to avoid all question about the matter he would move to strike out the questions and answers of the witness Ginsberg to which objection had been made. Counsel for defendants opposed the granting of this motion and insisted that the testimony objected to should remain in the record. They were told by the court that their action in resisting the motion to strike would preclude them from taking advantage in the future of any alleged error in the admission of the testimony to which objection had been made, but they persisted in their objection to the motion, which was then denied by the court. The position taken by appellants now is that the motion to strike did not particularize as to the portions of the testimony referred to. While, technically, the motion was not made in proper form, it is clear from a reading of the record that the defendants were opposing the motion on its merits and the failure to particularize as to the portions of the testimony referred to cannot be considered as prejudicial to defendants and appellants nor as destructive of the force and effect of their insistence that the testimony remain in the record. The testimony objected to by defendants was permitted to remain in the record upon the insistence of defendants, and they should not now be heard to claim that they were prejudiced by the original ruling.

[6] It is urged that the trial court erred in failing to immediately direct the jury to disregard a remark of counsel claimed to have been prejudicial to the defendants. Counsel was explaining to the court that it was impossible for him to secure the attendance of a witness upon whose testimony he relied to impeach the witness Ginsberg, and in explaining why this occurred, he said:

"I had no idea that the case would be concluded so soon. I thought there would be a defense put in."

There is no merit in the contention of appellants with reference to this matter, as counsel for plaintiff immediately withdrew the remark and amended his statement when objection was made thereto, thus confessing his error before the jury, and the jury in the final instructions were told to disregard all statements of counsel to the court or to each other.

Extended argument is made that error occurred in the giving of certain instructions. The instructions as a whole correctly and fairly stated the law to the jury, and the merits of this action are so apparent that technical error in instructions would not warrant a reversal of the judgment.

[7] The claim that the judgment is excessive is clearly without merit. The plaintiff has been put to an expense of over $2,500 for medical attention. She sustained a fractured skull which rendered her unconscious for days and irrational for weeks, and at the time of the trial, seven months after the accident, she required a guardian and a constant attendant. The medical testimony was to the effect that she probably never would be able to resume employment requiring concentration. She was a woman about 50 years of age and prior to the accident had been conducting a profitable business. The testimony showed that not only were her mental faculties impaired by the accident, but she had suffered broken bones in her right hand, as a result of which the hand was crippled and the fingers stiff, and that the teeth in her lower jaw were so loosened and injured as to require extraction. The record shows severe injuries, probably permanent in character, loss of earning capacity, probably for all time, and large expenses incurred by plaintiff as the result of her injury.

The judgment is affirmed.

Physicians and surgeons  18(8)—Evidence held not to support jury's finding that surgeon removing varicose veins was responsible for deterioration of patient's testicle.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; E. C. Robinson, Judge.

Action by M. J. Nicholas against P. N. Jacobson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Dutton & Gilkey, of Oakland (David C. Dutton, of Oakland, and Hartley F. Peart and Charles V. Barfield, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Philip M. Carey, of Oakland (Marvin B. Sherwin, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant, a physician and surgeon, in an action wherein the plaintiff sought to recover damages from the defendant for an alleged unskillful surgical operation; said judgment having been rendered and entered after a trial before a jury, which returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $10,000, and upon which judgment was rendered and entered for said sum. The operation in question was one having for its purpose the removal of a long-standing affliction, known as varicocele or varicose veins, from the scrotum of the plaintiff. In his original complaint the plaintiff alleged that said operation was unskillfully performed, and that in the course thereof the defendant had unnecessarily removed the plaintiff's left testicle. After the trial had proceeded for several days upon the specific issue thus tendered, the plaintiff was permitted, over the defendant's objection, to amend his complaint so as to eliminate the averment as to the removal of said testicle, and to substitute therefor an averment to the effect that the same had been injured and destroyed as a result of said operation.

The main contention of the appellant upon this appeal is that the evidence educed at the trial was insufficient to justify the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the trial court. This contention has rendered necessary upon our part a careful and, in fact, a critical examination of the entire record, with a view to determining the merit of this contention. We have made such examination and have reached certain conclusions thereon. We do not, however, deem it either necessary or desirable to set forth with much of detail the evidence in this case, for reasons which should be obvious, and will content ourselves, therefore, with a brief statement of the conclusions drawn from such evidence or from the lack of it which, in our opinion, would compel a reversal of this cause upon appeal.

The action is one brought against a physician and surgeon for alleged unskillfulness in the performance of a surgical operation. There is no evidence whatever in this record tending to show that the defendant, as a physician and surgeon, was not fully possessed of that degree of care, skill, and learning ordinarily possessed and exercised by physicians and surgeons practicing their profession in the same or similar locality. The uncontradicted evidence in the case is to the contrary. There is no sufficient evidence in this record tending to show that the defendant, in the part which he took or supervised in the operation in question, failed in any degree to exercise that measure of care and skill which is ordinarily possessed and exercised by physicians practicing the profession of medicine and surgery in the same or similar locality, unless it is to be found in a reasonable inference to be drawn from the alleged result of the operation in question that it was unskillfully performed. There is no sufficient evidence in this record tending to show that in the performance of said operation the left testicle of the plaintiff was removed. The evidence of medical experts called by the plaintiff is, with one exception, to the contrary; and said exception relates to the testimony of a physician called by plaintiff which shows upon its face that his opinion that the plaintiff's left testicle had been removed was based upon an insufficient examination, and was formed under circumstances which rendered it valueless.

Finally, there is no sufficient evidence in the record before us that the deterioration of the plaintiff's left testicle, which forms the gravamen of his action as set forth in his amended complaint, was either due to said operation or to any unskillfulness on the part of the defendant or his associates in the course of its performance. The uncontradicted evidence discloses that the plaintiff had been suffering from the affliction known as varicocele for several years prior to the performance of the operation in question; that he had subjected himself to a previous operation by another physician and surgeon for the removal of varicose veins several months prior to the operation in question in this case, and which prior operation had been unsuccessful in so far as it accomplished the removal of such varicose veins. The uncontradicted medical testimony offered on behalf of both parties in the case showed that a frequent, if not usual, effect of the longstanding affliction of varicose veins upon the scrotum is to cause a degeneration and eventually atrophy of the testicle, the healthy condition of which must depend upon a normal state of the blood circulation which ministers to that organ; and the practically uncontradicted evidence in this case serves to show that such deterioration existed and was in the course of progress at the time of the operation which was performed by the defendant and his associates, and which in so far as it effected the removal of the varicose veins upon the plaintiff's scrotum was entirely successful. The practically undisputed evidence herein further discloses that the extent of deterioration which had reduced the plaintiff's left testicle to the size of approximately a raisin would not, in the natural course of things, have resulted from the operation which the defendant and his associates performed, but would rather appear to have been the result either of the pre-existing state of degeneration due to the presence of varicose veins, or to some unskillfulness in the performance of the previous operation. In short, there is no sufficient showing in this record upon which the plaintiff would be entitled to base a reasonable inference that the deterioration of his testicle was due in any degree to the surgical operation which the defendant and his associates performed.

It follows from the foregoing that there was no sufficient evidence offered at said trial in support of the plaintiff's case to justify the inference drawn by the jury that the defendant was in any degree responsible for the affliction or condition of which the plaintiff complains. In view of the foregoing conclusion, we deem it unnecessary to further review the alleged errors urged by the appellant as occurring in the course of the trial and upon which he relies for a reversal of the judgment herein.

The judgment is reversed.

BECKER et ux. v. BELDT et al. (L. A. 9557.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1928.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨299(11, 13)—Evidence held to show that conveyances of property by defendant to his sister and mother were fraudulent (Civ. Code, § 3442).

In action on promissory note, wherein attachment was levied on certain property, evidence held to show that conveyances by defendant of property to his sister and mother were, as against claim of plaintiffs, null and void, under Civ. Code, § 3442, as being in fraud of creditors, justifying finding that defendant was owner of such properties.

2. Fraudulent conveyances ⇨241(2)—In suit by creditor upon note wherein attachment was issued, court had jurisdiction to determine question of fraudulent conveyance, where issue of ownership was tendered and met (Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 2; Civ. Code, § 3441).

The general rule under Civ. Code, § 3441, that creditor must first reduce his claim to judgment before he can resort to equitable action to reach property fraudulently transferred by his debtor has no application to suit by creditor upon promissory note wherein he properly obtained specific lien by attachment against property, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 2, and hence in such a suit, where issue of ownership was tendered and squarely met, court had jurisdiction to determine whether or not conveyances in question were fraudulent.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1010(1)—Trial court's findings and judgment, amply supported by evidence, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Trial court's findings and judgment, having ample support in the evidence, will not be disturbed upon appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Action by William Becker and wife against L. B. Beldt and others, wherein Carrie Truitt and another intervene. From judgment for plaintiffs, interveners appeal. Affirmed.

Ray Meacham, of Long Beach, for appellants.

Le Roy N. French and Keeler, Fickert & French, all of Los Angeles, and Clock, McWhinney & Clock, of Long Beach, for respondents.

PRESTON, J. The question of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings and judgment presents the sole issue for our determination. The appeal is by the interveners from judgment for plaintiffs in an action to recover upon a promissory note secured by a second chattel mortgage on furniture in a court dwelling house. Both note and mortgage were executed by defendants L. B. Beldt and Rena B. Beldt, and were assigned to plaintiffs by the original mortgagee. Subsequently said defendants sold their lease and said furniture to defendant E. H. Truitt, subject to existing incumbrances, and he assumed payment of said note and second mortgage. Thereafter the first mortgage was foreclosed and the property sold. The amount secured, however, was not sufficient to pay the indebtedness, and said second mortgage was thereby terminated and rendered valueless. For that reason plaintiffs sued to recover upon the note alone, and caused an attachment to be levied upon the interest of said E. H. Truitt in said two parcels of real estate standing in the name of others and hereinafter designated parcel A and parcel B, respectively. Appellant Carrie Truitt, the mother of said defendant E. H. Truitt, thereupon filed herein a complaint in intervention, asserting her ownership of said parcel A, and appellant Irene Truitt, the sister of E. H. Truitt, filed her complaint in intervention asserting her ownership of said parcel B. The trial court found for plaintiffs, awarding them the sum of $2,400, with interest. The judgment further decreed that defendant E. H. Truitt was the owner of an undivided eight-thirteenths interest and appellant Carrie Truitt was the owner of an undivided five-thirteenths interest in said parcel A, and that said E. H. Truitt was the owner of said parcel B, in which appellant Irene Truitt had no right, title, or interest. As above stated, this appeal is prosecuted by said interveners, who question the propriety of said attachment and claim that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings respecting the ownership of said real property.

[1] We find no basis for the claim of insufficiency of the evidence. It appears that said E. H. Truitt was unable to pay his debts and was without funds or assets aside from his interest in said parcels of real estate. Some months prior to commencement of this action he transferred his equity in said lease and furniture, the value of which was fixed at the sum of $1,600, to Tracy R. and Hazel Z. Ottinger, husband and wife, in exchange for which they conveyed to intervenor Carrie Truitt the property designated parcel A, the exchange value of which was stated to be $6,000, subject to incumbrances totaling $3,400. The other $1,000 due on the purchase price was paid by said intervenor. Thus it appears that said E. H. Truitt furnished eight-thirteenths of said purchase price and said intervenor furnished five-thirteenths thereof, and the court found their respective undivided interests to be in that proportion. The Ottingers failed to comply with the terms of the lease or to make any payments on the note, and as a result the whole amount was declared due and payable, and this suit was instituted. To permit the above property transfer to defeat the just claim of plaintiffs would be to work an obvious injustice upon them.

It further appears that said defendant E. H. Truitt had been purchasing the property designated parcel B under an installment contract. Intervener Irene Truitt testified that her said brother was indebted to her in the sum of $200; that, in consideration of an additional payment to him of $200 (that is, for a total of $400) he assigned and delivered to her said property upon which it was found he had paid the sum of $790, said conveyance being made during the period when plaintiffs were two of his creditors and he was unable to meet his obligations. She stated that she did not know the original price of the lot, or how much was owing or had been paid on the contract of purchase; that she supposed she took the property as security for the money he owed her. As a whole her testimony was evasive and from it the court was justified in concluding in effect that not only did she have knowledge of the fraudulent intent of her brother in making the conveyance to her but that she participated in the carrying out of that fraud by arranging to take the title out of the reach of plaintiffs and give back to her brother a sum of money greater than the amount of the indebtedness found to be owing by him to her. As said in the case of Wolbrecht v. French, 24 Cal. App. 505, 508, 141 P. 942, 943:

"Conveyances have sometimes been upheld which have the effect of giving preference to one creditor over another. It is established as a rule, however, that such creditor receiving preference must take only enough property to satisfy his debt, and that where he bargains to pay an added cash difference which is desired to be used by the debtor for his own purposes, such fact invalidates the entire transaction and renders the conveyance null and void as against the protesting creditor."

Said conveyance was, as against the claim of plaintiffs, null and void, as was likewise the attempted transfer of defendant's equity in said parcel A to his mother. Section 3442, Civil Code; Hemenway v. Thaxter, 150 Cal. 737, 90 P. 116; Gray v. Brunold, 140 Cal. 615, 74 P. 303.

[2, 3] The general rule, and cases supporting it, relied upon by appellants, that a creditor must first reduce his claim to judgment before he is entitled to resort to an equitable action to reach property fraudulently transferred by his debtor (Roberts v. Buckingham, 172 Cal. 458, 156 P. 1018; section 3441, Civil Code), has no application to the instant case, which is a suit by the creditor upon a promissory note wherein he properly obtained a specific lien by attachment against the property. "Property standing in the name of one person, but owned by the debtor, may be attached at the suit of the creditor. Section 542, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.; Brown v.

Campbell, 100 Cal. 635, 35 P. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314; Bank of San Francisco v. Pike, 53 Cal. App. 524, 200 P. 752; 23 C. J. p. 344." Horan v. Varian (Cal. Sup.) 268 P. 637.

Thereafter appellants by their complaints in intervention tendered the issue of ownership of said property, which issue was squarely met by respondents and was fairly tried and determined. Under the theory upon which the case was tried, and in view of the attachment lien, and the tender of the issue by appellants themselves, the court had jurisdiction to determine the question of whether or not said conveyances were fraudulent, and its findings and the judgment, having ample support in the evidence, will not be disturbed upon appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; H. V. Alvarado, Judge.

Action by Arturo Sanchez against the East Contra Costa Irrigation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for appellant.

A. P. Black and Arthur Brand, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $6,000 for the death of the infant son of plaintiff, who was drowned in a syphon at the bottom of an irrigation ditch belonging to the defendant. The defendant owned certain irrigation canals and ditches in Contra Costa county. One of its canals was approximately 10 miles long, and crossed under various roads. In one place it was necessary for this canal to cross a wide arroyo or stream known as Marsh creek. To cross this creek it was necessary to construct a syphon from the canal on the one side of the creek to the canal on the other side. This syphon ran from the bottom of the irrigation main canal downward under Marsh creek and came up into the irrigation main canal upon the other side of Marsh creek. The opening of this syphon in the end of the canal was four feet in diameter, and was unguarded. The defendant company had constructed, within a short distance of the place of the accident, several small houses in which employees of the company, with their families, resided. The roadway leading to these houses ran alongside the side of the canal and along the edge of Marsh creek; there being nothing but the thickness of a low concrete bulkhead between the canal and the road. The plaintiff was an employee of the company, and lived in one of the said houses with his wife and children. His five year old son, who was drowned, had been playing with other children at the edge of the canal, and attempted to wet his handkerchief in its waters to wipe some blood from an injury he had sustained. He fell into the main canal, which, at the time of the accident, was filled with about 3 feet of water, and then, evidently, slipped into the syphon at the bottom of this 3 feet of water. The water in the canal was muddy, and the opening of the syphon could not be seen. The body of the child was recovered from a place some 15 feet down in the syphon. There was no sign of warning to notify passersby of the presence of this large syphon.

Appellant contends that it was not required to guard its canal against the danger of children falling into it, and this is conceded by the plaintiff and respondent. However, this case involves a situation where the defendant has placed upon its property an artificial peril, a concealed danger, without warning to those who were invited by defendant to live close by. The case of Faylor v. Great Eastern Quicksilver Mining Co., 45 Cal. App. 194, 187 P. 101, while presenting a different situation, announces a rule, the reasons for which make it applicable here. In that case, it was reiterated that the rule of nonliabil-ity was not to be applied in "instances where the owner maintains on his land something in the nature of a trap, or other concealed danger, known to him, and as to which he gave no warning to others." It was also said in the case last cited:

"But the case at bar is distinguished from all the cases in our own, and so far as our attention has been called to them, in other jurisdictions recognizing the rule where relief has been denied trespassing children injured by the condition of machinery or premises, for in the case at bar the danger was distinctly a concealed danger. The bait of the trap may be said to have been the push-car, in itself an attractive lure to boys of the age of John Faylor. The tunnel, which, like any cave, natural or artificial, has been both in fiction and in fact, * * * irresistibly attractive to boys, and the concealed stope in the dark tunnel five hundred feet deep and filled with water, was the trap into which the tunnel and cars led the boy's unwary feet. From the evidence in this case, the company knew that the children played about this mine."

[1] In the instant case, the canal with its shallow water was the bait of the trap. The defendant knew that children lived close by, and the opening to the syphon might have been easily guarded. It is a matter of common knowledge that children playing on the edge of a shallow body of water will be tempted to play in the water and to reach into it, and, while defendant need not have guarded against this open and obvious stream of water, under numerous California decisions, we think a different rule applies where an apparently harmless, shallow stream of water contains a large opening into which any one might slip, which opening is wholly unguarded and completely concealed from view. If the children had gone swimming in this canal and had slipped into the syphon, a similar legal situation would have been presented. The children assumed the risk of the open, obvious, notorious danger incident to the canal, containing about 3 feet of water; but they did not assume the risk of an unknown, concealed, and unguarded danger. The exception to the general rule, under which exception the present case falls, is discussed in the following cases: Bjork v. City of Tacoma, 76 Wash. 225, 135 P. 1005, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 331; Cœur d'Alene Lumber Co. v. Thompson (C. C. A.) 215 F. 8, L. R. A. 1915A, 731; City of Indianapolis v. Emmelman, 108 Ind. 530, 9 N. E. 155, 58 Am. Rep. 65; Indianapolis v. Williams, 58 Ind. App. 447, 108 N. E. 387; Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 P. 379; Peters v. Bowman, 115 Cal. 345, 47 P. 113, 598, 56 Am. St. Rep. 106; Loveland v. Gardner, 79 Cal. 317, 21 P. 766, 4 L. R. A. 395; Malloy v. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc., 3 Cal. Unrep. 76, 21 P. 525.

[2, 3] It is also contended by defendant and appellant that it is not liable for its torts because it is a governmental agency. This contention is without merit. The defendant is a private corporation and, at the time of the accident, nearly 8,000 shares of its stock were held in private ownership. The mere fact that two of its stockholders happened to be public corporations would not alter the rule of liability. The stockholders of a corporation have no estate in the property of the corporation. Bank of Visalia v. Smith, 146 Cal. 403, 81 P. 542.

The judgment is affirmed.

KATZ v. HELBING et al. (S. F. 12445.) *

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1928.

Hearing Denied in Bank Dec. 24, 1928.

1. Negligence ⇨108(1)—Allegation that injuries were proximate result of negligence will not render complaint sufficient, if other allegations show that negligence did not proximately cause injury.

In complaint for personal injuries, allegation that plaintiff suffered injuries as direct and proximate result of defendants' negligent conduct will not render complaint sufficient, if it affirmatively appears from other allegations that act made basis of liability is as matter of law not proximate cause of injury.

2. Municipal corporations ⇨809(2)—Placing of building materials on public streets likely to cause accidents is wrongful, if reasonably prudent man would have foreseen resulting injury.

In absence of statutory prohibition against placing of building materials in public streets likely to be attended by accidents to persons lawfully using streets, whether by wrongful act of interference of young children or otherwise, it is duty of court to declare such conduct wrongful if reasonably prudent man would have foreseen that injury would probably result, for acts of defendant are deemed proximate cause of such consequences as reasonably prudent man would anticipate as likely to result therefrom.

3. Evidence ⇨7—Court will take judicial notice of deleterious effect of quicklime causing injury.

In action for injuries sustained by passenger in street car when struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown by small boy, court will take judicial notice of deleterious effect of quicklime to tissues and flesh of human body and eyes.

4. Evidence ⇨25(2)—Court, in action for injuries from lime thrown by boy, may take judicial notice of fact that lime box was located on busy street.

In action for injuries sustained by passenger in street car when struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendant and thrown by small boy, trial court may take judicial notice of fact that place occupied by lime box was portion of very busy business area in city, and that many persons of all ages passed place daily.

5. Negligence ⇨126(2)—Proof of conduct of small boys, in throwing lime left by defendants on sidewalk, to create liability for injuries, held admissible under complaint alleging knowledge of conduct and access to lime.

Under complaint for injuries to passenger in street car struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by small boy, alleging that defendants knew small boys were taking lime and throwing it at passing street cars, and that boys had free access to lime, proof could be offered showing that frequency, extent, and character of acts of small boys were such as to create liability on part of defendants for injury.

6. Evidence ⇨129(1)—Occurrence of act in past under similar circumstances is relevant in determining probability of future occurrence.

In determining probability of event happening in future, its occurrence in past under similar circumstances is relevant.

7. Negligence ⇨128—Under complaint for injuries from lime left on sidewalk and thrown at street car by small boy, proof of precautionary measures taken by defendants would be admissible.

Under complaint for injuries to passenger in street car struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by small boy, alleging that defendants knew small boys were taking lime and throwing it at passing street cars, and that boys had free access to lime, evidence was admissible to show whether defendants had warned children of dangerous character of their acts and commanded them to desist, or had called on officers to assist them, or whether any precautionary or preventive measures whatsoever had been taken.

8. Negligence ⇨124(1)—Under complaint for injuries from lime left on sidewalk and thrown by small boy, evidence of defendants' ability to move materials to less accessible place held relevant.

Under complaint for injuries to passenger in street car struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by small boy, alleging that defendants knew small boys were taking lime and throwing it at passing street cars, and that boys had free access to lime, evidence as to ability of defendants to have moved materials to some less accessible place would be relevant as circumstance bearing on liability.

9. Negligence ⇨111(1)—Failure to more definitely allege conduct of small boys in throwing lime left on sidewalk did not render complaint for injuries insufficient.

Under complaint for injuries to passenger in street car struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by small boy, alleging that defendants knew small boys were taking lime and throwing it at passing street cars, and that boys had free access to lime, absence of more definite allegations as to frequency and character of acts of boys did not render complaint insufficient to state cause of action.

- 10. Negligence ⚡62(3)—Eleven year old boy, throwing lime left on sidewalk by defendants, held not such responsible agent as to make act proximate cause of injury.

Under complaint for injuries to street car passenger struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by eleven year old boy, it could not be said as matter of law that boy, presumed to possess average intelligence for one of his age, was such a responsible agent as would make his act proximate cause of damage.

Negligence is relative to time, place, and circumstances.

- 12. Negligence ⚡50—Defendants leaving on sidewalk lime, causing injury when thrown by small boy, held required to take precautionary measures, if reasonably prudent persons would have taken such measures.

In action for injuries to street car passenger by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by small boy, defendants would be under duty to take precautionary measures, if reasonably prudent persons would have adopted measures to protect public against repetition of acts of boys during five days during which lime was left on sidewalk.

- 13. Negligence ⚡110—Complaint for injury from lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown by small boy showed duty on defendants to protect general public and stated cause.

Under complaint for injuries to passenger in street car struck by lime left on sidewalk by defendants and thrown at street car by small boy, alleging defendants knew small boys were throwing lime and had free access to lime, allegations, if true, required defendants to protect general public from injury arising from condition that they caused to exist and which they knew was tempting youthful minds to deeds likely to cause injury to persons lawfully using streets and sidewalks, and hence complaint stated cause of action.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment for defendants entered after defendants' demurrer to plaintiff's amended complaint had been sustained without leave to amend.

The complaint, which the court below held did not state a cause of action, sets forth the following facts: All defendants except defendant A. G. Isaacs were members of a copartnership engaged in the building contracting business in the city and county of San Francisco, and were the owners of certain real property in said city and county. Said defendants and defendant A. G. Isaacs, on August 25, 1925, were, and for several weeks prior thereto had been, engaged in the construction of a building upon said real property, and on said date and for many days prior thereto "negligently and carelessly kept and maintained upon the public sidewalk and in the public street directly in front of said lot of land and said building certain building materials consisting, in part, of wet lime and/or mortar." On said August 25, 1925, while plaintiff was a passenger on a street car passing said lot, "a small, immature and irresponsible boy of tender years, to-wit, of the age of eleven years," picked up a quantity of wet lime and/or mortar so negligently and carelessly maintained by defendants and threw it at said street car on which plaintiff was a passenger, and portions of said wet lime struck plaintiff in the face and entered the socket of his right eye, thereby injuring and burning the eyeball to the extent that it became necessary to remove said eyeball. His left eye was also injured to the extent that the sight thereof has been permanently impaired. It is further alleged in paragraph VII of the complaint that—

"At all times from the 20th day of August, 1925, to and including the time plaintiff was injured, defendants well knew that small boys were taking wet lime and/or mortar from said building materials so negligently and carelessly kept and maintained by defendants upon said sidewalk and in said street, as aforesaid, that said boys had free and open access to said lime and/or mortar, that said boys were throwing such wet lime and/or mortar at street cars which passed along said street in front of said building, and that passengers, including plaintiff, upon said street cars would probably be injured by such lime and/or mortar so thrown by said boys as plaintiff was injured, as aforesaid. Yet defendants, continuously from said 20th day of August, 1925, to and including the time plaintiff was injured, and for many days after defendants had knowledge of said acts of said boys, continued negligently and carelessly to keep and maintain said building materials, including such wet lime and/or mortar, upon said public sidewalk and in said public street."

On account of said injuries and damages, alleged to be "the direct and proximate results of the negligent and careless maintenance by defendants, and by each of them, of said building materials upon said public sidewalk and public street," plaintiff demanded damages in the sum of $50,000.

[1] Respondents argue that it affirmatively appears from the allegations of the complaint that the act of respondents in maintaining the building materials in the street was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, but that said injuries were proximately caused by the intervening wrongful act of the eleven year old boy who threw the lime and mortar, striking plaintiff. The allegation in paragraph VIII of the complaint that plaintiff suffered injuries "as direct and proximate results" of the negligent and careless conduct of the defendants, will not, of course, render the complaint sufficient if it affirmatively appears from other allegations that the act made the basis of liability is, as a matter of law, not the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

[2] It must be conceded that building materials are commonly left standing on the sidewalk and border of the street fronting on buildings in the course of construction, and that wet lime and mortar are frequently mixed in boxes placed upon the sidewalk or street area, to be from there carried into the building for use. This practice, under ordinary circumstances, is recognized as lawful by custom and judicial decision. But, if experience had demonstrated that the placing of building materials in public streets and sidewalks was likely to be attended by accidents to persons lawfully using said streets and sidewalks, whether by virtue of wrongful acts of interference of young children or otherwise, we might expect to find the matter regulated by statute, and in the absence of statutory prohibitions it would be the duty of courts and juries to declare such conduct wrongful if a reasonably prudent man would have foreseen that injury would probably result, for the acts of a defendant are deemed the proximate cause of such consequences as a reasonably prudent man would anticipate as likely to result therefrom. Royal Indemnity Co. v. Public Service Corporation, 42 Cal. App. 628, 183 P. 960; Polloni v. Ryland, 28 Cal. App. 51, 151 P. 296; Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 111 P. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134. Intervening wrongful acts of third persons, but for which injuries complained of would not have been received, ordinarily break the chain of causation, because they are not to be anticipated as probable consequences, but are occasional and exceptional results. But this is not always the case, especially where the acts of children of a non-responsible age are involved. See Parkin v. Grayson Owen, 25 Cal. App. 269, 143 P. 257; Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 P. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1094; Id., 167 Cal. 126, 138 P. 712; Faylor v. Great Eastern Q. Min. Co., 45 Cal. App. 194, 187 P. 101.

Hale v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 42 Cal. App. 55, 183 P. 280, and the cases from other jurisdictions cited by respondents, in which intervening acts of children have been held to break the chain of causation, were all decided on the ground that the intervening acts there involved were not to be anticipated. Horan v. Town of Watertown, 217 Mass. 185, 104 N. E. 464; Perry v. Rochester Lime Co., 219 N. Y. 60, 113 N. E. 529, L. R. A. 1917B, 1058; Hall v. New York Telephone Co., 214 N. Y. 49, 108 N. E. 182, L. R. A. 1915E, 191; Hartnett v. Boston Store, 265 Ill. 331, 106 N. E. 837, L. R. A. 1915C, 460; Beetz v. City of Brooklyn, 10 App. Div. 382, 41 N. Y. S. 1009. The same principle may, perhaps, be applied to Loftus v. Dehail, 133 Cal. 214, 65 P. 379.

It may be conceded that the probability of young boys injuring pedestrians or passengers upon passing street cars by throwing wet lime mischievously or in prankish or frolicsome mood, even where the box of lime is situated upon a public sidewalk and in convenient reach of passersby, is so slight in a majority of cases that ordinarily no duty is imposed upon the person who places materials or substances upon the sidewalk for a lawful purpose to take unusual precautions to guard against the possibility of injury by the misuse of said materials by strangers. Considering the question with respect to the general social welfare, the law has determined that it is better that the damages incurred by the acts of third parties go uncompensated, rather than that liability should be imposed upon the person who placed or caused said materials to be placed upon a public street without guard, accessible to all who may choose to use them in any way their malevolent disposition or thoughtless fancy may direct.

[3-6] The court will take judicial notice of the deleterious effect of quicklime to the tissues and flesh of the human body and such a delicate organ as the eye. If necessary, the court is permitted to consult standard authorities or treatises in the investigation of questions of science and in doing this we are informed that "lime" is a "caustic highly infusible substance," and that quicklime develops great heat when treated with water. The trial court is also permitted to take judicial notice of the fact that the place occupied by the lime box, 940 Sutter street, San Francisco, was a portion of a very busy business area of said city and great numbers of persons of all ages passed and repassed said place daily. The allegations of the complaint, in testing its sufficiency, must be considered in the light of the situation thus presented. The complaint proceeds to allege that from August 20, 1925, to the time plaintiff was injured, five days later, defendants well knew that small boys were taking said wet lime and mortar and throwing it at passing street cars, that said boys had free and open access to the lime and mortar, and that passengers upon the street cars were the targets of their marksmanship. We are of the opinion that it must be held that under these allegations proof might be offered showing that the frequency, extent and character of the acts of the small boys were such as to create liability on the part of defendants to plaintiff. In determining the probability of an event happening in the future, its occurrence in the past under similar circumstances is relevant. In cases of this class the courts have stated that the fact that an occurrence has happened in the past is a circumstance to be considered in determining whether it was reasonably to be expected to happen in the future. Cole v. German Sav. & Loan Society (C. C. A.) 124 F. 113, 63 L. R. A. 416.

[7-9] Evidence would also be admissible under the foregoing allegations to show whether defendants had warned said children of the dangerous character of their acts and commanded them to desist, or, failing to secure obedience, had called upon officers of the law to assist them, or whether any precautionary or preventive measures whatsoever had been taken. Further, evidence as to the ability of defendants to have moved the materials to some less accessible place would be relevant as a circumstance bearing upon liability. The allegation that the boys had "free and open access" to the lime and mortar suggests that their acts were of a permissive character which would tend to create liability. While plaintiff might well have included in his complaint more definite allegations as to the frequency and character of the acts of the boys, we are of the view that their absence does not render the complaint insufficient to state a cause of action.

[10] Although, if the injury herein had resulted from the intervening agency of a person of an age and discretion to realize the inherently dangerous properties of wet lime and mortar and its capacity for inflicting injury, and who possessed adult judgment and experience and a proper sense of duty which one member of society owes to another, the act of such a person would be held to be the proximate cause of the damage done, it cannot be said as a matter of law that an eleven year old boy, presumed to possess average intelligence for one of his years, since the contrary is not alleged, is such a responsible agent. As was said by this court in Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 138 P. 712, in discussing the allied question as to contributory negligence in children:

"There is no precise age at which, as a matter of law, a child is to be held accountable for all his actions to the same extent as one of full age. * * * The question as to the capacity of a particular child at a particular time to exercise care in avoiding a particular danger, is one of fact, falling within the province of a jury to determine."

See, also, Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry., 179 Cal. 173, 175 P. 690, and Greeneich v. Knoll, 73 Cal. App. 1, 238 P. 163.

In Cahill v. E. B. & A. L. Stone Co., 167 Cal. 126, 138 P. 712, the plaintiff, a boy twelve years of age, was injured, while endeavoring to stop a push car which had been left standing unguarded and unlocked on the rails on a public street and had been wrongfully set in motion by other children with whom plaintiff was playing. The court said, at page 136 (138 P. 716):

"The theory of the defendant is that the act of the other children in setting it [the push car] in motion destroyed the causal connection between the negligence of the defendant in leaving the car unguarded and the injury to plaintiff. But if the defendant was negligent in not safeguarding the car, the mere fact that it was put in motion in play by children before plaintiff joined them will not excuse it, as such a thing ought to have been anticipated by it. The original neglect of the defendant in failing to guard the car continued as the direct and culpable cause of the injury and its responsibility is to be determined by the probable injurious consequences to children which were to be anticipated therefrom and not by subsequent and independent events or agencies that may have arisen. In such a case children are not considered such responsible agents as break the chain of causation." (Italics supplied.)

Certain cases involving the liability of owners of automobiles parked in the public streets for injuries to pedestrians resulting from the acts of children in releasing the brakes and causing the automobile to "run away," while denying liability under the facts proved, contain language which indicates that each case must be determined by its particular facts, and that although under ordinary circumstances a rule of nonliability prevails in the automobile cases—which we believe must also prevail in the larger proportion of building material cases—there may be factual circumstances rendering the intervening acts of children a probable consequence and hence requiring a different ruling. Thus, in Jackson v. Mills Baking Co., 221 Mich. 64, 190 N. W. 740, 26 A. L. R. 906, the court said:

"The car was in the street where it had a right to be. Brewin had no reason to anticipate that the children would board the car and start it. Children had frequently come out to the car on his previous trips, but had never climbed onto the car and had not been in the habit of playing in or meddling with it. * * * If Brewin had left his wagon standing in the street and gone out of sight of it and remained away for a considerable period while children were in the habit of playing in and around it, a different question would be presented." (Italics supplied.)

See, also, Maloney v. Kaplan, 233 N. Y. 426, 135 N. E. 838, 26 A. L. R. 909; Kaplan v. Shults Bread Co., 212 App. Div. 110, 208 N. Y. S. 118; Touris v. Brewster, 235 N. Y. 226, 139 N. E. 249. See, also, note, 26 A. L. R. 912.

In Jackson v. London County Council, 28 Times L. R. 66 and 359, recovery was allowed in a case similar in important particulars to the case at bar.

[11, 12] Negligence is relative to time, place, and circumstances. There is no fixed rule which may be universally applied. The question here is: What was the duty of the respondents, knowing what they are charged with knowing and seeing what the complaint alleges they saw? If reasonably prudent persons would, under the allegations of the complaint, have adopted or taken steps to adopt some measure to protect the public against the repetition of the acts which recurred during five successive days, and we are of the view that they would have taken such steps, then it became the duty of defendants to act in a similar manner. It would then become a demonstrable proposition that the lime in its semisolid state was attracting the immature and thoughtless as a substance for childlike amusement. That it was a dangerous substance to scatter about in thickly populated districts must be known to adult persons.

[13] Call the lime in its mixed form an attractive nuisance, or what you may, the basic fact remains that if the allegations of the complaint be taken as true, the defendants owed to the general public protection from annoyance and injury arising from a condition which they had caused to exist and which they knew was tempting and impelling youthful minds to deeds that were likely to bring damage to innocent persons lawfully using the public sidewalks and streets. Every person in his intercourse with his fellows owes to them certain natural inherent duties, of which all normal persons are conscious, among which is the duty of protecting life and limb against peril when it is in his power to reasonably do so.

From what we have said in passing upon the sufficiency of the complaint we do not intend to be understood as forecasting the facts which may be developed in the trial of the case. The facts may reveal a case of nonliability. All that we hold is that it appears to us, upon a consideration of the law question thus far developed, that the complaint states a cause of action.

The judgment is reversed.

GORDON v. DUFRESNE. (L. A. 9568.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 19, 1928.

Landlord and tenant §92(1)—Lease and option to purchase form one document, and covenant to pay rent supports option as well as right to occupy premises.

Option to purchase contained in lease and lease itself are not severable, but form one document, the provisions of which are interdependent, and covenant to pay rent or do other acts supports option as well as the right to occupy premises.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. Walter Hanby, Judge.

Action by George P. Gordon against Annie Boyle Dufresne. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Neil S. McCarthy, George J. Stoneman, and Earl L. Banta, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William L. Kuehn and Arthur S. Loveland, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This is an action to enforce specific performance of the option clause contained in a written agreement of lease and option entered into by defendant as lessor with plaintiff as lessee, which provided, in part, as follows:

"That the said Lessor has letten * * * and the said Lessee has hired and taken * * * Lots (describing lots 11-18, inc., Los Angeles county) * * * for a period of two years * * * at the total rent of * * * $600, payable * * * in equal monthly payments of $25.00, in gold coin of the United States of America, it is also expressly agreed by the Lessor that Lessee may at any time within the time this lease is in force & effect, purchase the within named lots for the sum of $6000, payable $1500 at time of exercising this option to purchase, $1500 one year thereafter, $1500 two years thereafter and $1500 three years thereafter, with interest on the deferred payments at the rate of 8% per annum payable annually. * * *"

Within said two-year period, plaintiff, desiring to exercise said option to purchase, tendered to defendant the sum of $1,500 as first installment of said purchase price of $6,000 and as a part of his pleading offered to pay into court all further sums due under the contract and to perform any other covenant required of him thereunder. Defendant refused to accept the tender, to make, execute, and deliver to plaintiff a good and sufficient deed to said property, or to otherwise fulfill the terms of her covenant. This action to compel specific performance resulted.

Upon the pleadings and the evidence the court found that no consideration was paid to defendant by plaintiff for said option to purchase; that said property had a substantial rental value; that the rent money was not, and was not intended to be, a part of any consideration for said option, and that defendant recalled and withdrew said option, and it was canceled and annulled prior to any offer, acceptance, or compliance therewith by plaintiff. No findings were made upon any of the other issues tendered by the pleadings, to prove which evidence was adduced. The court concluded as a matter of law that the part of said lease granting the option was wholly without consideration and a mere nudum pactum, from which defendant had the legal right to and did withdraw prior to offer or compliance therewith by plaintiff, and her action in so doing operated to cancel the option and relieve her from liability thereon. Judgment accordingly was entered for defendant, and plaintiff now appeals.

The question of the divisibility of lease and option agreements of the type here presented has been before this court many times, and it has been many times decided that such agreements are not severable, but that, on the contrary, the lease and option form one document, the provisions of which are interdependent, and the covenant to pay rent or do other acts supports the option as well as the right to occupy the premises. Prichard v. Kimball, 190 Cal. 757, 214 P. 863; Cates v. McNeil, 169 Cal. 697, 147 P. 944; Hall v. Center, 40 Cal. 63; De Rutte v. Muldrow, 16 Cal. 505; 35 Corpus Juris, pp. 1038, 1039. There is no material variance between the wording of the agreements under consideration in the above cases and the wording of the provisions before us which would serve to distinguish said cases and make inapplicable here the rule therein announced.

The judgment of the trial court, which is based solely upon said incorrect conclusion of law, is therefore reversed.

In re MERCER'S ESTATE.★

EMERY v. NIXON.

(S. F. 12820.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 16, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Adoption ⚭18—Neither death of adopter nor of adopted child terminates status of such child (Civ. Code, § 228).

Neither death of the adopter nor of the adopted child has effect of terminating status of such child, when once it is lawfully fixed, under Civ. Code, § 228.

2. Adoption ⚭21—Adopted child of husband predeceasing wife has right under statute to inherit community property left by wife at death; "children" (Civ. Code, §§ 227, 228, 1386, subd. 8).

Adopted daughter of husband predeceasing wife has right to inherit common property of husband and wife remaining on wife's death, under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8, since word "children" in statute includes adopted children, in view of sections 227, 228, relating to adoption.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second, and Third Series, Child; Children (in Statutes).]

3. Executors and administrators ⚭17(7)—Nominee of adopted daughter of predeceased husband held eligible for letters of administration of deceased wife's estate, consisting partly of community property (Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8).

Adopted daughter of husband predeceasing wife held to be person entitled to benefit of Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8, relating to inheritance of community property, and as such entitled to succeed to proportion of deceased wife's estate, consisting largely of what was formerly community property, and a proper person to nominate petitioner as an eligible person for letters of administration of wife's estate.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Harry W. Falk, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anna B. Mercer, deceased, and in the matter of the estate of Anna B. Mercer, also known as Anna Bell Mercer, deceased. Murray B. Emery and H. D. Nixon each petitioned for letters of administration, and from an order appointing Nixon as administrator, Emery appeals. Affirmed.

Puter & Quinn and Marc F. Morrison, all of Eureka, and Charles Mannon, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Delos A. Mace, of Eureka, for respondent.

PRESTON, J. This appeal involves the right to letters of administration upon the estate of Anna B. Mercer, deceased, and, as a necessary consequence, the right of succession to that portion of her estate which was formerly the community property of herself and her predeceased husband, William L. Mercer. The facts are not in dispute.

On and prior to June 9, 1873, and for 35 years thereafter, the above-named parties were wife and husband. On said date the husband, with the express written consent in open court of the wife, regularly adopted as his child one Hermina Augusta Tappendorf, then aged two years, the decree reciting:

"* * * And she is hereby declared henceforth and forever to be the lawfully adopted child of the said W. L. Mercer, and that henceforth and forever she shall be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the said W. L. Mercer."

The child was reared in said family, and is now known in the record as Hermina A. Hansbrough. After accumulating considerable community property, the said William L. Mercer died testate on November 16, 1908, bequeathing the bulk of his estate to his widow, decedent herein. Later, and on October 5, 1927, Anna B. Mercer died intestate, leaving an estate, a large portion of which was formerly the community property of herself and her said predeceased spouse. Said decedent left no issue, and neither spouse left parents surviving. The nearest blood kin to the decedent is Maria Benson Emery, a sister. The said adopted daughter nominated respondent H. D. Nixon as administrator of said decedent's estate, and said sister nominated Murray B. Emery to the same office. The nominees have each petitioned for letters of administration, both claiming to be qualified for same under section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and thus has arisen the issue for our determination.

The court below gave and made its order appointing as administrator of said estate respondent Nixon, the nominee of said adopted daughter, and the nominee of said sister has appealed therefrom. The appeal turns upon the question as to whether said adopted daughter will succeed under subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code to that portion of the estate of said decedent which was the community property of herself and her husband. This question in turn is resolved by the scope we declare the word "children" to have in that portion of said subdivision reading as follows:

"If the deceased is a widow, * * * and leaves no issue, and the estate, or any portion thereof, was common property of such decedent and * * * her deceased spouse, while such spouse was living, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such deceased spouse.
* * *

This provision, of course, is to be read in connection with section 228 of the Civil Code, as follows:

"A child, when adopted, may take the family name of the person adopting. After adoption, the two shall sustain toward each other the legal relation of parent and child, and have all the rights and be subject to the duties of that relation."

This appeal has been ably presented by both sides. Appellant relies upon the principle set forth in the case of In re Darling, 173 Cal. 221, 226, 159 P. 606. In that case John Darling, deceased, died intestate. Arnold Darling Bennison, the issue of the marriage of a predeceased son of decedent, was regularly adopted, prior to the death of decedent, by H. G. and Eda Bennison, both of which foster parents survived said decedent. The court held that, under subdivision 1 of section 1386 of the Civil Code, an adopted child is entitled to succeed to the share in the estate of the father of his father by blood, that such father by blood would have succeeded to had he survived his own father. In discussing the question, the court said:

"The adoption statutes of this state do not purport to affect the relationship of any person other than that of the parents by blood, the adopting parents, and the child. It is the person adopting and the child who by the express terms of the section, after adoption 'shall sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation,' and it is the parents by blood who, from the time of the adoption, are 'relieved of all parental duties towards, and all responsibilities for the child so adopted, and have no right over it,' and are, in the eyes of the law, no longer its parents. The adoption simply fixes the status of the child as to its former and adopted parents. To its grandparents by blood it continues to be a grandchild, and the child of its parents by blood. It does not acquire new grandparents in the persons of the father and mother of an adopting parent.

"It is only in so far as it is necessary to protect the full rights of the child as a child of the adopting parents and the corresponding rights of the adopting parents as father and mother of the adopted child that the statutes relative to adoption can play any part in the construction of section 1386 of the Civil Code, the inheritance statute here involved. As was said in Hockaday v. Lynn, 200 Mo. 456, 98 S. W. 585, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117, 118 Am. St. Rep. 672, 9 Ann. Cas. 775: 'In fact, it may be laid down as a general conclusion that while the statute of adoption must be read into the statute of dower and that of descents and distribution, it is with this singularity always to be observed, viz., that the adopted child is so let in only for the purpose of preserving in full its right of inheritance from its adoptive parent.' This was followed by the statement, 'and the door to inheritance is shut and its bolt shot at that precise point,' a statement which appears to be sustained by the authorities generally in the absence of plain statutory provision to the contrary. The result would appear to be that within the meaning of subdivision 1 of section 1386 of the Civil Code, Arnold Darling Bennison was, at the date of the death of deceased, so far as deceased himself was concerned, 'issue' or a 'child' of his deceased child, John Darling, Jr., and entitled to succeed as such to the share his father would have taken if alive, by right of representation."

The further contention of appellant is that, inasmuch as an adopted child cannot inherit from the parents, nor from the brothers or sisters of the adopting parent, nor from its own foster brothers or sisters, but does inherit from its blood relatives of these classes, it must follow that the adopted daughter in the case before us may not inherit from the widow of the adopting father to whom she bears no blood relation. In other words, an adopter may not, it is said, corrupt the blood stream by foisting heirs upon his family. Stating the proposition another way, an adopted child is allowed to inherit from, but not through, its adopting parent.

Respondent, on the other hand, contends that the question is one of statutory construction, and when construed it gives ex proprio vigore the right of inheritance to the adopted daughter; that the child, once adopted remains the child of the adopting parents forever; that this relation is curtailed and restricted if such child may not at all times enjoy as to the adopting parent the privileges of a natural child; in other words, that the relation of the child to its adopting parent brings it into the class of persons designated by law to take in the contingency we have before us. This contention is again stated by respondent in the following manner:

"She is not seeking to inherit through her father by substitution or right of representation. She inherits from the decedent because of her status as 'child' of her father, W. L. Mercer. As pointed out in the Estate of Marshall, 42 Cal. App. 683, 184 P. 43, 'The respondent's relationship to her deceased mother would be the determining factor in establishing her status as an heir of Thomas E. Marshall.'"

Appellant raises, it is true, an intricate question of law, and he argues it ingeniously and persuasively; but it fails to satisfy the mind. The family blood stream of neither W. L. Mercer nor Anna B. Mercer is in any way contaminated by the infusion of foreign blood into it. This is at once made clear by merely supposing that, when these spouses intermarried, the husband possessed a natural daughter by a previous marriage. No one would contend for a moment that such a daughter would not have unquestionably the right under this statute to the community property in question. But we would have in such case an heir who bore no blood relationship whatever to the decedent, and, to our mind, a person in no different class than the adopted daughter in the case before us. The statute directing succession need not follow the ties of blood.

The weakness of appellant's position is simply that the adopted daughter cannot have the full benefit of her right as a daughter of the deceased husband in her relation to said husband unless the word "children" in this statute of succession is held to include her. The predeceased spouse had an interest in, if not full ownership of, the property in question. Natural justice suggests that his daughter have an interest therein. In making his will he may have had the very contingency in mind that has arisen, and decedent, too, may, with knowledge of this statute, have declined to make a will.

[1] The legislative intent is that such common property go to the child or children of the predeceased spouse, and, in the absence of such children, to divide same equally between the families of the respective spouses. Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, 4, 151 P. 275. There is nothing in section 228 that in any way contemplates termination of the status of an adopted child when once it is lawfully fixed. Estate of Jobson, 164 Cal. 312, 128 P. 938, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062; Estate of Hunsicker, 65 Cal. App. 114, 118, 223 P. 411. Neither the death of the adopter nor of the adopted child would have any such effect.

[2] As another illustration, suppose decedent had willed the property to "my heirs," or to the "children of my deceased husband"; would there be any question but that such a testament would include the said adopted daughter? Admittedly, in subdivision 1 of section 1386, the word "issue" included an adopted child. In re Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 P. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146; Estate of Winchester, 140 Cal. 468, 74 P. 10; In re Darling, supra. Appellant admits that the word "issue" in several places in said section does include an adopted child. Again, an adopted child has been held to be a lineal descendant of the adopting parent. Estate of Winchester, supra; Warren v. Prescott, 81 Me. 483, 24 A. 948, 17 L. R. A. 435, 30 Am. St. Rep. 370. If this be conceded, it argues strongly for the rule that an adopted child is entitled to any legacy the law gives to the children of an adopting parent.

The whole matter is concluded by the observation that the cases cited and the principles urged by appellant furnish no sufficient reason for restricting the scope of the word "children" in the provision under review. To exclude adopted children from its scope would be to say that they are not entitled, as to the adopting parent, to the full rights of natural children, which is contrary to the express provision of the statute (sections 227 and 228, Civ. Code), and the terms of the decree of adoption. Even the case of Hockaday v. Lynn, 200 Mo. 456, 98 S. W. 585, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117, 118 Am. St. Rep. 672, 9 Ann. Cas. 775, above referred to, concedes that:

"The adopted child is so let in only for the purpose of preserving in full its right of inheritance from its adoptive parent."

In the case of Patterson v. Browning, 146 Ind. 160, 44 N. E. 993, a widower with children by his first marriage remarried, and afterwards adopted a child. He died, without issue by his second wife, leaving his wife, his natural children, and adopted child all surviving him. Under a statute which gave to an adopted child all the rights in the estate of its adopting father or mother, by descent or otherwise, that it would take if a natural heir, coupled with a statute vesting the fee simple of a decedent's lands in his widow, "provided, that if a man marry a second or subsequent wife, and has by her no children, but has children alive by a previous wife, the land which, at his death, descends to such wife, shall at her death descend to his children," it was held that the adopted child was a child of decedent, and, with the natural children, an heir to the estate.

Warren v. Prescott, supra, holds that a legally adopted child is a lineal descendant of its adopting parents, within the meaning of the statutes of Maine, and, as such, may take a legacy given by will to one of its adopting parents, who predeceased the adopted child.

Lastly, we indorse the sentiment expressed in Markover v. Krauss, 132 Ind. 294, 302, 31 N. E. 1047, 1050 (17 L. R. A. 806), as follows:

"As before suggested, we do not mean by this that the Legislature has attempted to perform the impossible feat of doing the work of nature, and of creating a child of one's blood out of a stranger. We simply recognize and acknowledge the untrammelled power of the Legislature to fix the legal status of the respective parties, and to control absolutely the manner in which property shall descend and be distributed."

See, to the same effect, Estate of Hill, 179 Cal. 683, 688, 178 P. 710.

[3] We, therefore, hold the nominator of respondent to be a person entitled to the benefit of said portion of subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code, and, as such, entitled to succeed to a portion of the estate of said decedent, and a proper person to nominate the respondent as an eligible person for letters of administration.

The order of the court below is affirmed.

WILLIAMS et al. v. GORDON et al.
(L. A. 9499.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1928.

1. Mortgages §401(4)—Failure of bank to send notice that interest installment on note secured by mortgage was due held no defense, in action to foreclose mortgage.

That bank in which note and mortgage securing it were deposited failed to send any notice that installment of interest on note was about to fall due held no defense in action to foreclose mortgage on failure to pay interest installments when due; there being nothing in either note or mortgage requiring giving of such notice.

2. Mortgages §401(4)—Commencement of action to foreclose mortgage on failure to pay interest installment held election to declare principal due.

In action to foreclose mortgage on failure to pay interest installments on note, portion of answer denying that plaintiffs elected to declare principal due constitutes no defense, since commencement of action is sufficient in itself to show such election.

3. Mortgages §454(1)—Allegation that plaintiffs in foreclosure action were indebted to defendants on unliquidated demand, held no defense, in view of judgment in suit on such demand only for costs.

In action to foreclose mortgage for failure to pay interest installments due, allegation in answer that plaintiffs were indebted to defendants on an unliquidated demand exceeding amount of delinquent interest installments, and that demand was subject of another suit, held not to constitute defense to action, especially where it is further shown that such other suit resulted finally in judgment in defendants' favor only for costs.

4. Mortgages §401(5)—Tender of unpaid interest installments after commencement of foreclosure action was of no avail.

Tender by defendants, after commencement of action to foreclose mortgage for failure to pay interest installments, of full amount of such installments, together with interest thereon, was of no avail.

5. Costs §260(4)—Defendants in foreclosure action would not be penalized for apparently frivolous appeal, in view of lack of notice of delinquency in payment of interest installments.

Defendants, appealing from judgment foreclosing mortgage on failure to pay interest installments, would not be penalized, though appeal might well be held to be frivolous, where no notice of delinquency of interest was given defendants within reasonable time before suit was brought, but only notice was that sent to defendants' attorneys one day before filing of complaint.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action to foreclose mortgage by Wirt Clay Williams and another against John A. Gordon, Clara H. Gordon, and others. From the judgment, named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

L. G. Shelton, of Glendora, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. Action to foreclose mortgage. Judgment in favor of plaintiffs, from which two of the defendants, John A. and Clara H. Gordon, appeal. Said defendants, the appellants herein, appeared in said action, and filed an answer to the complaint. The plaintiffs thereupon moved to strike out portions of said answer on the ground that the same were sham, irrelevant, and immaterial, and also filed a demurrer to said answer on the ground that it failed to set forth facts sufficient to constitute any defense to plaintiffs' cause of action. The court granted said motion, and sustained said demurrer. Upon said defendants' failure to file any further or amended answer, their default was entered, and later judgment was given against them by default. They now claim on this appeal that the trial court erred in granting plaintiffs' motion to strike out portions of said answer and in sustaining the demurrer to their answer, for the reason that said answer stated facts which, if true, were sufficient to constitute a valid defense to plaintiffs' cause of action.

[1,2] The note secured by said mortgage was dated September 20, 1924, and was payable on or before three years after date. It provided that the interest should be paid quarterly, "and if not so paid, it shall become part of the principal, and bear the same rate of interest as the principal; and should the interest not be paid when due, then the whole sum of principal and interest shall become immediately due and payable at the option of the holder of this note." The quarterly installments of interest falling due on December 20, 1925, and March 20, 1926, were not paid, and the action was begun April 28, 1926. The first defense set up in the answer is that defendants' failure to pay said installments of interest was due to the fault of the bank, with which said note and mortgage had been deposited, in neglecting to send the usual notice that an installment of interest was about to fall due; that all parties to said mortgage intended that the interest should be paid in the usual course of business and according to the custom prevailing in that locality, which is alleged to be that the note should be deposited in the bank where it was made payable, and that the bank should send such notice a reasonable time before each installment became due; and that plaintiffs so deposited said note and mortgage, and the bank failed to send any notice regarding either of said installments of interest. These facts constituted no defense to said action. There was nothing in either the note or mortgage which gave defendants any right to notice of the time when the installment of interest would fall due, and the terms of the note and mortgage must govern and determine the rights of the parties thereto. Neither is there any merit in that part of the answer in which the defendants deny that plaintiffs elected to declare the principal due. The commencement of the action is sufficient in itself to show such election. Bank of Commerce v. Scofield, 126 Cal. 156, 58 P. 451; Trinity County Bank v. Haas, 151 Cal. 553, 91 P. 385.

[3] It was next alleged in the answer that the plaintiffs were indebted to said defendants on an unliquidated demand amounting to $299, which amount was more than the amount of said two delinquent installments of interest, and that said demand was the subject of another suit in a justices' court between said parties at the time said two installments of interest became due. These facts were not sufficient to constitute a defense to said action. Especially is that true when the allegations of the answer further show that the suit in the justices' court resulted finally in a judgment of $26 only in favor of said defendants, and that said judgment was a judgment for costs rendered in said action, it being alleged that the defendants herein were defendants in said action, and that said defendants, who had filed a cross-complaint upon their said claim for $299, failed to recover anything whatever on said claim.

[4, 5] It is finally alleged by defendants in their said answer that they tendered to plaintiffs the full amount of said two installments of interest, together with compound interest thereon, but that the same was refused. It appears, however, from said answer that this tender was made after this action had been commenced. It needs no citation of authority to show that such a tender could be of no avail to defendants. Defendants bitterly complain that the institution of this action is the result of ill feeling on the part of plaintiffs toward defendants arising from the controversy between said parties in said justices' court action. With this complaint this court cannot concern itself. It would appear, however, that a complete answer to such charge appears in the record, which shows that no steps were taken by plaintiffs to foreclose their mortgage until more than a month after the second quarterly installment of interest had become delinquent, and that more than four months intervened between the time the first delinquent installment of interest fell due, after which plaintiffs might have exercised their option to declare the whole note due, and have brought this action, and the date when this action was in fact commenced. A forbearance of over four months by plaintiffs may well be considered sufficient to absolve them from the charge that they were actuated by ill will or malice in the institution of this action. However, we are not disposed to penalize the appellants, as suggested by respondents, by reason of an appeal which, without any strained construction of the law or the facts, might well be held to be frivolous. Had notice been given appellants of the delinquency of said interest within a reasonable time before suit was brought, they might, and probably would, have paid the same, as they had paid all previous installments of interest. The only notice appearing in the record to have been given appellants was one sent them by the attorneys for respondents, which was sent one day previous to the filing of the complaint herein. The next morning the appellants sought out the respondent Wirt Clay Williams, and actually delivered to him the full amount of interest due, but said respondent refused to accept the same as payment of said interest, and thereafter the money so delivered to said respondent was by his attorney thereafter returned to appellants, as this action had been commenced prior to the delivery of said money to said respondent. This somewhat hasty procedure on the part of respondents, while it does not offer any defense to their maintenance of this action, should not be encouraged by the courts, and we refuse to do so.

Judgment affirmed.

THOMPSON v. FITZGERALD. (S. F. 12429.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1928.

1. Appeal and error ⇨1002—Jury's verdict for plaintiff on conflicting evidence as to negligence and contributory negligence is binding on Supreme Court.

Jury's verdict for plaintiff on conflicting evidence as to defendant's negligence and plaintiff's contributory negligence is binding on Supreme Court on appeal.

2. Appeal and error ⇨1067—Failure to instruct as to duty to stop motorcycle before entering arterial street held not reversible error, where failure to stop was not proximate cause of collision with automobile.

Failure to stop motorcycle before entering arterial street not being proximate cause of injury to one riding on rear seat, in collision with automobile, under version of accident accepted by jury, court's failure to instruct jury as to duty to stop did not prejudice defendant's rights, and is not reversible error.

3. Negligence ⇨93(1)—Motorcycle driver's negligence in not stopping at arterial street held not imputable to one riding on rear seat.

Negligence of motorcycle driver in not bringing it to complete stop before entering arterial street could not be imputed to fellow employee riding on rear seat on way to latter's home during lunch hour, so as to bar recovery by him for injuries in collision with automobile, in absence of evidence that failure to stop was chargeable to any independent act of negligence on his part.

4. Automobiles ⇨168(6)—Automobilist had no right to travel on arterial street at excessive speed and without regard to rights of motorcyclist first reaching intersection.

Right of one driving automobile on arterial street to assume that motorcycle would be brought to stop before entering it did not give him right to travel in excess of established speed limits and without regard to rights of persons first reaching intersection to enter or cross such street.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by Alfred G. Thompson against Phillip Fitzgerald. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Francis N. Foley and Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Harry I. Stafford and Dean Cunha, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by him on July 3, 1925, when a motorcycle upon which he was riding as the guest of one Raymond Flores, who was driving said motorcycle, collided with an automobile driven by defendant at the intersection of Fulton and Buchanan streets in the city of San Francisco. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiff for $1,500, upon which was entered the judgment from which defendant appeals.

[1] A judgment for Raymond Flores, the driver of the said motorcycle, against defendant and appellant herein, was recently affirmed by this court. Flores v. Fitzgerald (Cal. Sup.) 268 P. 369. The defenses in the case now before us, as in Flores v. Fitzgerald, supra, were that defendant was free from negligence, and that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The evidence in the case herein was sharply conflicting. The facts testified to by appellant and his witnesses, if believed by the jury, would have required a judgment in appellant's favor under the instructions given by the court. The jury, having returned a verdict for plaintiff, has impliedly accepted the version of the accident related by plaintiff and his witnesses to be true. This determination of the jury is binding upon this court on appeal. Since the account of the accident given by plaintiff and his witnesses, and accepted by the jury as true, is similar in all material particulars to that testified to by Flores and his witnesses in the case in which Flores was plaintiff, and is stated in detail in that case (Flores v. Fitzgerald, supra), we will not repeat it here.

[2] The motorcycle upon which plaintiff was riding as the guest of Flores was traveling south on Buchanan street, while appellant was going east on Fulton street. The motorcycle and automobile collided in the southwest corner of the intersection of the two streets. Appellant complains of the action of the trial court in refusing to instruct the jury that it was unlawful for the motorcycle to cross Fulton street from an intersecting street unless the motorcycle should have been brought to a full stop before entering the intersection, and in instructing them instead that it was unlawful for the motorcycle to cross Fulton street from an intersecting street unless the motorcycle should have been brought to a full stop before entering the intersection provided such street was clearly marked or signposted to give notice of such fact. The driver of the motorcycle did not bring it to a full stop before entering the intersection from Buchanan street, but there were no marks or signposts upon the street directing the drivers of vehicles to stop before entering the intersection. The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco had passed an ordinance declaring Fulton street between Van Ness avenue and Stanyan street an arterial street, and providing that it should be unlawful for any driver or operator of any vehicle to cross an arterial street from an intersecting street unless such vehicle should have been brought to a full stop before entering the intersection of such arterial street. Ordinance 6672, N. S. Said ordinance did not make the duty to stop before entering the arterial street conditional upon the street having been signposted or marked to give notice of the fact that it had been designated an arterial street. Said ordinance, if a valid exercise of the legislative power of the board of supervisors, became effective on the day before the accident.

Respondent contends on the authority of Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 P. 442, that the enactment of said ordinance was in excess of the powers of the board of supervisors, because it conflicted with the provisions of the state Motor Vehicle Act as then in force, and hence the trial court did not err in refusing to give appellant's requested instructions embodying the provisions thereof.

In Flores v. Fitzgerald, supra, we held that it was unnecessary to pass upon the validity of the ordinance, for the reason that the failure of the driver of the motorcycle to bring it to a complete stop was not the proximate cause of the accident. In that case the trial court, in its instructions to the jury, recognized the ordinance as valid, and instructed the jury that by its terms the driver of the motorcycle was required to stop before entering Fulton street. In the instant case the jury were told that there was a duty to stop only if the street were signposted or marked, and, since it was not signposted or marked, the jury must have concluded that there was no duty to stop. In Flores v. Fitzgerald, supra, the appellant moved for a nonsuit and directed verdict, claiming that said ordinance, recognized by the court as valid, and Flores' failure to obey it, required as a matter of law, a determination that Flores was guilty of contributory negligence barring his recovery. To uphold the action of the trial court in denying the motions for a directed verdict and nonsuit, it was only necessary for this court to decide that the question of proximate cause was one of fact and that the jury might have legally concluded that the failure of the driver to stop was not the proximate cause of the accident. However, we regard the statements in said case as holding that the evidence recited showed conclusively, as a matter of law, that the failure to stop was not the proximate cause of the accident. The evidence determining the question in that case and the account of the accident accepted by the jury in the instant case being similar in all important particulars, the reasoning therein set forth is equally applicable to the case at bar. We quote from Flores v. Fitzgerald:

"It is not necessary to pass upon the validity of said ordinance, for the reason that we are of the opinion, that, conceding said ordinance was valid and in full force and effect at the date of the collision, and that the respondent violated it by failing to stop before entering upon the intersection of said streets, we are not satisfied that such failure on his part in any way contributed to his injury. * * * It does not appear that his failure to stop his machine momentarily before entering the intersection had any direct connection with, or was in any manner responsible for, the collision with appellant's automobile. Although the violation of the ordinance may have been negligence per se, yet, as it was not shown that such negligence was the direct or proximate cause of his injury, it will not defeat his right of recovery for damages sustained by reason of said injury. * * * Had respondent stopped before entering the intersection, and then proceeded to cross the street at from ten to fifteen miles per hour, which was within the legal limit, the collision would, no doubt, have happened in much the same manner as described above. If such is the case, then we think the conclusion is irresistible that the proximate cause of respondent's injury was not his failure to come to a full stop before attempting to cross the street intersection. * * *"

Since it can be said as a matter of law that the failure of the motorcycle to be brought to a stop was not the proximate cause of the injury under the version of the accident accepted by the jury, the failure of the court to instruct the jury that there was a duty to stop, if such a duty existed, did not prejudice appellant's rights and does not constitute reversible error.

[3] It is not, however, essential to the affirmance of the decision herein to hold that the failure of the driver of the motorcycle to stop it before entering the intersection was not proximate cause of the accident. There is the factor in this case, not present in Flores v. Fitzgerald, supra, that the plaintiff was not the driver of the motorcycle, but was riding on the rear seat as a guest of the driver. Plaintiff and the driver, Flores, were both employees of the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company, assigned to its Pine and Steiner street office. Flores and plaintiff were on the way to plaintiff's home during the lunch hour at the time of the collision. Plaintiff was not in the control or management of the vehicle, nor was the relationship between the two such that Flores was the agent of plaintiff in the management of the vehicle. Any negligence of Flores in failing to bring the motorcycle to a complete stop could not be imputed to plaintiff to bar plaintiff's recovery. Kelley v. Hodge Transportation System, 197 Cal. 598, 242 P. 76; Pope v. Halpern, 193 Cal. 168, 223 P. 470; Meyers v. Southern Pacific Co., 63 Cal. App. 164, 218 P. 284; Bryant v. Pacific Electric Railway, 174 Cal. 737, 164 P. 385. Nor under any possible construction of the evidence can it be held that the failure of the motorcyclist to stop was chargeable to any independent act of negligence on the part of plaintiff.

[4] Nor would said ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, if valid, render defendant's conduct free from negligence. In operating his automobile, defendant had the right to anticipate that other drivers would operate their vehicles in the manner required by law and would stop before entering arterial streets if the law so required. However, the jury having impliedly found plaintiff's account of the accident to be true, it must be held that, even though defendant had the right to assume that the motorcycle would be brought to a stop before entering the intersection, he was negligent as a matter of law. The right to assume that operators of other vehicles would bring them to a stop before entering the arterial street did not give defendant a right to travel upon the arterial street at a high rate of speed, in excess of established speed limits, and in disregard of the rights of those wishing to enter or cross the arterial street, who reached the intersection when the vehicle upon the arterial street was at a considerable distance therefrom.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COEN. (Cr. 3139.)★

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 26, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 11, 1928.

1. Indictment and information $\S$ 37—Information charging defendant, on certain date and in named county, murdered particular decedent held sufficient (Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, 952).

Information charging the offense of murder, alleging that defendant did, on a certain date in named county, murder particular decedent, held sufficient, under Pen. Code, §§ 950, 951, 952, as following substantially the language of section 951, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1043, prescribing the form of information for various felonies.

2. Criminal law $\S$ 126(1)—Denial of application for change of place of trial for murder held not erroneous under circumstances.

Refusal of application for change of place of trial for murder, on ground defendant could not have a fair and impartial trial in county wherein alleged crimes were committed, held not erroneous, in view of fact that trial court was able, without unusual exertion or delay, to procure a fair and impartial jury to try the cause.

3. Jury $\S$ 131(10)—Action of trial court in conducting main examination of jurors, and limiting right of defendant to conduct further examination, held not erroneous under circumstances (Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039).

Action of trial court, assuming to act in conformity with Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, in conducting main examination of jurors on their voir dire, and limiting right of defendant through his counsel to conduct further examination, held not prejudicial error, in view of fact that a fair and impartial jury was nevertheless selected, and defendant, after securing extension of right to exercise peremptory challenges, made no effort to secure further extension, so as to include and excuse juror whose examination was unduly restricted.

4. Homicide $\S$ 223—Evidence given by defendant at coroner's inquest, amounting to confession, held properly admitted, despite duress in obtaining confession in jail.

Where evidence given by defendant in murder prosecution at previous coroner's inquest, amounting to a confession of homicide charge, was practically free from whatever duress attended him while in jail, in inducing confession to officers, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing prosecution to introduce such evidence at the trial.

5. Witnesses $\S$ 40(1)—Nine year old child held properly permitted to testify in murder trial, after careful inquiry regarding mental capabilities.

Permitting nine year old child to testify in murder prosecution was not error, in view of careful inquiry made regarding mental capabilities of child, and her knowledge of nature of proceeding and of her oath, particularly since testimony was in entire harmony with evidence of her elders given in regard to same matters.

6. Criminal law $\S$ 1172(2)—Instruction in murder prosecution, wherein defendant tendered dual plea, that defendant was conclusively presumed sane on issue of not guilty, held harmless error (Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017, as amended, and § 1026 as added, by St. 1927, pp. 1148, 1149).

Where defendant, in prosecution for murder, offered no objection to proceeding under provisions of Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017, as amended, and section 1026 as added, by St. 1927, pp. 1148, 1149, and tendered dual plea of not guilty, and not guilty by reason of insanity, as provided for therein, and proceeded without objection to trial of the cause on issue of not guilty, instruction to effect that, in determining the issue under such plea, the defendant was conclusively presumed to be sane, was at the most only harmless error, there being no evidence in record, at time of submission of such issue, which in any degree tended to show that defendant was insane.

7. Criminal law $\S$ 163—Plea of jeopardy by reason of conviction on plea of not guilty was without merit as to subsequent trial on issue of not guilty by reason of insanity (Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017, as amended, and § 1026 as added, by St. 1927, pp. 1148, 1149).

Where defendant, entering dual plea in prosecution for murder, in accordance with Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017 as amended, and section 1026 as added, by St. 1927, pp. 1148, 1149, was convicted on plea of not guilty, plea of once in jeopardy as to subsequent trial of issue of not guilty by reason of insanity was without merit, in that sole purpose of such hearing was that of permitting defendant to relieve himself of the state of jeopardy in which he had been thus placed through showing that, at time of commission of crimes of which he had been found guilty, he was in fact insane, and therefore innocent.

8. Criminal law $\S$ 1166½(6)—Refusal to permit further examination of jury on issue of not guilty by reason of insanity held harmless error, in view of evidence (Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017, 1078, as amended by St. 1927, pp. 1039, 1148, 1149, and § 1026 as added, by St. 1927, p. 1149).

In prosecution for murder, wherein defendant entered dual plea of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity, as authorized by Pen. Code, §§ 1016, 1017, as amended, and section 1026 as added, by St. 1927, pp. 1148, 1149, refusal of trial court, after conviction on plea of not guilty, to permit a further examination of jury to determine existence of a state of bias or prejudice with regard to issue of insanity, even though constituting an abuse of discretion under section 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039, held at the most harmless error, in view of fact that there was no substantial evidence sufficient to justify a finding that defendant was insane.

9. Criminal law $\S$ 493—Opinion evidence of lay witnesses as to sanity is of no greater evidentiary value than facts and circumstances, forming basis of opinion.

Opinion evidence of lay witnesses as to sanity is of no greater evidentiary value than that which could be given to facts and circumstances to which they each testified, and which formed the sole basis of their opinion.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; K. Van Zante, Judge.

Perry Coen, alias James A. Allendale, was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. C. C. Russell and William R. McKay, both of Hanford, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, of San Francisco, J. W. Ferguson, of Hanford, Clarence H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, and J. F. Pryor, of Hanford, for the People.

RICHARDS, J. The defendant and appellant herein was charged by information with the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed on the 4th day of December, 1927. The information was in two counts, in the first of which the defendant was charged with the murder of one Edna Artist, and in the second count of which he was charged with the murder of George Mace Artist, the two decedents being husband and wife. In each of said counts the defendant was accused of "a felony, to wit, murder, in that on the 4th day of December, 1927, in the county of Kings, state of California, he murdered" the particular decedent. Upon his arrest and arraignment he appeared in court by counsel and filed a demurrer to each of said counts, based upon the contention that the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense, and that it does not substantially conform to the requirements of sections 950, 951, and 952, of the Penal Code of this state. The trial court overruled said demurrer, whereupon the defendant, without offering any objection or suggestion as to the form or effect of his respective pleas as these are provided for in the recent amendments to the Penal Code, entered a plea of "not guilty" and also entered a plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" to each count in said information.

Prior to the commencement of the trial the defendant applied for a change of place of trial to another county, basing his motion therefor upon the contention, supported by his own affidavit and also that of his counsel, that a fair and impartial trial could not be had in the county of Kings, wherein his two alleged crimes had been committed, by reason of the existence of a widespread feeling of bias and prejudice among the people of said county against him. Upon the hearing of said application counter affidavits in opposition thereto were presented on behalf of the people, with the result that upon such hearing the defendant's application for a change of place of trial was denied. When the cause was thereafter called for trial, and a jury was sought to be impaneled for the purposes of such trial, and when a jury panel of 12 persons had been drawn and sworn to answer questions relative to their qualifications to act as such jurors, the trial judge, acting in accordance with section 1078 of the Penal Code as the same was amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1039), undertook to examine said prospective jurors as to their qualifications to serve and act as a fair and impartial jury in said cause; and having so examined certain of said jurors the trial judge undertook, in the exercise of the discretion with which he is invested by the terms of said amended section of the Penal Code, to limit and define the extent of the examination of said prospective jurors on the part of counsel for the defendant. The detail and effect of such limitation will be set forth and considered at a later point in this opinion. When, as the result of the voir dire examination, a jury was finally selected and sworn to try the cause, the trial thereof was proceeded with upon the issue raised by the defendant's plea of "not guilty," and during the course of which no evidence was offered upon the direct issue as to the sanity or insanity of the defendant, although the defendant and several other witnesses on his behalf took the stand and testified quite fully and without objection with relation to the facts and circumstances preceding, attending, and succeeding the commission of the alleged dual crime.

Upon the conclusion of such evidence and the argument of respective counsel the court instructed the jury with relation to the questions of law presented upon the trial of the defendant upon his plea of "not guilty," and in the course of such instructions directed the attention of the jury to the fact that the defendant had entered the plea of "not guilty," and also the plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity," and that under the law existing by virtue of the then recent amendments of the Penal Code, where a defendant entered these two pleas he must first be tried on the plea of "not guilty," and later, if the jury find him guilty, the question of his sanity at the time of the commission of the offense is to be tried before a jury, and in giving these instructions the trial court further instructed the jury that under said recent amendments of the Penal Code the defendant, upon his plea of "not guilty" and upon the trial thereof, was conclusively presumed to be sane at the time of the commission of his alleged offenses, and that the question of his sanity or insanity at the time of the commission of his alleged crimes would be determined thereafter upon the hearing upon his plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity." The jury, having been thus instructed, retired to deliberate upon their verdict, but after a time returned to ask in substance for a re-reading of the instructions. The court thereupon re-read the entire body of its instructions and the jury again retired, and after a time again returned to request a re-reading of the court's instructions upon the subject of murder and upon the powers and duties of the jury with respect to punishment. The court re-read that portion of its instructions which covered the matters upon which the jury sought further light, and it again retired, and presently returned a verdict upon each of the counts in the information, finding the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree and expressly fixing the penalty at death.

Upon the polling of the jury and the recitation of the verdict, the court proceeded to state to the jury that it had a further duty to perform, in view of the fact that the defendant had pleaded "not guilty by reason of insanity"; whereupon counsel for the defendant inquired of the court whether it intended to proceed at once to try that issue. The court replied that it was about to examine the jury for that purpose; whereupon counsel for the defendant interposed a challenge to the entire panel, upon the ground that they were biased and prejudiced to an extent which rendered them not capable jurymen to try that issue, and counsel objected to the further progress of the trial upon that ground. The court overruled the challenge and objection, and proceeded to examine the jury by asking each of them whether they had any prejudice against the plea of insanity as a defense to crime, and whether they would have any hesitancy in agreeing upon a verdict finding the defendant insane at the time he committed the act in question, if the defendant should establish by a preponderance of evidence that he was insane at that time. Each of the jurors in turn answered the foregoing questions asked by the trial judge in the negative. Counsel for the defendant propounded no questions, but stood upon their objection that the jury, having brought in a verdict against the defendant finding him guilty of murder, was disqualified to pass upon the question of his sanity or insanity at the time of the commission of his alleged crimes. Counsel for the defendant also interposed the plea of once in jeopardy, basing said plea upon the record showing the foregoing trial and conviction. The court overruled said plea, and, having done so, continued the further trial of the cause until a later date, and again continued the hearing several times on account of the illness of the defendant.

The cause was resumed on March 21, 1928; whereupon, the jurors being present, the court directed the clerk to swear the jury, and thereupon counsel for the defendant objected to the jury being sworn until they should have an opportunity to examine them as to their qualifications to proceed to the trial of the issue presented by the defendant's plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity." Counsel for the defendant also insisted upon their alleged right to exercise anew their peremptory challenges, basing this claim upon the assertion that this was another trial upon another issue, as to which they were entitled to re-examine the jury and to exercise peremptory challenges. The trial court overruled the various objections of defendant's counsel, and declined to permit them to re-examine the jury or exercise further challenges. Thereupon the clerk read to the jury the information and the defendant's plea thereto as to each of the counts thereof, "not guilty by reason of insanity." Thereupon counsel for the defendant renewed their objection to a further trial of the cause, upon the ground that the defendant had been once in jeopardy, which objection the court overruled. It was then stipulated that the evidence which had theretofore been taken upon the defendant's plea of "not guilty" might be considered as introduced in evidence and as read to the jury upon the present hearing upon the defendant's plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity." The hearing then proceeded upon the latter issue, the defendant assuming the burden and producing certain evidence, expert and other, touching the question of his sanity or insanity, and presenting chiefly in the form of hypothetical questions, a series of facts and circumstances which had reference to the relations existing between the defendant, the two decedents and the daughter of the latter, over a considerable portion of time prior to the commission of the dual homicide. The defendant also introduced the testimony of certain lay witnesses who had known and worked with him for some years prior to the date of said crime, and of an additional lay witness who had occupied the prison with him after his arrest, and which witnesses related peculiarities in the conduct and demeanor of the defendant during the period of their acquaintance with him.

The defendant having rested upon said issue, the prosecution introduced considerable evidence of the same general character as that presented by the defendant, at the conclusion of which the cause upon this issue was argued by respective counsel. The court gave to the jury a body of instructions having particular reference to the defendant's plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity"; whereupon the jury retired to deliberate upon their verdict, and presently returned a unanimous verdict finding the defendant sane at the time he committed the offenses set forth in the two counts of the information. Counsel for the defendant thereupon moved the court in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, basing the former motion upon the grounds previously urged, and the latter motion generally upon all the grounds set forth in section 1181 of the Penal Code, and particularly upon the various grounds which had been urged during the proceedings upon the trial and upon certain alleged newly discovered evidence with relation to the issue of the defendant's insanity. The court denied the motions in arrest of judgment and for a new trial. Thereupon the court proceeded to pronounce judgment, declaring the defendant guilty of the crime of murder in the first degree upon each count in the information, and that he was sane at the time he committed the offenses set forth therein, and sentencing him to suffer the death penalty. From such judgment, and the order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has taken and prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention which the appellant makes upon this appeal is that presented by his demurrer to the information. An examination of the record discloses that the information, as to the charging part thereof, follows substantially, and in fact almost exactly, the language of section 951 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, p. 1043), prescribing the form of informations for various felonies, including that of murder, and specifically providing that in cases of murder it should be sufficient in the information to charge the defendant with having "murdered" the deceased person. In view of this express provision embraced in the recent amendment to the Penal Code, we are constrained to hold that the objection, made by the defendant to the information upon the ground that it was not in sufficient compliance with certain sections of the Penal Code as they existed prior to the making of the aforesaid amendment, is without substantial merit.

[2] The next contention urged by appellant is that the trial court erred in denying his application for a change of place of trial from the county of Kings, wherein his two alleged crimes were committed and wherein he asserted he could not have a fair and impartial trial, to another county wherein the state of bias and prejudice alleged to exist in the county of Kings did not prevail. The record discloses that upon the hearing of said application a large amount of evidence, both in support of and in opposition thereto, was presented to the court and was fully and carefully considered by it, and that in denying the defendant's application it did so with the added statement in its order to the effect that, "if it developed at a later date that it is impossible to get an unprejudiced jury, the motion may be renewed." The record further discloses that thereupon the impanelment of a jury was proceeded with, with the result that, without any unreasonable or undue extension of such proceeding, or any unusual difficulty or delay, a fair and impartial jury was selected from the citizenship of Kings county to try the said cause.

It further appears that upon the selection of such jury, and prior to the further proceeding with such trial, the defendant renewed his motion for a change of place of trial, but without making or attempting to make any further showing in the way of reasons why his application therefore should be granted than those already presented upon his previous motion, and that the court thereupon finally denied his application for a change of place of trial. We are satisfied, from a careful examination of the record, that the trial court, in the presence of the conflicting evidence presented before it, and particularly in the presence of the fact that it was able without unusual exertion or delay to procure a fair and impartial jury to try the cause, committed no breach of the discretion with which it was invested in the making of its order denying defendant's application for a change of place of trial.

[3] The next contention, which the appellant quite strenuously urges, is that the trial court committed prejudicial error, both in assuming to itself conduct the main examination of the jurors upon their voir dire, and in limiting unduly the right of appellant through his counsel to conduct such further examination of the members of the prospective jury as would suffice to sufficiently disclose the existence of any fact which might furnish the basis of challenges for cause, or which might otherwise show a lack of qualification on the part of the individual jurors to serve as such upon the jury. The briefs of counsel for the appellant would seem to present a very plausible basis for the foregoing contention, for it is admittedly true that the trial court, in assuming to act in conformity with the provisions of section 1078 of the Penal Code as amended in 1927, did undertake at the outset of the examination of the prospective jurors in this cause to unduly limit the right of counsel for the defendant to conduct such reasonable examination of certain of the prospective jurors as is still permitted under the provisions of said amended section of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"It shall be the duty of the trial court to examine the prospective jurors to select a fair and impartial jury. He shall permit reasonable examination of prospective jurors by counsel for the people and for the defendant." Pen. Code, § 1078, as amended by St. 1927, p. 1039.

Impressed by the earnest contention of counsel for the appellant in the foregoing regard, we have made a most careful examination of the record for the purpose of determining whether there exists therein sufficient showing of prejudicial error which would compel or justify a reversal of this cause. As a result of such examination we find the following to be the facts: At the outset of the trial 12 prospective jurors were called into the jury box and duly sworn for the purposes of their voir dire examination. The examination of the first of these disclosed a sufficient basis for a challenge for cause, and said juror was excused upon such challenge. The next juror examined was one J. J. Smith, who was examined quite at length by the trial judge touching his qualifications to serve as such juror. At the conclusion of such examination by the judge, the defendant, through his counsel, undertook to further examine said juror by asking him more particular questions touching his qualifications than those which had been embraced in his previous more general examination. The particular questions thus sought to be asked by defendant's counsel related chiefly to the inquiry as to whether he had read various newspaper articles published prior to the trial regarding the case. We feel satisfied that the trial court unduly restricted the examination of the juror Smith in the foregoing regard, and that it also unduly restricted the right of counsel for the defendant to make similar inquiries of certain other of the prospective jurors who were among the 12 first called for examination. The record, however, further discloses that the defendant did not present either a challenge for cause or a peremptory challenge as to juror Smith, and that the latter actually served upon the jury which was finally selected to try the cause. As to the remaining 10 jurors in this first drawn panel, they were all dismissed, either upon challenges for cause or peremptory challenges preferred by the defendant. Upon the repletion of the jury box with another quota of prospective jurors, the trial judge apparently reconsidered and withdrew from his previous attitude of strictness with relation to the examination of such jurors on the part of defendant's counsel, and not only permitted counsel for the defendant to conduct reasonably an examination of such further prospective jurors as were thereafter called to the jury box, but in every case wherein the further examination of such jurors was attempted by counsel for the defendant with the purpose in view of revealing possible grounds for challenges for cause, the trial court permitted a practically unrestricted examination. It thus appears that, as to every juror who was finally retained to try the cause, with the exception of juror Smith, there was no prejudicial limitation of the rights of the defendant upon the voir dire examination. The defendant claimed and was permitted to exercise 20 peremptory challenges upon the trial of the dual charge in the information. With respect to the juror Smith it nowhere appears that, after the trial judge had relaxed his earlier strictitude, any effort was made on the part of the defendant to further examine said juror prior to his being sworn to try the cause, and it further affirmatively appears that as to said juror Smith no peremptory challenge was presented. The defendant, however, having exhausted his 20 peremptory challenges without having challenged juror Smith, was permitted by the trial court to exercise an additional peremptory challenge with respect to another juror, who had been called to the box after the defendant's exhaustion of his quota of peremptory challenges. Having thus procured the aforesaid extension of his right to exercise peremptory challenges, the defendant, as the record discloses, made no effort to procure a further extension thereof so as to include and excuse juror Smith, and that without further objection on the part of the defendant the latter juror was, with the other 11, properly selected as jurors sworn to try the cause. Under the foregoing circumstances, as disclosed by our very careful examination of the record, we have no hesitation in concluding that no prejudicial error was committed by the trial court in the course of the selection of a fair and impartial jury to try the cause.

[4] The next contention urged by the appellant is that the trial court erred in allowing the prosecution to introduce the evidence given by the defendant at the coroner's inquest, which amounted to a confession of the commission of the dual homicide. The basis of this contention on the part of the defendant consists in his claim that the testimony which he gave at the coroner's inquest, while apparently given freely and voluntarily, was in fact a reproduction thereof of a confession which had been extorted from him by a course of threats, abuse, and intimidations to which he had been subjected at the hands of the officers of the law while in jail shortly after his arrest, upon the suspicion that he had committed the aforesaid crime. Upon the defendant's objection to the admission in evidence of his testimony given at the coroner's inquest, the defendant testified at length and with much of detail with regard to his aforesaid treatment while in jail, and to its effect in inducing the confession made to the officers there. On the other hand, all of the officers whom he thus charged with abuse and intimidation took the stand and denied much of the matter to which the defendant testified. It must be conceded, however, that a considerable amount of harsh treatment and of vile language addressed to the defendant by these officers prior to his confession there remained undisputed, and, had the confession which the defendant there gave been offered in evidence at the trial, it would be, to say the least of it, a matter of grave doubt as to whether that confession of the defendant, given under such circumstances, should have been received in evidence.

But that confession was not offered in evidence, and the fact is, as shown by the record, that some considerable time elapsed between the date of said jail confession and the time when the defendant was called as a witness and testified at the coroner's inquest. The practically undisputed evidence shows that, when called as a witness at the inquest, the defendant was fully informed of his rights in the premises, and was practically free from whatever duress had attended him while in the jail. The affirmative evidence of those who were present at the inquest would seem to show that whatever testimony the defendant gave there was freely and voluntarily given. Upon such showing, made preliminarily to the offer in evidence of the defendant's testimony so given, we are of the opinion that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the introduction in evidence of the defendant's said testimony. Having done so, and said evidence having been read to the jury, the trial court proceeded to instruct the jury that it was the ultimate judge of the propriety of considering such evidence. In so doing the trial court gave to the jury both the instruction offered by the prosecution and the instruction upon the same subject offered on behalf of the defendant, both of which instructions correctly stating the law and being in entire harmony with each other. Under the foregoing circumstances, we are of the opinion that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in permitting the introduction in evidence in the first instance of the defendant's said testimony, and that the defendant was not prejudicially affected thereby, nor by the instructions which the trial court subsequently gave to the jury upon the subject.

[5] The next contention of the appellant requiring comment is that wherein it is urged that the trial court was in error in permitting Ione Artist, a child of the age of nine years, a daughter of the decedents, who was present in the home of her parents and was a witness to certain facts which form a part of the res gestæ attending the commission of the dual crime, to testify as a witness in the case. Before permitting said child to be sworn and to give her evidence, the trial court conducted a quite careful inquiry regarding the mental capabilities of the child and her knowledge of the nature of the proceeding and of her oath and duty to be truthful in relation to the matters with respect to which she was to give her testimony, and we are unable to say that as the result of such careful and searching inquiry on the part of the trial judge he abused his discretion in permitting the evidence of this nine year old child to be given in the case. In support of this conclusion it may be added that the testimony of this child, when given and considered as a whole, is in entire harmony with the evidence of her elders, given in regard to the same matters with relation to which she was called and gave her testimony.

We come next to consider the contention of the defendant to the effect that sections 1016, 1017, and 1026 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927 (St. 1927, pp. 1148, 1149), are unconstitutional in so far as these sections provide for a dual hearing before the same or another jury upon the defendant's plea of "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity," made and required to be made by the provisions of the amended sections of the Penal Code above referred to. The record discloses that the defendant upon his arrest and arraignment, and after he had been provided by the court with able counsel, and after both he and they had been informed by the court as to the recent amendments in the Penal Code permitting the presentation by the defendant of the dual plea of "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity," and after sufficient time had been given to defendant and his counsel to determine what pleas he should present or refuse to present to the charges embraced in the information, tendered without any objections or qualification both of said pleas, and that thereupon the trial of the cause upon the defendant's plea of "not guilty" proceeded before the jury selected as above set forth; that during the course of the trial, and up to the time of the submission thereof to the jury, the defendant was permitted to testify fully and without objection to his version of the facts and circumstances preceding, attending, and succeeding the killings with which he was charged; that during his testimony, and also during the testimony of whatever witnesses he offered during that portion of the trial upon his own behalf, there was neither evidence nor suggestion that the defendant was insane.

Neither was there any contention presented by the defendant or his counsel touching the subject of his right to show, or to have the jury consider, any fact or proof with relation to the defendant's sanity or insanity, either at the time or prior to the commission of these homicides. In the foregoing state of the record this cause was submitted to the jury upon the defendant's plea of "not guilty," and upon a trial thereon, and upon the instructions as to the law of the case which the trial court then proceeded to give. In the course of giving such instructions as were offered by respective counsel and were either given as offered or as modified by the trial judge, there was an instruction to the effect that:

"To each count in this information the defendant has entered the plea of 'not guilty,' and also the plea of 'not guilty by reason of insanity.' Under the law, where a defendant enters these two pleas, he must first be tried on the plea of 'not guilty,' and later, if the jury find him guilty, the question of his sanity at the time of the commission of the offense is tried before a jury. You are instructed that this trial is on the plea of the defendant 'not guilty,' entered to each count of the information; that is to say, you are to determine whether or not the defendant committed the crimes charged against him in the information. In this trial the defendant is conclusively presumed to have been sane on December 4, 1927, at the time the offenses are alleged to have been committed."

Upon the other phases of this cause the instructions of the trial court were very full and very fair, and the defendant upon this appeal, other than by his attack upon the constitutionality of the foregoing amendments to the Penal Code, has made no objection or claim of error on the part of the trial court in its instructions to the jury. When the jury had been thus instructed and had retired, and had later been returned to the trial court twice for the reading, once of the court's entire instructions, and again of those portions thereof relating to the crime of murder of the first degree and to the powers and duties of juries in relation thereto, and had finally, and after such repeated instructions, returned to the court with a unanimous verdict finding the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree upon both counts in said information, and expressly fixing his punishment at death, the court announced its intention to proceed before the same jury with the hearing upon the defendant's plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity." The court thereupon proceeded to further examine each of the jurors, touching their qualifications to hear and determine the issue raised by the defendant's said plea, asking of each juror the following questions:

(1) "Have you any prejudice against the plea of insanity as a defense to crime?" to which each juror responded in the negative.

(2) "If the defendant should establish by a preponderance of evidence that he was insane at the time he committed the act, would you have any hesitancy in agreeing on a verdict finding him insane at said time?" to which question each juror in turn responded in the negative.

Thereupon defendant's counsel insisted upon the right of the defendant to further conduct an examination of said jurors as to their qualifications in the way of existing bias or prejudice to further sit and act as trial jurors in the cause, and also insisted upon the right of the defendant to further exercise peremptory challenges, and counsel for the defendant objected to further proceeding with the cause until they had been accorded the rights thus asserted and insisted upon. The trial court denied each of the foregoing requests, and its denial thereof is now asserted to have been prejudicial error. The defendant thereupon made the further objection to the further hearing of the cause before this or any other jury upon the ground that the defendant, by virtue of the proceedings thus far taken in the cause, had been once in jeopardy, and that to further proceed with the hearing upon the present issue would be to place the defendant for a second time in jeopardy, and in furtherance of said objection counsel for the defendant formally proffered the plea of once in jeopardy. The court overruled said objection and denied said plea, and this action upon its part is also asserted to have been prejudicial error.

After a delay of some days, owing to the illness of the defendant, the trial of the cause was proceeded with upon the issue raised by the defendant's plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity"; whereupon the defendant proceeded with the introduction of his evidence upon said plea, in the course of which he first offered certain affidavits purporting to have been made by persons living in another and distant state, and in which affidavits the affiants undertook to set forth certain facts with relation to the existence of insanity of certain members of the defendant's family and forbears. The introduction of these affidavits was objected to by the prosecution, and the trial court sustained said objection, and this action in so doing is asserted to have been prejudicial error. Thereupon the defendant proceeded to offer in evidence the testimony of two medical experts, who were asked and responded to certain hypothetical questions, and who also testified to having made a personal examination of the defendant during the progress of the trial with special reference to his then existing mental and physical condition. The defendant further introduced the testimony of three lay witnesses, two of whom gave it as their opinion that the defendant was insane, basing their opinion upon their observation of the defendant during the period of some years preceding the commission of said crimes, and the other of whom, a fellow inmate of the jail, gave a like opinion, based upon his observation of the defendant during his confinement there. Thereupon the defendant rested his case upon said issue, and upon his so doing the prosecution introduced a considerable body of evidence of both experts and lay witnesses touching this issue, after which the trial court gave to the jury a body of further instructions covering the issue of insanity, to the scope and sufficiency of which the defendant offers no objection. The jury then retired, and presently returned, as to each count of the information, a verdict finding the defendant sane at the time of the commission of each of the homicides charged therein. The judgment of conviction and sentence was thereupon pronounced by the court.

[6, 7] Upon the state of the record as disclosed by the foregoing facts and circumstances, having special reference to the appellant's contention that sections 1016, 1017 and 1026 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1927, are unconstitutional, we are of the opinion that we are not called upon to determine that question in this case. When the trial court had at the outset of the trial announced its intention of proceeding therewith under the provisions of the aforesaid sections of the Penal Code as thus amended, defendant, acting through his counsel, offered no objection of any kind to that procedure, but, on the contrary, proceeded to tender the dual plea of "not guilty" and "not guilty by reason of insanity," as provided for in said sections of the Penal Code, and thereafter and without objection proceeded with the trial of the cause upon the issue of "not guilty," in the course of which the defendant was permitted to offer such evidence as he desired, and was also permitted without objection to testify fully with reference, not only to the events of his past life, but also to his version of the facts and circumstances surrounding the injuries to the two decedents which resulted in the present death of each and with the occasioning of which he was charged, and, having done so, he rested his case. When the cause was thus submitted to the jury, there was no evidence in the record which in any degree tended to show that the defendant was insane. This being so, the presumption of sanity, whether disputable or conclusive, had full application to the then state of the defendant's case, and the jury were bound under the law, whether considered as it existed before or after the enactment of the foregoing amendments to the Penal Code, to apply such undisputed presumption and to find the defendant to be sane. This being so, it must be concluded that the instruction of the trial court to the jury, to the effect that at that stage of the case the defendant was conclusively presumed to be sane, cannot be held, at most, to have been other than harmless error.

With respect to the defendant's objection and plea of once in jeopardy, made for the first time at the inception of the proceedings for the purpose of determining the defendant's sanity upon his second plea, it must be evident that there was no semblance of merit in either said objection or said plea, for the reason that, conceding that the defendant had been once put in jeopardy by the event of the trial thus far proceeded with upon his plea of "not guilty," the further proceeding with the hearing upon his plea of "not guilty by reason of insanity" could not by any course of reasoning place him in further jeopardy, since the sole purpose of such hearing was that of permitting the defendant to relieve himself of the state of jeopardy in which he had been thus placed through the showing that at the time of the commission of the crimes of which he had been found guilty he was in fact insane and therefore innocent. The inaptitude of such objection and plea is further illustrated by a consideration of the state in which the defendant would have been placed, had the trial court sustained him in such objection and plea, and which would obviously have been that of leaving him fully subject to his prior conviction and penalty and wholly bereft of his opportunity to show that he was insane at the time of the commission of the crimes of which he had been thus convicted.

[8, 9] We are thus brought to a consideration of the question as to whether the rights of the defendant were prejudicially invaded by the refusal on the part of the trial court to permit a further examination of the members of the jury before proceeding with the trial upon the issue of the defendant's sanity in order to determine the existence in the minds of the members of the jury of a state of bias or prejudice with regard to that issue. Conceding, for the sake of argument, that the trial court ought, in the exercise of the discretion intrusted to it under the provisions of section 1078 of the Penal Code as recently amended, to have permitted such examination, the question remains as to whether any error which the trial court may have committed in that regard can be held to have been prejudicial error, and the solution of this question depends upon what further followed in the course of the hearing upon the issue of the defendant's sanity.

The defendant, in assuming without further objection the affirmative of that issue, introduced five witnesses in support of his said plea. Two of the three lay witnesses thus produced by the defendant testified that in their opinion the defendant was insane. In support of that opinion, however, said lay witnesses gave testimony as to certain facts and circumstances coming within the observation of each of them during their acquaintance with the defendant prior to the commission of said homicides, and it is obvious that the opinion evidence of such lay witnesses as to the defendant's sanity can be of no greater evidentiary value than that which could be given to the facts and circumstances to which they each testified and which formed the sole basis of their opinion.

When we examine the record as to such facts and circumstances we find that these refer to mere oddities or peculiarities in the occasional actions and conduct of the defendant and which show him to have displayed to the observation of these witnesses no greater degree of individuality or even of eccentricity than may be observed in the actions and conduct of most persons who are indubitably sane. The testimony of these two lay witnesses, therefore, must be considered as having no evidentiary value. As to the other of the three lay witnesses, he was an inmate of the jail in which the defendant was confined after the commission of his crimes and during the progress of his trial, and the testimony of this witness is inherently valueless, not only because it related to a time subsequent to the commission of said homicides, but that it disclosed nothing further than the existence of a degree of nervousness on the part of the defendant which would be nothing more than natural considering the imminent peril in which he stood at the time.

As to the defendant's two expert witnesses, each of these was a physician called to testify under an order of court, made in conformity with law, permitting the appointment of expert witnesses by the court in criminal cases. These witnesses, when thus called and examined at the instance of the defendant, were asked to respond to three hypothetical questions prepared and propounded by counsel for the defendant. To the first of these questions, which related solely to the past life of the defendant previous to the commission of his crime, each of said expert witnesses unhesitatingly testified that the facts set forth in said hypothetical question showed no evidence of insanity or unsound mind. The second hypothetical question asked of each of said expert witnesses bore upon the relations which had arisen and existed between the defendant and his two victims, and also between the defendant and their elder daughter, and to the facts and circumstances arising out of such relationships and assumed to be existent up to the time immediately preceding the infliction of the injuries upon the decedent father and mother of the girl, and to the hypothetical question embracing the foregoing matters each of said expert witnesses testified in turn that there was nothing therein to indicate any degree of insanity or unsoundness of mind on the part of the defendant. By the third hypothetical question asked of these two witnesses, counsel for the defendant undertook to relate in detail the facts and circumstances which the evidence in the case had disclosed with reference to the killing of the two persons with whose murder the defendant was charged, and also with reference to the actions and conduct of the defendant as testified to by himself and others immediately following the infliction of the injuries which produced the decedents' death.

It is to be noted that in framing this hypothetical question there was omitted therefrom certain details which had an important bearing upon the existence or nonexistence of a motive for the alleged acts of the defendant in subjecting the decedents to the violent injuries which resulted in their present decease. To the hypothetical question thus framed and asked of each of said witnesses they responded that in their opinion the acts of the defendant as thus related to them indicated temporary insanity at the time of his commission of said crimes. These two expert witnesses, each upon their direct examination by counsel for the defendant, proceeded to testify that they had each separately conducted a personal and professional examination of the defendant during the progress of the trial, and as a result of such examination they each unequivocally stated that the defendant at the time of such examination was both physically and mentally normal and sane. Upon cross-examination each of said witnesses testified that their opinion that the defendant must have been temporarily insane at the time he committed said crimes was predicated upon the fact that his commission thereof was an illogical sequence of his past life and of his relationship with his two victims, and upon the further fact that in the hypothetical question which had been propounded to them no motive had been disclosed for the commission by him of said crimes. Each of said witnesses, however, conceded that their conclusion as to the temporary insanity of the defendant would have been quite different had the evidence in the case and the hypothetical question upon which their opinion was founded disclosed a motive for the commission of the crimes. This is most aptly illustrated by the concluding question asked of the witness Podstata, who quite sufficiently qualified himself as an expert witness by showing that he was the physician in charge of the Livermore Sanitarium for the past seventeen years and a lecturer upon mental disorders in the University of California. The following was the final question asked of this witness:

"Then the only fact in this hypothetical question upon which you rely in forming your opinion that the man was temporarily insane at the time he murdered these people is the fact that he did murder them and that there was no sufficient cause or motive shown in the hypothetical question?" Answer: "Yes."

An examination of the record quite sufficiently discloses a motive which might have led, and which probably did lead, this defendant to commit this dual crime. That motive was shown to consist in the fact that the defendant, after some years of cordial acquaintanceship with the members of the Artist family, and after he had formed an affectionate relationship with Isabelle, the elder daughter, discovered upon his visit to the household of the Artists that the parents of the girl were apparently disposed to favor the transfer of her affections to another suitor, and that the girl herself manifested a similar disposition, and that in fact, upon the very evening prior to the commission of said crime, he had been deceived and misled with relation thereto. What feelings of jealousy may thus have been awakened, or what resolution as to his actions in the presence of this situation was made, must be left to inference and surmise. But the facts remain that, immediately after the violent and murderous attack upon the father and mother of the girl, he attempted not only to have illicit intercourse with her, but to induce her to go away with him, without disclosing to her or to the other members of the family the fact that a violent and fatal assault had been made upon the father and mother, with relation to which the evidence is irresistible that he either must have committed, or must at the time have known of the commission of, the assault, and that these facts furnish abundant evidence of the existence of a motive which, if it existed, would have rendered utterly valueless the purely hypothetical conclusion of the expert witnesses called by the defendant that at the time of the commission of said crimes he was temporarily insane.

It is our deduction from the foregoing that there was no substantial evidence in the case sufficient to justify a verdict on the part of this or of another jury finding this defendant at the time of the commission of his aforesaid crimes to have been insane. This being so, any limitation which was placed by the trial judge upon the rights of the defendant's counsel to question further the jurors as to the existence of any mental attitude amounting to bias or prejudice against the defense of insanity or against the defendant seeking to establish that defense could not at the most have been other than harmless error.

The record fully discloses that the defendant committed a most foul, brutal, and utterly unjustified and unjustifiable crime; that he was brought to trial therefor before a fair and impartial jury; that he submitted himself without objection at the outset to the form of procedure adopted by the trial court; that he presented without protest or objection, the dual pleas provided for in the aforesaid amended sections of the Penal Code; that he proceeded to trial upon the first of said pleas, in the course of which he was permitted to introduce all of the evidence which he saw fit to offer bearing upon the history of his own past life and upon his relation to the family of his victims, and as to his own version as to the facts and circumstances attending and succeeding the commission of his said crimes; that upon his conviction upon the first of his said pleas the only objection which he urged to the purpose of the court to proceed before the same jury upon the second of his said pleas consisted in his insistence upon the right to further examine the jury and upon his claim and plea of once in jeopardy. These having been denied him, he proceeded with the second phase of the trial, assuming therein the burden of showing that he was insane. He entirely failed to make good such plea or showing by any sufficient or substantial evidence upon which the present or any other jury could have arrived at a verdict that the defendant was at the time of the commission of said murders insane. It thus appears that, entirely regardless of whatever errors, if any, the trial court may have committed in the course of the defendant's trial, it in no substantial way interfered with the canons of our criminal law, which entitle a defendant to a fair and impartial trial for the offense or offenses with which he has been charged.

In view of the foregoing conclusions the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re COOK'S ESTATE.

KESTER et al. v. McNEAR et al.
(S. F. 12968.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 23, 1928.

1. Judgment $\S$ 570(3)—Dismissal by plaintiff will not bar subsequent action for same cause (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 581, subd. 1).

Ordinary action or proceeding in court may be dismissed by plaintiff, and such dismissal will not bar subsequent action filed by him for same cause under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 581, subd. 1, though rule is different where judgment of dismissal is rendered on application of either party with written consent of the other.

2. Action $\S$ 25(1)—All distinction between actions in law and equity has been abolished.

In California, all distinction between actions in law and equity has been abolished, and parties are limited to but one form of action for enforcement of their rights.

3. Wills $\S$ 259—Will contest initiated after time appointed for hearing of petition, but before hour to which such hearing has been postponed, is in time (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1308).

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1308, will contest, initiated after time originally appointed for hearing of petition, but before hour to which such hearing has been postponed, is in time.

4. Wills $\S$ 307—Voluntary dismissal of will contest held not to bar contestants from instituting second contest (Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 581, 1308, 1327).

Contestants of will held not barred from instituting second contest by reason of voluntary dismissal of first contest since, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1303, 1327, section 581 is applicable to probate proceedings, and it is immaterial that words "without prejudice" did not appear in order dismissing first contest.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; R. L. Thompson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Eliza Cook, deceased. From an order admitting a purported will and codicil to probate, and from an order granting the motion of George P. McNear, as special administrator, and another to strike out and dismiss a contest filed by Maud Kester, and another, contestants appeal. Reversed.

W. F. Cowan, Wallace L. Ware, and George W. Murphy, all of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

F. A. Meyer, of Petaluma, and Vallandigham & Hollingsworth, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

CURTIS, J. This appeal is from an order of the superior court of the county of Sonoma, sitting as a probate court, admitting to probate the purported will and codicil of Eliza Cook, deceased, and also from the order of said court granting the motion of proponents to strike out and dismiss the contest to said will filed by contestants.

A petition for the probate of said purported will and codicil by respondent George P. McNear, the executor therein named, was filed in said probate court. Thereafter, and before the hearing of said petition, the contestants herein, together with some other heirs of said deceased, appeared in said proceeding and filed their written opposition to the probate of said will and their contest thereto. An answer was filed to said opposition and contest, and the matter came on for trial before a jury in said court. The verdict of said jury was in favor of the contestants, but was thereafter set aside by the trial court. The matter again came on for trial on November 16, 1927. The proponents objected to a trial of said matter by a jury on the ground that contestants had not complied with the provisions of section 1312 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring a written request for a jury trial to be filed at least 10 days prior to the day set for the hearing. The objection was sustained by the court. Thereupon the contestants in open court dismissed their opposition to the probate of said will, and the court made an order dismissing said contest. This order was made in open court on the 16th day of November, 1927. On December 9th following there was filed a written order of the court dismissing said contest. This order, among other things, recited and decreed as follows:

"It appearing to the satisfaction of said court that the said contestants have abandoned and vountarily renounced their contest and opposition to said will on motion of said contestants, it is hereby ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said contest and opposition to said will filed herein by Alonzo Smith Cook (also known as Robert Cook or Bob Cook), Isaac N. Cook, Jefferson D. Cook, Grover Cook and Maud Kester, be and the same is hereby dismissed."

Upon the dismissal of said contest and opposition, and upon the request of the proponent, George P. McNear, the petition for the probate of said will was postponed and continued to November 18, 1927. On the same day of the dismissal of the original contest of said will, to wit, on said November 16, 1927, the contestants filed in said court a second contest of the probate of said will and codicil. The second contest was in writing and was based upon the same grounds which were relied upon in the first or original contest. The proponents promptly moved the court to strike out and dismiss said second contest, which motion was granted on December 6, 1927, and three days thereafter the court made its order admitting said will to probate. From each of these two last-mentioned orders the contestants have appealed. The order dismissing the second contest recites that the first contest came on regularly to be heard on the 16th day of November, 1927, "and the said contestants then and there in open court abandoned and renounced their contest of the said will and this court on said day, made and entered its final order dismissing the same." While the written order of the court dismissing the first contest and that dismissing the second contest recite that the contestants had abandoned and renounced their first contest of the probate of said will, these recitals are not strictly in accordance with the record before us showing just what did transpire in court at the time of such dismissal. As already stated, the contestants desired a jury trial, which was denied by the court, whereupon one of the attorneys for contestants stated to the court: "Then, if your Honor please, the contestants dismiss the opposition to the probate of the will." To this statement of counsel the court replied: "Very well. Let the opposition to the probate of the will be dismissed on motion of the contestants." These statements of the court and counsel constitute all that took place in court bearing upon the dismissal of the first contest. It is very evident therefrom that all that contestants did on that occasion was to voluntarily dismiss in open court their contest. Nothing was then said by contestants, or by their attorneys, or by the court to the effect that contestants had renounced or abandoned their contest. The written order of dismissal of the first contest, filed some 24 days after the court made its verbal order of dismissal, must be read in the light of the proceedings taken in court at the time the verbal order was made, as said written order shows upon its face that it was based upon said proceedings.

As so read and understood, it amounts to no more than an order of dismissal made upon contestants' voluntary motion to dismiss said proceeding. It cannot be accepted as a finding or adjudication of the court that the contestants had renounced and abandoned their contest.

[1] The sole question presented by this appeal is whether the contestants are barred from instituting their second contest of the probate of said will by reason of their dismissal of their first contest and the order of the probate court dismissing said first contest upon the voluntary motion of contestants that said contest be dismissed.

An ordinary action or proceeding in court may be dismissed by the plaintiff, and such dismissal will not be a bar to a subsequent action filed by him for the same cause. Davenport v. Turpin, 43 Cal. 597; McCreary v. Casey, 45 Cal. 128; Lord v. Dunster, 79 Cal. 477, 21 P. 865; Parks v. Dunlap, 86 Cal. 189, 25 P. 916; Pierce v. Hilton, 102 Cal. 276, 36 P. 595; Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 55 P. 141; Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885; Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 121 P. 720; Foster v. Branen, 178 Cal. 118, 172 P. 382.

Such a dismissal is usually made under subdivision 1 of section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure by written request of the plaintiff made to the clerk to dismiss the action and by entering of the dismissal by the clerk in his register. But this method is not exclusive. It may be made in open court upon motion of the plaintiff. Hinkel v. Donohue, 90 Cal. 389, 27 P. 301; Richards & Knox v. Bradley, 129 Cal. 670, 672, 62 P. 316. The rule, however, is different when the judgment of dismissal is rendered on the application of either party with the written consent of the other. In such a case the dismissal is held to be a voluntary renunciation of the plaintiff's action and amounts to a retraxit. Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542; Stoutenborough v. Bd. Education, 104 Cal. 664, 38 P. 449; Crossman v. Davis, 79 Cal. 603, 21 P. 963. But where the dismissal is voluntary and is made without any agreement between the parties, it is not a bar to a subsequent action. This rule is clearly and positively stated in the case of Parks v. Dunlap, supra, as follows:

"Conceding, however, that the question in litigation in the former action was the same now presented, it is well settled that the voluntary dismissal of an action, without any agreement of the parties or other circumstances tending to show that such dismissal was intended as a final disposition of the dispute between the parties, is not a bar to another action."

Upon an examination of the other authorities cited above in support of this rule, there will be found numerous statements therein equally as positive and definite as the foregoing excerpt from the decision of Parks v. Dunlap.

[2] One answer to these authorities made by the respondents is that the proceeding to contest the probate of wills is an equitable proceeding and that the rule above enunciated does not apply to suits in equity. In support of this claim, the respondents have cited a number of authorities from other jurisdictions to the effect that the dismissal of a bill in chancery will be presumed to be a final and conclusive adjudication on the merits, whether they were or were not determined, unless the contrary is apparent on the face of the pleading or in the decree of court. However controlling these authorities may be in the jurisdictions in which they were rendered, they have little or no application to the rule of practice in this state, where all distinction between actions in law and equity has been abolished and parties are limited to but one form of action for the enforcement of their rights. There is nothing in the cases of Asevado v. Orr, 100 Cal. 293, 34 P. 777; Frahm v. Walton, 130 Cal. 396, 62 P. 618; or Heim v. Mooney, 23 Cal. App. 233, 137 P. 616, which tends in the least degree to support respondents' contention that a different rule obtains in suits in equity than that applicable to actions at law. While the precise point has never been the subject of any adjudicated case in this state, the instances are numerous where the voluntary dismissal by the plaintiff of an equitable action has been held not to constitute a bar to the institution of a second action for the same cause. Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885; Foster v. Branen, 178 Cal. 118, 172 P. 382; Parks v. Dunlap, 86 Cal. 189, 25 P. 916.

These cases, with the exception of the first, were actions instituted to foreclose mortgages. The case of Carr v. Howell, supra, was an action for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of real property. Plaintiff commenced the action in the superior court. The action was removed to the United States Circuit Court upon the ground that Mrs. Dwyer, one of the defendants, was a citizen of the state of Louisiana. Thereafter Mrs. Dwyer died, and a citizen of this state was appointed administrator of her estate. Thereupon the plaintiff voluntarily dismissed the action before the federal court, and instituted a new action against said administrator in the superior court. It was contended that plaintiff was barred from maintaining the subsequent action in the superior court by reason of his dismissal of the first action. The court held that:

"The rule has long been established that a judgment of dismissal given upon motion of the plaintiff, before the hearing or trial of any issue of law or fact and without any determination of the merits of the cause, is no bar to a subsequent suit in any court upon the same cause of action [citing authorities]. The court below correctly held that this judgment was no bar to the present action."

[3, 4] There is no provision of the law relating to the administration of estates expressly limiting the time in which a contest of a will before the probate thereof may be filed. After a will has been admitted to probate, section 1327 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "any person interested may, at any time within one year after such probate, contest the same or the validity of the will." The only provision of our law bearing even indirectly upon the question as to the time in which a contest to a will may be filed before probate is to be found in section 1308 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, "if no person appears to contest the probate of the will, the court may admit it to probate on the testimony of one of the subscribing witnesses only." In view of the provisions of this section of the Code this court has held that a contest initiated after the time originally appointed for the hearing of the petition, but before the hour to which such hearing had been postponed, was in time. Stewart v. Hall, 100 Cal. 246, 34 P. 706; Estate of Mollenkopf, 164 Cal. 576, 129 P. 997. The Supreme Court of Montana, where the statute is in most respects like the above section of the Code of Civil Procedure of our own state, has given a similar ruling. Raleigh v. District Court, 24 Mont. 306, 61 P. 991, 81 Am. St. Rep. 431; State v. District Court, 25 Mont. 355, 65 P. 120. In the present proceeding, therefore, the second contest filed by contestants was within the time provided by the provisions of our Code of Civil Procedure. It was therefore a valid and legal contest, provided the voluntary dismissal by contestants of their prior contest was not a bar to the institution of this second or subsequent contest. As we have previously shown, the voluntary dismissal of an ordinary action in court is not a bar to a subsequent action instituted upon the same cause of action. We see no reason why this same rule should not apply to contests filed for the purpose of contesting wills, in the absence of any statute or Code provision upon the subject providing that such a dismissal would bar a subsequent proceeding. The question, so far as we are aware, has never been before the appellate courts of this state. The matter was discussed by the District Court of Appeal in the matter of the Estate of Knauff, 59 Cal. App. 536, 211 P. 29. In that proceeding the contestants had filed a contest and petition to have the probate of the will of said deceased set aside. The matter came on for hearing, and the contestants in open court moved to dismiss their contest and petition, without prejudice, which motion was granted over the objection of the proponents. The judgment dismissing the proceeding recited the fact that such dismissal was made without prejudice to the filing of a new contest and petition by the contestants. In passing upon this judgment of dismissal the court said (page 537 of 59 Cal. App. [211 P. 29]):

"It is insisted first that the court had no authority to so qualify the judgment of dismissal as to give to the petitioners the right to further prosecute a proceeding for the revocation of the probate order. It seems to be well settled under our practice that a party may at any time, before final submission of a cause, dismiss the same (sec. 581, Code Civ. Proc., subd. 4), and that the judgment in that case will not operate as a bar to the recommencement of an action based upon the same cause (Merritt v. Campbell, 47 Cal. 542; Westbay v. Gray et al., 116 Cal. 660 [48 P. 800]), and there seems to be no reason why the same rule is not applicable to proceedings in probate."

As the order of court dismissing the prior contest in Estate of Knauff was made without prejudice to the contestants to file a new petition, that case is not an authority in support of appellants' contention that the dismissal of the prior contest, wherein no mention was made in the order of the court or elsewhere that the dismissal was made without prejudice, was not a bar to a subsequent contest by them. The case is authority, however, that the rule governing the dismissal of actions generally under section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure is applicable to probate proceedings. That being the case, and the overwhelming weight of authority in this state being that the voluntary dismissal of an action by the plaintiff is not a bar to a subsequent action instituted by the same party upon the same cause of action, it naturally and logically follows that the dismissal of a contest in a probate proceeding is not a bar to a subsequent contest by the same contestants based upon the same grounds of contest, provided, of course, the same is filed within the time limited by the Code of Civil Procedure.

Respondents further contend that, as the words "without prejudice" do not appear in the order dismissing the first contest, the contestants are barred by said order from instituting a new contest. We think there is no merit in this contention, and we are cited to no authority to support it. On the other hand, there is an abundance of authorities holding that an order or judgment of dismissal, which contains no statement whatever that it was made without prejudice, is not a bar to a subsequent action. Pyle v. Piercy, 122 Cal. 383, 384, 55 P. 141; Rosenthal v. McMann, 93 Cal. 505, 509, 29 P. 121; Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 372, 97 P. 885.

Other points are made by respondents in support of their contention that the orders of the trial court should be sustained by this court. We think, however, we have considered all the more important questions raised by the briefs of the parties, and that a further discussion of any additional matters would serve no useful purpose. It is clear, according to the authorities cited, that the voluntary dismissal by contestants of their first contest did not bar them from instituting the second contest. The court therefore had no authority to dismiss the second contest on the ground that the contestants named therein had joined with the other heirs of the testator in dismissing the prior contest. As a valid contest was on file at the time the petition for the probate of the will came on for hearing, the probate court was in error in hearing and thereafter granting said petition without first disposing of, in the manner provided by law, the contest then on file. It follows, therefore, that the orders appealed from should be, and they are hereby, reversed.

205 Cal. 569

LIND et al. v. HUENE et ux. (L. A. 9480.)

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 22, 1928.

1. Brokers $\S$ 43(2)—Contract for employment of broker to procure lessee for real property need not be in writing (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 6).

Contract for employment or compensation of broker for services in procuring lessee of real property is not required to be in writing, since not within terms of Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 6.

2. Brokers $\S$ 43(2)—Oral agreement of brokers to procure lessee of apartment building was valid, and brokers' rights thereunder after cancellation of agreement were not defeated by lessee's repudiation (Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 6).

Oral contract for employment of brokers to secure lessee for apartment house building, under which brokers procured written offer to lease and written acceptance from defendant containing terms of commission, was valid and enforceable, and brokers' rights were not defeated by repudiation of contract on lessee's part, written contract for brokers' employment to procure lessee not being required by Civ. Code, $\S$ 1624, subd. 6.

3. Brokers $\S$ 64(2)—Failure of lessees to make deposit stipulated in offer to lease precluded lessor's brokers from recovering commission under written acceptance providing for payment of commission out of moneys received.

Under provision in defendant's acceptance of offer to lease apartment building, agreeing to pay specified commission to agent, "said amount to be retained out of moneys received as designated in this offer to lease," brokers acquired no right to commissions where $6,000 agreed to be deposited under terms of offer to lease was never paid and defendant did not consent to broker's acceptance of lessee's note for that amount.

4. Brokers $\S$ 64(2)—Lessor's agreement to accept lessee's note in lieu of cash payment stipulated in offer to lease did not entitle lessor's brokers to commissions payable from cash deposit.

If defendant, attempting to lease apartment building, accepted lessee's note in lieu of cash payment provided for in offer to lease, such acceptance was nevertheless ineffectual to give lessor's brokers right to commission, where written acceptance provided commission should be "retained out of the moneys received as designated in this offer to lease," and where no payments were made on the note.

5. Brokers $\S$ 64(2)—That lessor executed formal lease after refusal of proposed lessee to make cash deposit did not constitute ratification of brokers' acceptance of note in lieu of deposit.

That lessors drew up formal lease and executed it after refusal of lessee to consummate agreement for lease by making cash deposit stipulated in offer to lease did not amount to ratification of lessee's execution of note in lieu of the cash deposit, as regards right of brokers to commissions, payment of which was to be made from money deposit.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Suit by C. H. Lind and E. P. De Haven, copartners doing business under the fictitious name and style of the Lind-De Haven Company against E. A. Huene and Clara Huene, his wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant last named appeals. Reversed.

C. A. Stutsman, W. W. Kaye, and Stutsman & Stutsman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Louis F. Laberere and John A. Cronin, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SEAWELL, J. This appeal was taken by defendant Clara Huene from a judgment for plaintiffs in an action brought by them to recover a commission as real estate brokers for securing a lessee for an apartment house building which was being constructed upon premises in the city of Los Angeles owned by said defendant. The transaction was never consummated because of the refusal of the prospective lessee to accept a lease of the premises, in accordance with the terms of her agreement with defendant, and to pay sums of money which became due under said agreement.

Appellant recognizes the general rule that a broker employed to negotiate a sale or lease of land earns his commission, and it is payable, when he produces a purchaser or lessee who is ready, willing, and able to take the property on the terms prescribed, or other terms accepted by the owner, and the broker cannot be deprived of the agreed commission because the purchaser or lessee repudiates the transaction by refusing to make payments provided for or to accept the deed or lease tendered in performance of the contract of sale or lease. Lundeen v. Ottis, 164 Cal. 183, 128 P. 335; Johnson v. Krier, 59 Cal. App. 330, 210 P. 966; Rucker v. Hubler, 56 Cal. App. 771, 206 P. 472. Defendant contends, however, that the general rule does not apply in her case, for the reason that the agreement for the commission herein expressly makes the earning of a commission conditional upon the payment by the lessee to the owner of advance rental. She further relies upon the rule stated in Jennings v. Jordan, 31 Cal. App. 335, 160 P. 576, Brion v. Cahill, 34 Cal. App. 258, 165 P. 704, Stewart v. Bowle, 43 Cal. App. 751, 185 P. 868, and more recently in Houghton v. Kuehnrich, 46 Cal. App. 469, 189 P. 457, wherein it is said that, when there is no separate enforceable contract of employment with the broker, and the owner's promise to pay the broker a commission is found only in the contract entered into between the owner and the prospective purchaser, if the purchaser should fail to carry out his undertaking to purchase, the owner is released from his promise to pay the broker a commission. In such a case, if the wrongful abandonment of the contract is consented to, the whole contract falls, the provision relating to the agent's commission with the rest. Jennings v. Jordan, 31 Cal. App. 335, 160 P. 576.

The inapplicability of the last-mentioned rule to the case at bar is patent from a recital of the transaction. At the time said apartment house building was in the course of construction, salesmen in the employ of plaintiffs procured from defendant and her husband oral authorization to undertake to find a lessee for a term of ten years at a monthly rental of $1,000. Such authorization was given upon the solicitation of plaintiffs' salesmen. The employment of plaintiffs as brokers to secure a lessee was not evidenced by a written agreement, nor does it appear that the rate of commission was definitely agreed upon. On October 6, 1923, a written "Offer to Lease," prepared at plaintiffs' office and signed by Mrs. Minnie G. Driggs, the prospective lessee, was submitted to the owner of said property, Mrs. Clara Huene, appellant herein, and to her husband, by Mrs. Westover, plaintiffs' employee. A written "Acceptance," also prepared by plaintiffs and designed for the signature of Mrs. Huene, followed the "Offer to Lease" executed by Mrs. Driggs. Said "Acceptance," as originally submitted to the Huenes, was as follows:

"I accept the above offer to lease and agree to the terms and conditions as set forth therein. I further agree to pay the Lind-DeHaven Co. the usual commission for services rendered, in accordance with the rules of the Los Angeles Realty Board, said amount to be retained out of the moneys received, as designated in this offer to lease."

The realty board commission on the transaction would have approximated $6,000. Mrs.

Huene refused to consent to the payment of such a commission, and after some negotiations with plaintiffs' agent agreed to pay not more than $3,500. Several days later plaintiffs consented to the reduction, and the words "the usual commission" and "in accordance with the rules of the Los Angeles Realty Board" were "x'd" out and the $3,500 written in their stead, whereupon Mrs. Huene signed the "Acceptance." On October 20, Mrs. Driggs gave notice to plaintiffs that she refused to go on with the deal, and, when a lease signed by the Huenes was presented to her for acceptance during the early part of November, she again repudiated the contract she had made with Mrs. Huene. No part of the $2,000 agreed to be paid upon the execution of the "Acceptance" was ever received from Mrs. Driggs. Having other offers to lease the property, the Huenes did not choose to enforce the contract by court proceedings.

On the date when the "Acceptance" was signed by Mrs. Huene, there had been inserted in writing, immediately between Mrs. Driggs' signature to the "Offer to Lease," which was a rather long document, presumably typewritten, and the "Acceptance," the following provision:

"Receipt.

"We hereby acknowledge the receipt of $6000.00 (note) dollars.

"Lind-DeHaven Co.,

"By C. H. Lind."

This provision will be discussed more fully hereafter.

[1, 2] In the cases above cited which hold that, where there is no separate contract of employment with the broker and the owner's promise to pay a commission is found only in the contract entered into between the owner and the prospective purchaser, if the purchaser should fail to carry out his undertaking, the owner is released from his promise to pay a broker's commission, the transactions involved were for the sale or exchange of real property. In those cases the broker could not recover a commission in the absence of a written commission contract or memorandum signed by the seller (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6), and the only enforceable written agreement to pay a commission was contained in the contract between the owner and the purchaser, which agreement fell with the written contract when the purchaser repudiated it and the owner consented to the wrongful abandonment. In the instant case the brokers were not authorized to sell or exchange the property, but only to procure a lessee. The contract for their employment or compensation was not required to be in writing by the terms of subdivision 6 of section 1624, Civil Code, which applies only to agreements authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate. Guy v. Brennen, 60 Cal. App. 452, 213 P. 265. The negotiations between plaintiffs' agent and Mrs. Huene resulted in a valid and enforceable oral agreement between plaintiffs and Mrs. Huene for the payment of a commission of $3,500 to plaintiffs. Upon the repudiation of the contract for a lease, there remained to the brokers under their valid oral contract with the lessor the same rights they would have possessed had their employment been evidenced by a separate written agreement between themselves and the lessor.

[3] Appellant must fail on this point, but, on the other point made by her, to wit, that the agreement made payment of the commission conditional upon the receipt of advance rental agreed to be paid by Mrs. Driggs, the case must be reversed. Mrs. Driggs' "Offer to Lease" contained the following provision:

"As security for my faithful performance of this lease, I agree to pay six months' rental in the sum of Six Thousand Dollars ($6,000.00), as follows: $2,000.00 upon my signing of this agreement, and $4,000 upon the completion and my occupancy of the building. This total sum of $6,000 to apply—$2,000 as the first two months' rent, and $4,000 to be the last four months' rent of the lease."

The "Acceptance," quoted above, when first submitted to Mrs. Huene and as finally executed by her, provided that the amount agreed to be paid as a commission was "to be retained out of the moneys received as designated in this offer to lease." It was not contemplated that the building would be completed until December 15. The payment of a portion of the brokers' commission of $3,500 would not become due until that date, since only $2,000 was due as advanced rental upon the execution of the contract. We regard the quoted language as a plain and unequivocal declaration that payment of the commission was to be made only if the amounts agreed to be paid by Mrs. Driggs were actually received. Said language is to be given the same effect as was ascribed to the contract in Lindley v. Fay, 119 Cal. 239, 51 P. 333, where the provision was to pay a commission "out of the first money received." In Beckwith-Anderson Land Co. v. Allison, 26 Cal. App. 473, 147 P. 482, defendant was notified by letter from plaintiff as a real estate brokerage firm of an offer received by plaintiff to purchase real property owned by defendant. The letter contained the following:

"If you should consider this we would want to retain as a commission for ourselves 5%, being fifteen hundred ($1500.00) dollars out of the first cash payment of fifteen thousand ($15,000.00)." (Italics supplied.)

Defendant accepted the offer. In denying a recovery of a commission to plaintiff, the court said:

"The letter proposed that the commission should be paid 'out of the first cash payment of $15,000.' No such payment has ever been made; nor can the failure to make it be chargeable as caused by any fault of the defendant. The condition so stated under which the commission might become due has never occurred."

See, also, Dunne v. Colomb, 192 Cal. 740, 221 P. 912; McPhail v. Buell, 87 Cal. 115, 25 P. 266; Coulter v. Howard (Cal. Sup.) 262 P. 751.

The plaintiffs rely upon their receipt of said $6,000 note, as acknowledged by plaintiff Lind by the insertion, as above explained, between Mrs. Driggs' signature to the "Offer to Lease" and the first line of the "Acceptance," as creating a different commission contract. On October 6, the day Mrs. Driggs signed the "Offer to Lease," she also signed a $6,000 promissory note payable to plaintiffs and to become due October 22. This was a separate transaction between plaintiffs and Mrs. Driggs. Appellant and her husband testified, and there is other evidence sustaining them, that the acknowledgment of said note was not on the offer when it was presented to them first on October 6, at the time they objected to the fixing of the commission in accordance with the rules of the realty board, and that they did not observe that it had been inserted in ink until several days thereafter, at the time when Mrs. Huene signed the acceptance and demanded the cash payment. The positive testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Huene, Mrs. Westover, the employee who conducted the transaction for plaintiffs (in one part of her testimony), Mr. Brock, the constructor of the building, and Mr. Arcander, a former salesman of plaintiffs, further aided by the conduct of the parties and the strong probabilities arising in the case, which cannot be ignored, present convincing proof to the effect that the Huenes, from the time their notice first fell upon the ink insertion written by plaintiff Lind between the offer to lease and its acceptance, emphatically and positively refused to accept a note in lieu of cash and that they were assured that the word "note," which plaintiffs parenthetically inserted after the words $6,000, referred to a separate transaction between plaintiffs and Mrs. Driggs, and was inserted for their convenience, and had nothing to do with the transaction between Mrs. Driggs and the Huenes. It would have been an absurd, if not an inane, thing for the Huenes, who were insisting on cash advance payments aggregating $6,000, to have accepted as security therefor another form of evidence of debt in the form of a bare promissory note. They already had her bound by the execution of the offer to lease, and another signature would not tend to secure the first obligation any more than the first would tend to secure the second. The testimony of the witnesses above-named is reasonable, probable, and seems convincing, and is supported by the rationale of the situation. Mrs. Westover, the saleslady who conducted the transaction, gave testimony to the effect that Mrs. and Mrs. Huene called her attention to the receipt calling for a note, whereas the offer to lease called for cash, and that she (Mrs. Westover) explained to the Huenes that the note was inserted as a matter of convenience arranged between Mrs. Driggs and plaintiffs, and that it was made to give Mrs. Driggs time to bring her cash to Los Angeles. It is true that plaintiff Lind and Mrs. Westover elsewhere in her testimony denied the conversations as related by the defendant's witnesses touching the purpose of said note, but there is an inherent improbability in plaintiffs' contention that a note made to plaintiffs by Mrs. Driggs was to be accepted as cash, in the light of the circumstances of the transaction.

Two days before the note, which was at all times in the possession of plaintiffs until after this action was commenced, fell due, to wit, October 20, 1923, Mrs. Driggs withdrew from the transaction and denied any and all obligations arising from the execution and delivery of said note to plaintiffs. As a matter of fact, plaintiffs considered bringing an action upon it against Mrs. Driggs. Said note was not out of plaintiffs' possession until after it was long past due and had been repudiated by Mrs. Driggs. Some two weeks before this action was commenced, plaintiffs indorsed it to Mrs. Huene and sent it to her through the mail after said action had been commenced. It was promptly returned by her to plaintiffs.

[4] Conceding that the written contract between Mrs. Driggs and the appellant did not correctly embody the agreement between them, nor properly state the oral commission contract between plaintiffs and appellant, and that the parol evidence rule was not violated in the admission of evidence as to the note referred to in the receipt, the judgment of the court below cannot be upheld. The course of dealings between the parties shows that, if the note was accepted by Mrs. Huene "in lieu of the cash payment," it would merely provide a different fund from which the commission was to be paid. Said note was due October 22, about two weeks after it was executed, and plaintiffs now assert that it was taken pending the arrival of Mrs. Driggs' securities from the east. If the note was accepted by Mrs. Huene in lieu of the cash payment, the commission to be retained from the cash payment was thereafter to be retained from the payment made on the note. Payment of the commission was dependent upon payment of the note, which was never paid.

Giving full force and effect to the receipt signed by plaintiff Lind, which reads, "We hereby acknowledge the receipt of $6,000.00 (note) dollars," does not, as a matter of law, weaken in any degree the terms of the offer to lease. The "Acceptance," which follows said receipt, reads:

"I accept the above offer to lease, and agree to the terms and conditions as set forth therein. I further agree to pay the Lind-DeHaven Co. $3500.00 for services rendered, said amount to be retained out of the moneys received, as designated in this offer to lease."

It will be noticed that the commission is "to be retained out of the moneys received as designated in this offer to lease." The agreements of the parties are thereby reaffirmed.

[5] After the transaction failed by reason of Mrs. Driggs' refusal to consummate it, a formal lease was drawn up by plaintiffs and executed by Mrs. Huene, but Mrs. Driggs declined to consider the proposition further. Plaintiffs suggest that this willingness on the part of Mrs. Huene to carry out the original plan was a ratification of the first proposition. We think there is no merit in this point. The judgment is reversed.

N. C. ALBRIGHT, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. NORTH FORK DITCH COMPANY (a Corporation), Defendant and Appellant. (Sac. 4150).

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1928.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. B. Landis, Judge.

Lowell, Lowell & Lowell, of Auburn, and C. F. Metteer and H. J. March, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

W. H. Slade and C. H. Stilson, both of Auburn, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action for damages against the defendant for alleged negligence in the maintenance and operation of a certain ditch across the lands of the plaintiff, causing a seepage of water from said ditch, resulting in the killing of certain cherry trees growing upon the plaintiff's land in the vicinity of the ditch. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury. Upon the submission thereof findings of fact and conclusions of law were filed, wherein it was found by the trial court that the seepage of water from the ditch had occurred, as alleged in plaintiff's complaint, through the defendant's negligence, and had resulted in the injuries complained of. From such judgment the defendant has prosecuted this appeal.

The sole question presented thereon is as to whether the evidence is sufficient to justify the findings and judgment of the trial court. We have examined the record herein, and without attempting to review in detail the history of the construction and operation of the defendant's ditch across the lands of plaintiff, or to state at length the causes from which the seepage of water from said ditch into and upon the lands of plaintiff occurred, with the resulting damage complained of, we are satisfied that there was sufficient evidence to sustain the findings and conclusions of the trial court upon both counts of the plaintiff's complaint.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: LANGDON, J.; SHENK, J.

SMITH v. CARLSTON. (S. F. 11737.) *

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1928.

1. Damages ⇨78(1)—Contract held not to require defendant to purchase stock pledged as security, but to provide for liquidated damages.

Contract in connection with giving of notes and pledging of stock as security, providing for return of "additional shares" before due date of original notes, held not to constitute agreement by defendant to purchase those shares which were not returned at time and in manner provided, and to pay stipulated sum per share as purchase price, but such clause was provision for liquidated damages.

2. Damages ⇨82—Provision in contract in connection with giving notes and pledging stock as security, providing for liquidated damages for failure to return stock as stipulated, held void (Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671).

Clause in contract in connection with giving of notes and pledging of stock as security, which provided for liquidated damages of $3 per share, in event defendant failed to return certain stock at certain time, held void, as in violation of Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671.

3. Contracts ⇨143—Entire agreement is considered in construing doubtful clauses of written contract.

When clauses of written agreement, doubtful in meaning, are construed, entire agreement must be looked to for light in determining meaning to be given particular clause under scrutiny.

4. Contracts ⇨169—Circumstances and relation of parties at time of execution of agreement are considered in construing doubtful clauses (Civ. Code, § 1647).

Circumstances and relations of parties at time of execution of agreement and insertion of particular clauses therein are carefully considered in construing doubtful clauses, under Civ. Code, § 1647.

5. Appeal and error ⇨882(5)—Where plaintiff did not amend complaint to avoid uncertainty pointed out by special demurrer, general order sustaining demurrer and judgment based on declination to amend will be upheld.

Where plaintiff's attention was directed to uncertainty in complaint by defendant's special demurrer, and plaintiff did not see fit to amend complaint to avoid uncertainty, general order of trial court sustaining demurrer and judgment, based on declination to amend complaint, will be upheld.

Action by Evelyn Ellis Smith against J. F. Carlston. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Superseding opinion in 263 P. 378. See, also, 271 P. 1096.

James F. Peck and George M. Naus, both of San Francisco (John H. McDaniels, of San Francisco, W. B. Bunker, of Oakland, and C. M. Peck, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This action was commenced by the plaintiff for the recovery from the defendant of the sum of $300,000, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 12th day of January, 1923, and for her costs of suit. The plaintiff's cause of action is based upon certain written agreements made and entered into between herself and the defendant, and which are attached as exhibits to her complaint and are by reference made a part thereof. The first three of these agreements, in the order of their creation, are Exhibit A, Exhibit D and Exhibit C, the first two of which bear the date of January 12, 1922, and the third of which bears the date of January 17, 1922, but which, according to the averments of the plaintiff's complaint, were all entered into on the latter date. These three exhibits read as follows:

Exhibit A.

"$88,487.00

"Oakland, Calif., January 12, 1922.

"On or before one year from date, without grace, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of J. F. Carlston, at my office in the city, the sum of eighty-eight thousand four hundred and eighty-seven and no/100 dollars, payable in United States gold coin, with interest in like gold coin, from date until paid at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, payable June 30th and December 31st; and if not so paid to compound and become a part of the principal, and bear interest thereafter at the same rate. Evelyn Ellis Smith."

Exhibit D.

"$75,000.00

"Oakland, Calif., January 12, 1922.

"On or before one year after date, without grace, for value received, I promise to pay to the order of J. F. Carlston, at my office in this city, the sum of seventy-five thousand and no/100 dollars, payable in United States gold coin, with interest thereon in like gold coin, from date until paid, at the rate of six (6) per cent. per annum, payable June 30 and December 31; and if not so paid to compound and become a part of the principal, and bear interest thereafter at the same rate. Evelyn Ellis Smith."

Exhibit C.

"This agreement, made and entered into by and between J. F. Carlston of the City of Oakland, County of Alameda, State of California, party of the first part, and Evelyn Ellis Smith, of the same city, county and state, party of the second part, Witnesseth:

"That the said Evelyn Ellis Smith has been requested by the said J. F. Carlston to execute two promissory notes; one in the amount of seventy-five thousand dollars ($75,000), payable on or before one year after date, dated January 12, 1922; one for eighty-eight thousand four hundred eighty-seven dollars ($88,487), payable on or before one year after date, dated January 12, 1922, as a renewal of three notes heretofore given by Evelyn Ellis Smith to the said J. F. Carlston, as follows:

"One for fifty-five thousand eight hundred and 84/100ths dollars ($55,800.84), payable on demand, dated February 25, 1921; two for fifty thousand dollars ($50,000) each, payable on demand, dated February 25, 1921. Said last three notes are secured, first by a promissory note of the F. M. Smith Securities Company, dated February 28, 1918, for the amount of one hundred thirty-four thousand, five hundred eighty-six and 62/100ths dollars ($134,586.62), which said Securities Company note is itself secured by 1980 shares of stock of the Realty

Syndicate; 100 shares preferred stock of Oakland Traction Company; second by 100,000 shares stock of West End Consolidated Mining Company; and

"Whereas, the said J. F. Carlston has requested that the two above notes to be given as a renewal of the said three notes now outstanding, be secured by additional shares of stock, to be divided as follows: Fifty thousand (50,000) shares West End Consolidated Mining Company and fifty thousand (50,000) shares West End Chemical Company stock, which last named one hundred thousand shares of stock are hereinafter referred to as '100,000 additional shares':

"Now, therefore, it is hereby agreed by and between the parties hereto, that in consideration of said Evelyn Ellis Smith granting the request of J. F. Carlston, the said J. F. Carlston will, on or before the due date of the said two renewal notes to be executed as above, accomplish a renewal of the said two notes for a further similar period of one year, making the last named expiration date two years from the date hereof; and it is further agreed by the said J. F. Carlston, that in addition to extending the time as hereinbefore stated, he will and hereby does guarantee and agree to release from the pledge so securing said notes and return to said Evelyn Ellis Smith the 100,000 additional shares of stock at such time as the said notes shall be paid by said Evelyn Ellis Smith, or at such time as said notes shall be returned to said J. F. Carlston, and under any circumstances said 100,000 additional shares shall be released and returned to Evelyn Ellis Smith not later than the due date of the said notes executed herewith.

"That said J. F. Carlston further, in consideration of the premises, agrees and guarantees that should the said 100,000 additional shares, or any thereof, be sold under the said pledge thereof by any person whomsoever, that the said J. F. Carlston will account to and pay to the said Evelyn Ellis Smith for such of the said 100,000 additional shares as are so sold or as are not returned to her as herein agreed, at the rate of three dollars ($3.00) per share for each share of said 100,000 additional shares of stock which may be so sold or which may not be returned to her, as aforesaid.

"The said J. F. Carlston further agrees to immediately deliver to said Evelyn Ellis Smith upon the execution of said two notes herewith the above mentioned note of the F. M. Smith Securities Company and the collateral securing it.

"Executed in duplicate.

"In witness whereof, the said parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals this 17th day of January, 1922.

"[Signed] J. F. Carlston. [Seal.]

"[Signed] Evelyn Ellis Smith. [Seal.]"

In addition to the foregoing exhibits, the complaint embodies by reference two other exhibits, namely, Exhibit B and Exhibit E, which have reference to transactions between the plaintiff and defendant occurring on or about December 31, 1922, and which are apparently renewals of the promissory notes, and in part also of the pledges of stock to which Exhibits A and D relate. In Exhibit C, attached to the complaint, there is a recital to the effect that the promissory notes embodied in Exhibits A and D thereof constituted renewals of three previous promissory notes which had been executed by plaintiff to the defendant, one for $55,800.84, dated February 25, 1921, and two for $50,000 each, dated February 25, 1921, each of which prior promissory notes had been secured by pledges of certain securities, specifically referred to in Exhibit C. It thus appears that for the period of at least one year prior to the particular agreement embodied in Exhibit C, and which forms the basis of the plaintiff's alleged right of recovery in the instant case, the relation between the parties hereto had been that of a borrower of certain large sums of money, evidenced by the several promissory notes above set forth or referred to, and the loaner of said several sums of money upon the giving of said notes secured by definite pledges of the stock of certain corporations as defined in the respective pledges thereof, and in which the respective rights and duties of the pledgor and pledgee thereof are specifically set forth.

It may also be stated that as to Exhibits B and E, attached to said complaint, it would appear that the foregoing relations between plaintiff and defendant continued to be the relation of each to the other for the period of about one year after the making and entering into of the agreement set forth in Exhibit C. Upon certain portions of said last-named agreement the plaintiff relies for her recovery in this action. It thus appears that upon January 17, 1922, the plaintiff had executed, or was about to execute and deliver to the defendant, those two certain promissory notes embodied in Exhibits A and D as renewals of or rather substitutes for three demand notes bearing date February 25, 1921, the principal of which, aggregating $155,800.84, and the overdue interest thereof, amounted to a sufficient sum to equal the aggregate of the two renewal notes, to wit, the sum of $163,487, which the plaintiff was on that date to execute and deliver. The two renewal notes thus presently to be delivered had each attached to it a pledge agreement, setting forth the securities deposited in pledge. The promissory note set forth in Exhibit A was thus to be secured by a pledge of certificate 79 for 50,000 shares of West End Consolidated Mining Company stock, certificate 225 for 25,000 shares of West End Consolidated Mining Company stock, and certificate 8366 for 25,000 shares of West End Chemical Company stock. The promissory note set forth in Exhibit D was to be secured by a pledge of certificate 78 for 50,000 shares of West End Consolidated Mining Company stock, certificate 224 for 25,000 shares of West End Consolidated Mining Company stock, and certificate 8365 for 25,000 shares of West End Chemical Company stock.

The foregoing promissory notes, each with its respective securities, had, according to the date borne by each, been executed by the plaintiff on January 12, 1922, but had not been delivered by plaintiff to the defendant until the agreement embodied in Exhibit C, bearing date of January 17, 1922, had been made between the parties thereto. By the terms of the last-named exhibit, wherein the foregoing facts are quite specifically set forth, it appears that said J. F. Carlston, in requesting the execution of the two renewal notes above referred to and secured as stated in the pledge agreement attached to each, further requested that said renewal notes should be secured by certain "additional shares of stock to be divided as follows: 50,000 shares West End Consolidated Mining Company and 50,000 shares West End Chemical Company stock, which last-named 100,000 shares of stock are hereinafter referred to as '100,000 additional shares.'" The agreement embodied in Exhibit C proceeds to state:

"That in consideration of said Evelyn Ellis Smith granting the request of J. F. Carlston, the said J. F. Carlston will, on or before the due date of the said two renewal notes to be executed as above, accomplish a renewal of the said two notes for a similar period of one year, making the last named expiration date two years from the date hereof."

It would seem quite clear that the two promissory notes embodied in Exhibits B and E, attached to said complaint, were, upon the date named therein, executed and delivered in performance of that portion of said agreement, and that the corporate stock designated in the pledge agreement accompanying each of said notes is specifically the identical shares of stock pledged as security for the promissory notes embodied in Exhibits A and D, respectively, and of which the promissory notes embodied in Exhibits B and E were to be a renewal. It would thus seem to be fairly inferable that the 50,000 shares of West End Consolidated Mining Company and the 50,000 shares of West End Chemical Company stock, which are referred to in Exhibit C as "100,000 additional shares," were not, nor either of them, any portion of the stock which had been already designated as securing the two renewal notes referred to in Exhibits A and D, but were, as properly stated therein, "additional shares," and which as such were to be the special subject of the particular agreement embraced in Exhibit C, which the plaintiff asserts to have been violated.

It may be here suggested, however, that the plaintiff's complaint, including the exhibits appended thereto, creates a degree of uncertainty in the foregoing regard which has rendered said complaint subject to the special demurrer which the defendant aimed at it, and which uncertainty has been accentuated by the briefs and arguments of respective counsel. The importance of this suggestion will be adverted to at a later point in this opinion.

The particular portion of said Exhibit C which the plaintiff alleges to have been violated reads as follows:

"It is further agreed by the said J. F. Carlston that in addition to extending the time as hereinbefore stated, he will and does hereby guarantee and agree to release from the pledge so securing said notes and return to said Evelyn Ellis Smith the 100,000 additional shares of stock at such time as the said notes shall be paid by said Evelyn Ellis Smith, or at such time as said notes shall be returned to said J. F. Carlston, and under any circumstances said 100,000 additional shares shall be released and returned to Evelyn Ellis Smith not later than the due date of the said notes executed herewith."

Thus far the agreement in Exhibit C seems to be fairly reasonable and intelligible, since the defendant thereby seems to agree that because of the granting by Evelyn Ellis Smith of his request for the pledge of the additional 100,000 shares of stock he will, at a date not later than the due date of the two notes which are to be further secured by the additional pledge of these two blocks of stock, release the pledge thereof and will return said additional shares of stock so pledged to Evelyn Ellis Smith, and will not include the same in the renewal of said two notes, which he has already agreed to accomplish for an additional period of one year upon the expiration date thereof. Thus far in said agreement, as well as in the other transactions between the parties which preceded the making thereof, these two parties have consistently occupied the relation, respectively, of borrower and loaner of money and pledgor and pledgee of stock; the pledgee agreeing to release the pledgor, within the year fixed by the due date of her two notes, the portion of the stock pledged to secure the payment thereof and designated as the "100,000 additional shares of stock."

It is at this point to be noted that the said J. F. Carlston, in his capacity of loaner of the sums of money evidenced by the plaintiff's two promissory notes, and as the holder in the capacity of pledgee of the several blocks of stock, including the "100,000 additional shares" pledged for the payment of said indebtedness, was entitled to the rights accorded by law to the owner and holder of such obligations and securities, and hence, and in the exercise of such rights, would be entitled to transfer or hypothecate to others said promissory notes, or either of them, together with the stock pledged to secure the payment thereof, and that he or his transferee thereof would also be entitled to exercise the pledgee's right to sell all or any portion of said pledged stock at the pledgee's sale upon the occurrence of any default on the part of the maker of said notes and of such respective pledges to pay the said notes or any installment of interest which might grow due thereon.

[1-4] It was doubtless in the exercise of the defendant's rights as the pledgee of the "100,000 additional shares" referred to in said agreement that, according to the averment in the plaintiff's complaint, 50,000 shares thereof were sold under said pledge by persons to whom the defendant had transferred one of the notes for the payment of which said shares of stock had been pledged as security; and it was also doubtless due to the possibility of such transfer of said obligations and sale of all or a portion of said "100,000 additional shares" of stock so held in pledge that the succeeding clause in said agreement and the one upon which the plaintiff counts for the specific nature of her right of recovery in this action was inserted in said agreement, and which clause reads as follows:

"That said J. F. Carlston further, in consideration of the premises, agrees and guarantees that should the said 100,000 additional shares, or any thereof, be sold under the said pledge thereof by any person whomsoever, that the said J. F. Carlston will account to and pay to the said Evelyn Ellis Smith for such of the said 100,000 additional shares as are so sold or as are not returned to her as herein agreed, at the rate of three dollars per share for each share of said 100,000 additional shares of stock which may be so sold or which may not be returned to her, as aforesaid."

It is the contention of the appellant that the foregoing clause in said agreement is to be interpreted as constituting an agreement on the part of the defendant to purchase so much of such "100,000 additional shares" of said stock as are not returned to her at the time and in the manner provided in the preceding clause in the agreement, and to pay to the plaintiff as the purchase price thereof at the rate of $3 per share for such stock as shall not, pursuant thereto, be so returned to her. We are unable to give our concurrence to such a construction of the aforesaid clause in said agreement. When clauses in a written agreement between parties, doubtful in meaning, are to be construed, it is a cardinal rule of interpretation that the entire agreement must be looked to for light in determining the meaning to be given to the particular clause thereof under scrutiny (6 Cal. Juris. 258, § 16, and cases cited), and a not less important rule for the guidance of courts in determining the intent of parties in the insertion of particular clauses in their written agreements is that the circumstances and relations of the parties at the time of the execution of their agreements and of the insertion of particular clauses therein shall be carefully considered in aid of such interpretation (Civ. Code, § 1647).

When these two cardinal principles of construction are applied to the instant agreement they would seem to leave little doubt as to how it should be construed. The relation between these two parties throughout the entire course of their dealings, so far as the plaintiff's complaint discloses, was that of a borrower and lender of considerable sums of money, evidenced by several obligations in the form of promissory notes, and of pledgor and pledgee of specific shares of the capital stock of several corporations given in pledge to secure the payment of said several obligations. There is not a word or line in the plaintiff's complaint, other than that stated in her interpretation of the terms of said agreement, to indicate that the defendant ever was or ever intended to become a purchaser or owner of any portion of the several blocks of corporate stock which the plaintiff had pledged to him solely as security for the repayment of the money which he had loaned to her. Nor is there a word or line in said complaint, other than as above stated, that the plaintiff, in entering into the relation between herself and the defendant, as evinced by the several written agreements which are attached as exhibits to her complaint, desired or intended to sell or transfer in ownership to the defendant any part or portion of the corporate stock which she had thus pledged to him.

The words "purchase" and "sale" are significantly absent from that portion of Exhibit C upon which the plaintiff relies as the sole basis for the recovery sought herein; and even if it should result that the defendant should be compelled to pay to the plaintiff the sum of $300,000 for which she sues, it is plain that the defendant upon making such compelled payment could not become the purchaser or owner of at least one-half of the "100,000 additional shares" for which he had thus paid, since it affirmatively appears upon the face of the complaint that 50,000 shares thereof have already been sold and transferred by other persons to whom the defendant had assigned one of the notes for the payment of which said stock was pledged. Taking thus into consideration the situation and relation of the parties throughout, we can arrive at but one interpretation of the particular clause in said agreement upon which the plaintiff predicates her cause of action, and that interpretation is that it was the intent of the parties thereby to provide for the payment of liquidated damages in the event that the defendant should for any reason fail or be unable to keep his agreement to release and return to the plaintiff said "100,000 additional shares of stock" at a time not later than the due date of the two promissory notes for the payment of which said specific shares of stock were pledged as additional security.

This being our conclusion as to the only meaning which can reasonably be assigned to the aforesaid terms of said agreement, it follows irresistibly that the provisions therein providing for such liquidated damages are void as in violation of sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code. It is not necessary to cite authorities in support of the position that if the particular clause in Exhibit C is to be interpreted as providing for the payment of liquidated damages it falls within the inhibition of section 1670 of the Civil Code, since the plaintiff has neither sought to plead a cause of action for unliquidated damages for the breach of said agreement, nor to set forth any facts or circumstances which would bring her cause of action within the exception to the foregoing section embodied in section 1671 of said Code. The appellant is resting her asserted right of recovery of the sum of $300,000 from the defendant solely upon her contention that the foregoing agreement is to be interpreted as having created an alternative contract which must necessarily have amounted to a contract of purchase and sale of so much of said stock as the defendant failed to return to the plaintiff within the allotted time. The authorities which the appellant cites in support of this contention are, in our opinion, inconclusive, since in none of the cases so cited does the pre-existing relation of pledgor and pledgee exist, while in each of the said cases the relation of purchaser and seller of the property in controversy is inferable from the relation of the parties and the language of the agreement in each particular case. The cases of Haskins v. Dern, 19 Utah, 89, 56 P. 953; Guss v. Nelson, 200 U. S. 298, 26 S. Ct. 260, 50 L. Ed. 489, and Stevens v. Hertzler, 109 Ala. 423, 19 So. 839, are illustrative of the difference between the causes and decisions upon which the plaintiff chiefly relies and the facts of the case at bar. The case of Wilmington Trans. Co. v. O'Neil, 98 Cal. 1, 32 P. 705, and the case of Westcott v. Thompson, 18 N. Y. 363, which in the former case is cited with approval, more nearly fits the instant situation, and are cited in support of our foregoing conclusion.

[5] We have thus far been considering the deficiencies in the plaintiff's complaint from the viewpoint of the general demurrer thereto. We do not deem it necessary to refer in detail to the numerous grounds of special demurrer which the defendant urged against the uncertainties in said complaint. We may, however, in furtherance of the suggestion put forth in an earlier portion of this opinion, advert to the uncertainty existing therein as to whether the additional 100,000 shares of stock, for the nonreturn of which the plaintiff seeks the recovery of the specific sum of $300,000, were or were not included within the designated shares of stock which are embraced in the pledge agreements which accompany the promissory notes set forth in Exhibits A and D in said complaint. If said "additional 100,000 shares of stock" have reference to blocks of stock other than those specifically referred to by number and amount in said appended pledges, there might possibly be some basis for the appellant's argument that said additional stock was never intended by the parties to be pledged to the defendant at all, but was merely to be delivered to him for some undisclosed purpose and was to be returned or paid for at the rate per share stated in said agreement. If, on the other hand, said additional shares of stock were to be held identical with the designated shares to the same amount specified in said pledge agreements, there would thus exist a very plausible basis for the defendant's argument that by the renewal of the two notes, accomplished on December 31, 1923, accompanied by a repledge of the same identical stock which formed the security of the two obligations which these promissory notes replaced, the parties thereto had abrogated and rendered ineffectual that portion of the agreement embodied in Exhibit C upon which the plaintiff relies for a recovery.

The attention of the plaintiff was directed to the foregoing uncertainty in her complaint by subdivision (d) of the defendant's special demurrer, and, not having seen fit to so amend her complaint as to avoid this ground of special demurrer, it follows that the general order of the trial court sustaining said demurrer and the judgment based upon the declination to further amend her complaint should for that reason also be upheld.

The judgment is affirmed.

Frank A. RETHERS, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. Evelyn Ellis SMITH, Defendant and Appellant. (S. F. 12057.)*

Supreme Court of California. Nov. 21, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 20, 1928.

In Bank.

Appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court of Alameda County, W. V. Tryon, Judge, in an action upon a promissory note. Affirmed.

James F. Peck, of San Francisco, and Crosby, Naus & Crosby and Louis W. Bennett, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Young & Hudson, of San Francisco, and Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant to recover judgment upon a promissory note for the sum of $75,000, executed by the defendant to one J. F. Carlston, and by the latter assigned and transferred to the Anglo & London Paris National Bank, and by said corporation transferred to the plaintiff herein for collection, and upon which it is alleged that the sum of $66,754.17 remains and is due, payable, and unpaid. This promissory note was one of the two promissory notes involved in that certain series of transactions between said J. F. Carlston and the defendant and appellant herein, and which form the subject of the decision of this court in the case of Smith v. Carlston (S. F. No. 11737) 271 P. 1091, this day handed down. The answer and counterclaim which the defendant herein presented embraced the same matters of both law and fact which were presented by the plaintiff in that action to the trial court, and by the appellant therein to this court upon appeal.

Upon the trial of this action the trial court ordered a directed verdict to be returned by the jury in favor of the plaintiff herein, based upon its conclusion that the matters set forth in the defendant's said answer and counterclaim did not constitute a defense to this action. Upon the return of such verdict, and upon the entry of a judgment in the plaintiff's favor, the defendant has prosecuted this appeal. The decision by this court in the case of Smith v. Carlston, supra, is decisive of the controlling question presented upon this appeal, and renders unnecessary a discussion of the incidental questions which have been presented and elaborately argued by respective counsel therein.

It follows that upon the authority of Smith v. Carlston, supra, the judgment herein appealed from must be and the same is hereby affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Browne, Judge.

Action by the Filice & Perrelli Canning Company, Incorporated, against F. B. Walton and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald & Johnson, of Gilroy, for appellants.

Crawford & O'Neill, of Gilroy, and Peter F. Morettini, of San José, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendants, the defendants appeared and answered, a trial was had before the court sitting without a jury, the trial court made findings in favor of the plaintiff, and from a judgment entered thereon the defendants have appealed.

[1] The plaintiff's complaint was framed in two counts. In the first count it pleaded a breach of contract, alleging that the defendants had failed to deliver personal property theretofore sold to the plaintiff. In the second count it alleged that the defendants had converted the property. The defendants filed a demurrer "to plaintiff's complaint. * * *" The demurrer was overruled. It is now claimed that the order overruling the demurrer was erroneous. In this behalf the defendants assert that the second cause of action did not set forth facts sufficient and that the demurrer should have been sustained. It is sufficient to call attention to the fact that the defendants did not demur to the second count, but they demurred to the whole complaint. However, if we examine the second count, it is clear that it did state facts sufficient and if a demurrer had been directed against it that the demurrer should have been overruled.

The defendants complain because the trial court sustained plaintiff's objections to evidence offered by defendants at the trial. An examination of the record discloses that the point covers two rulings on the rejection of evidence and that the evidence offered was outside of the issues.

[2] The defendants specify certain findings and assert that they are not supported by the evidence. In so specifying the findings we understand the defendants to be acting through an abundance of precaution and that their real objection is that they desire to clearly make the point that the title did not pass and that there was no sale, but that there was an executory agreement to sell. This point has been very fully briefed by the defendants and by the plaintiff. The evidence, both documentary and oral, is before us. A most cursory examination discloses that on the 8th day of January, 1924, by an instrument in writing, Walton & Berry, as lessees, sold to the plaintiff the crop of tomatoes to be grown on 45 to 50 acres of land which was under lease to them and which is located about two miles east of Gilroy on the Hot Springs road and runs north from that road to Sixth street. The contract was in writing, and, among other things, contained a passage as follows: "This contract is intended and understood by both parties to pass title to said crops and to constitute an absolute sale. * * *" The contract also recites that Walton & Berry "has sold" and that Filice & Perrelli "has bought." Other passages are consonant with the contention that there was a sale as distinguished from an agreement to sell. No evidence, oral or documentary, was introduced at the trial tending to weaken this theory. There was evidence introduced that the defendants were lessees of the land described in the contract; that said land is also known as the Elizabeth Martin tract; that said tract contains 463 acres and that of that acreage 38 acres were planted to tomatoes in the season of 1924. These facts warranted the trial court in holding that the contract constituted a sale. Turner, Kuhn & Fraser, Inc., v. Jones, 61 Cal. App. 732, 734, 215 P. 1033; Jones v. California Growers & Shippers, 182 Cal. 777, 190 P. 172.

[3] In their answer the defendants pleaded that they had rescinded their purported contract with the plaintiff and that such rescission was based on misrepresentations made by the plaintiff as to its financial ability. If, as claimed by the defendants, fraud was imposed on them by the plaintiff, they were not bound to rescind, but they were entitled to plead the fraud in defense of plaintiff's action on the purported contract. Field v. Austin, 131 Cal. 379, 382, 63 P. 692. On the trial the defendants offered in evidence a written notice of rescission. It was objected to by the plaintiff and the objection was sustained. Conceding, solely for the purposes of this case that the ruling was erroneous, it was immaterial. The defendants did not introduce any evidence nor attempt to introduce any evidence, nor offer any evidence, showing that any representation was made nor that the representation was false. The representations alleged to have been made and which are pleaded by the defendants included two separate statements. The defendants assert that plaintiff represented that its "financial condition was better than it had been at any time during the previous three years, whereas, in fact and in truth," it was not. The other representation was that the plaintiff had made arrangements with those to whom it was indebted for crops purchased during 1923 by which it had paid the sellers a sum of money equal to one-half the indebtedness and the balance by the issuance of stock and notes of the plaintiff, whereas, in fact and in truth, a very small percentage of the indebtedness was paid in cash. The first representation was the expression of an opinion and not actionable. Both representations, whether true or false, were of such a nature as to place any ordinary man on inquiry as to the solvency or insolvency of the purchaser. The defendants took a chance and may not now complain.

[4] The defendants assert that the trial court awarded damages at $4 per ton and that the damages so awarded rested on the testimony of Mr. Filice, who gave evidence as to values in September, 1924, and of a different variety of tomatoes. There was testimony that in the neighborhood of Gilroy tomatoes are delivered in the month of September. The contract was executed January 8, 1924. The action was commenced September 16, 1924. The date on which the value was ascertained was not improper. Civ. Code, § 3336. The contract specifies "tomatoes," and does not mention any particular variety. Mr. Filice was examined and without objection was allowed to testify that the market value per ton in the locality of Gilroy for tomatoes of the kind grown by defendants was $19 to $19.50. He was not cross-examined on that subject. The trial court made no ruling on the kind of tomatoes to which the evidence was addressed, and there is nothing to review.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROSS v. GENTRY. (Civ. 6320.)★

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 14, 1928.

Rehearing Denied Dec. 14, 1928. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Jan. 10, 1929.

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨187—Delay in declaring forfeiture held not waiver of provision making time of essence, though vendor made demands for payment after due date.

Vendor's delay in declaring forfeiture for nonpayment of installment held not waiver of provision in contract for sale of real estate making time of essence, though vendor made repeated demands for payment, where it was not shown that overdue payments were accepted or that purchaser was prejudiced by delay.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⇨187—Vendor's lapse of time and delay do not of themselves constitute waiver of provision making time of essence.

Lapse of time and delay do not of themselves amount to waiver by vendor of provision in contract for sale of land making time of essence, and this is especially true where delay is accompanied by demands for payments.

3. Appeal and error ⇨1071(2)—Error in concluding that provision of contract had been waived and reinstated did not invalidate judgment, where decree was supported by findings.

Error of trial court in determining that provisions of contract for sale of land had been waived and reinstated, instead of concluding that they had never been waived, did not render judgment invalid, where court's general conclusion of law and decree were supported by findings.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⇨101—Provision making time of essence was restored by notice, where plaintiff's testimony that bill was mailed to defendant, properly stamped and addressed, was uncontroverted (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1961, 1963, subd. 24).

Vendor's bill to purchaser, headed "Final Three-Day Notice," held effective to restore provision of contract making time of essence, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1961, 1963, subd. 24, where it was established that bill had been mailed to purchaser, properly stamped and addressed, and such testimony was not controverted, and receipt thereof was not denied.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⇨185—Rights of vendor and purchaser depend on contract, irrespective of delayed tender of price, especially where time is made of essence.

Reciprocal rights of vendor and purchaser depend on contract and its performance, irrespective of delayed tender of purchase price, especially where time is made of essence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Harold Louderback, Judge.

Action by A. W. Ross against P. B. Gentry. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frazier McIntosh, of Los Angeles (Earle K. Backus, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Thos. C. Ridgway and Richard F. Bailey, both of Los Angeles (Ralph D. Brown, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

KOFORD, P. J. Defendant appeals from a decree quieting plaintiff's title and foreclosing defendant's interest as vendee in three pieces of real estate. It is appellant's claim on this appeal that the provision in his contracts of purchase making time of the essence was waived by the conduct of plaintiff, and that the said provision was not thereafter reinstated by a proper notice.

One contract covered a parcel known as lot No. 9 and the other contract covered lots Nos. 21 and 22. Adding together the provisions of the two contracts, the agreements, treated as one, provide as follows: Purchase price, $17,500; initial payment on date of contract, $7,150; second payment, on or before June 23, 1923, $2,350; final payment, January 15, 1924, $7,000, together with 7 per cent. interest on deferred payments, payable quarterly; vendee agreed to pay taxes and assessments; time was made of the essence of the contract; and for failure to comply with the terms of the contract vendee should forfeit all rights and vendor be released from all obligations. Appellant, the vendee in said contracts, made the initial payment of $7,150 by receipting for that amount due him from respondent as the final payment under a grading contract performed by appellant. Appellant made no other payments on the contract, whether principal, interest, or taxes.

On July 21, 1923, respondent mailed to appellant a bill for the amount of principal and interest due and unpaid on the contracts amounting at that time to $3,712.25. On August 1, 1923, respondent wrote appellant a letter in which he stated that he called attention to the fact that payments of the principal and interest were long past due, and unless the same were taken care of immediately action would be taken to cancel the contract. On October 1, 1923, another bill for principal and interest was sent by respondent to appellant, amounting at that time to $3,893.38. Later in the month of October respondent met appellant's son, who was conceded to be the agent of his father, and again informed him that payments were long past due, and if he wanted to protect his interests he ought "to get busy and pay them," and that he ought not to expect any one to carry them forever. Gentry replied by exhibiting a large amount of due bills, saying that, if he could get some of them paid, he would pay up on the contract. Respondent replied that "he had better get busy and do it." On November 6, 1923, respondent again sent a bill for the amount of principal and interest then due, which was in the same form as previous bills except that it was headed "Final Three-Day Notice." These bills were supplemented with telephone calls requesting payments.

The court found these facts, and found that respondent at all times up to November 6 was willing to accept payment in despite of the delay. This action was filed on November 23. In December, 1923, appellant tendered respondent $12,000 in full payment of the contracts, which tender was refused by respondent and the action carried forward.

[1, 2] It seems to be the contention of appellant that a forfeiture must be declared immediately upon default, and that if this is not done the provision making time of the essence of the contract is waived. The evidence does not show that any overdue payments were accepted by respondent, nor that appellant was in any manner prejudiced by the failure of respondent to declare a forfeiture or commence an action immediately upon the first breach. The most that can be said of respondent's conduct as outlined above is that he forebore and delayed in declaring a forfeiture and instituting an action. His willingness to accept overdue payments does not add anything to his frequent demands, since, without such willingness, the demands would be sham. It cannot be denied that he consistently demanded and required payment. Lapse of time and delay do not of themselves amount to a waiver of the provision making time of the essence of the contract, and they should amount to less, if accompanied with demands for payments. Kerns v. McKean, 65 Cal. 411, 4 P. 404; Newhall Land & Farming Co. v. Burns, 31 Cal. App. 549, 161 P. 14; Drips v. Moore, 179 Cal. 249, 176 P. 159. Cases in which such a provision of a contract has been held waived by accepting overdue payments or other benefits from the vendee are not in point with the instant case.

[3] In the conclusions of law signed by the court it is stated that the conduct of plaintiff waived the provision of the contract making time of the essence, but that the provision had been reinstated by the notice of November 6, and that a reasonable time had thereafter elapsed to allow appellant to make overdue payment before the action was commenced. A further conclusion of law was made that the failure of appellant to make payments after November 6, and before commencement of the action, was a breach of the contract, and that at the time the action was commenced the appellant was in default and his rights under the contract were at an end and respondent was entitled to the decree. If it was error for the court to conclude from the findings that said provisions of the contract had been waived and reinstated instead of concluding that it had never been waived, the judgment nevertheless is valid, the general conclusion of law and the decree being supported by the findings. McNutt v. City of Los Angeles, 187 Cal. 245, 201 P. 592; Danziger v. Benson, 175 Cal. 565, 166 P. 313; Davis v. Baugh, 59 Cal. 576.

[4] Passing by the question of the sufficiency of the bill of November 6, headed "Final Three-Day Notice," we see no lack of sufficiency in the letter of August 1 to restore the provision making time the essence of the contract if it had been waived. Appellant's only criticism of this letter is that it was not proven to have been received. It appears that the appellant, who was a witness at the trial, neither admitted nor denied having received it. But the testimony of the plaintiff established that it had been mailed to appellant, properly stamped and addressed, in the same manner as the bills which had been mailed and received. This evidence not being controverted, it should be taken as established that the letter of August 1 was received by appellant. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1961 and 1963, subd. 24.

Appellant filed a cross-complaint and answer seeking to have the contract reformed in such a manner that no payment should be required of him until the expiration of two years. The findings of the court were contrary to all the allegations of fact upon which this relief was sought and we do not understand the appellant as contending for any action upon the part of this court upon this branch of the case.

[5] Appellant has made numerous references scattered through his briefs to the fact that he tendered the full amount due after suit was commenced and before trial. We do not understand him to contend that this entitled him to more favorable consideration in the decree if in fact the tender was too late and in law he was in default for failure to observe the terms of his contract. The action was one to quiet respondent's title and foreclose appellant's interest as vendee, and obviously the rights of the parties depend upon the contract and its observance by them especially where time is expressly made of the essence. Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 9, 55 P. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

SCOTT et al. v. DONAHUE et al. (Civ. 5690.)

District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Nov. 16, 1928.

1. Appeal and error — 1203(1)—Appellate court judgments, reversing judgments, with directions to deduct, from trust funds involved fees properly chargeable against funds, left duty with trial court to determine fees properly chargeable.

In actions involving trust funds belonging to former members of local chapter of Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, appellate court judgments, reversing judgments for defendants, with directions to distribute funds among former members of local chapter, after deducting costs of suit and other charges and fees chargeable against trust fund, left duty with trial court, as court of equity, to determine what charges and fees were properly chargeable against such funds.

2. Costs — 236—Appellate court, reversing judgment, cannot award costs on appeal to unsuccessful party from trust fund it tried to defeat (Code Civ. Proc. § 1027).

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, appellate court has no power to award costs on appeal to unsuccessful party, to be charged against trust fund which unsuccessful party tried to defeat.

3. Costs — 236—Appellate court clerk has no power to award costs on appeal in favor of losing party (Code Civ. Proc. § 1027; Supreme Court Rule 23).

Appellate court clerk has no power to award costs on appeal in favor of losing party, since under Code Civ. Proc. § 1027, and Supreme Court Rule 23, clerk must enter in his remittitur a judgment that appellant recover for costs on appeal from respondent in all cases where judgment is reversed.

Action by Robert C. Scott and others against J. J. Donahue and others. From the judgment, plaintiffs appealed. Judgments reversed, with directions. 269 P. 455, 458. On motions of defendants J. S. Wrinkle and the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen for the recall of the remittitur. Motions denied.

See, also, 269 P. 774.

George D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellants.

Gillogley, Crofton & Payne, of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. The respondents in these two consolidated cases have moved for the recall of the remittiturs upon the ground that they do not conform to the judgments in respect to the matter of costs on appeal. The remittiturs followed the usual course in awarding to appellants against the respondents their costs on appeal upon the reversal of the two judgments.

The actions involved two trust funds belonging to the former members of the local chapter of the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen. The litigation arose because of the claim of the parent order that it was entitled to all the funds of the local chapter upon dissolution of the latter. The two causes were commenced by the appellant on behalf of his associate members of the local chapter, the judgments went against him, and these were reversed, with directions to distribute the funds among all the former members of the local chapter who were in good standing at the time of its dissolution, "after deducting therefrom the costs of suit and other charges and fees properly chargeable against the trust fund."

[1] It is now claimed that, by reason of the language quoted, the respondents should not be charged with the costs on appeal. The remittiturs followed the express terms of the statute (section 1027, Code Civ. Proc.) in awarding costs to the appellant and against the respondent upon reversal of the judgment, and we find nothing in the language quoted from the main opinion which supports the claim that we intended to depart from this statutory rule. The language of this opinion had reference to that rule of equity, based upon the principle of agency, which permits one who has sued on behalf of his associates to discover or preserve a common trust fund to have a charge against the fund itself for his costs and expenses. See Fox v. Hale & Norcross S. M. Co., 108 Cal. 475, 41 P. 328; Los Angeles T. & S. Bank v. Ward, 197 Cal. 103, 239 P. 847, County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba (Cal. App.) 263 P. 252¹; County of Tulare v. City of Dinuba (Cal. Sup.) 270 P. 201. Therefore the direction in those judgments to the trial court to deduct from the trust funds the charges and fees "properly chargeable" against such funds left with the trial court the duty as a court of equity to determine what charges and fees were properly chargeable against these funds.

[2, 3] But we know of no rule that the unsuccessful party to such litigation may have his costs and expenditures charged against the trust fund which he has tried to defeat. But if the trial court, in the exercise of its equity jurisdiction, should have power to make such award in favor of the losing party, it is clear that the appellate court has no such power upon a reversal of the judgment, because section 1027, Code of Civil Procedure, expressly withholds such power. It is equally clear that, under the same statute, and under rule XXIII of the Supreme Court, the clerk does not have such power, but he must enter in his remittitur a judgment that the appellant recover his costs on appeal from the respondent in all cases where the judgment is reversed.

The motions are denied.

held not erroneous as requiring defendant to produce conviction on proposition that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

3. Appeal and error ⇨197(1), 215(3)—Claim that evidence or instructions covered subjects not within issue is too late on appeal.

Claim that evidence or instructions covered subjects not within issues is too late when made on appeal, particularly where evidence in such matters was introduced without objection.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Samuel Kletz against M. V. B. MacAdam. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley & Gallagher, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goldman, Nye & Spicer and George K. Ford, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. Plaintiff commenced an action to recover damages for injuries sustained from being hit by an automobile driven by the defendant. The defendant interposed an answer denying many allegations contained in the complaint and affirmatively pleaded the contributory negligence of the plaintiff. A trial was had before the court sitting with a jury. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and, from a judgment entered thereon, the defendant has appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The first point presented by the defendant is the contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. The accident occurred October 4, 1924, at about half past 4 p. m. in Hyde street, immediately north of the north line of Fulton street, in San Francisco. Hyde street is 46 feet wide and Fulton street is 100 feet wide from curb to curb. The plaintiff was in the act of crossing from the east side of Hyde street to the west side, traversing that portion of the street which pedestrians ordinarily traverse in going up the north side of Fulton street. Before entering the street and before he left the sidewalk the plaintiff testified that he looked to the north and to the south, but that he did not see the machine driven by the defendant; that immediately after looking to the south he stepped into the street; that, as he was in the act of stepping from the curb into the street, he looked to the south and into the area embraced by the four corners of the intersection, and that he did not see defendant's automobile; that he took but two or three steps from the curb when he was struck by the automobile approaching him on his left side. The defendant argues that, when to look is to see, then it is not sufficient that a party testifies that he did not see an automobile which was within the territory which the witness testifies he looked into. The vice in this argument is the assumption that the automobile was in the territory in question. That was a disputed fact in the case. If at the time he looked the defendant's car was on the driver's left-hand side of the median line of Fulton street and had not entered the intersection of Hyde and Fulton, and if the plaintiff had seen the car in that position, he was entitled to assume that the defendant would not unlawfully proceed down that side of Fulton street and unlawfully run into him, and he was not bound to make a mental note thereof and remain standing until he could ascertain what movements the defendant was about to execute. True it is that the defendant offered testimony to the effect that her car was within the intersection. However, the record before us does not disclose that the automobile necessarily was in the zone concerning which the plaintiff addressed his testimony. On the other hand, there is evidence in the record produced by the plaintiff to the effect that the automobile was on the driver's left-hand side of the median line of Fulton street where that line crosses the median line of Hyde street, that it was proceeding at a speed of 20 to 25 miles an hour until it turned north into Hyde street on the easterly side. Just how far the defendant's car was from the median line of Fulton street when it turned into Hyde street does not appear in the printed record. However, the record shows that the witnesses were examined and cross-examined thereon and illustrated their testimony by marking diagrams which are not before us. The plaintiff illustrated how he moved at the time immediately preceding the accident. Counsel held a timepiece. The illustration took four seconds. At 20 to 25 miles per hour the defendant's car would travel, in that period, approximately 140 feet. It is clear there was a wide field for the jury to exercise its discretion in determining where the car was when plaintiff looked before he left the curb. The testimony is without conflict that the defendant drove west on Fulton street and turned into Hyde street. When the plaintiff looked north and looked south on Hyde street, it is altogether possible that the defendant's car as yet had not entered Hyde street. The duty did not rest on the plaintiff to look up and down Fulton street and decide what the vehicles in that street were doing or about to do. Courviosier v. Burger, 61 Cal. App. 470, 476, 215 P. 93.

The defendant asserts that the plaintiff had not pleaded general negligence but had merely pleaded that the defendant "without the sounding of any warning by horn, bell, whistle or other means of the approach of said automobile, and that the said automobile, by reason of the said negligent and careless operation and propelling thereof in the manner described as aforesaid was caused to" collide with the plaintiff. This statement of the issue is hardly complete. There was an amendment and supplement to the complaint. That amendment pleaded general negligence. On the trial there was evidence introduced that the defendant entered the intersection of the two streets driving at 20 or 25 miles an hour; that, before turning into Hyde, she did not pass to the right of the center of the intersection, but passed several feet to the left of that center; that she proceeded north, traveling 15 to 20 miles an hour and without sounding her horn or giving any other signal of approach before striking the plaintiff. There was an abundance of evidence which, if the jury believed it, would justify the jury in finding that the defendant was negligent.

[2] Of its own motion the trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"You are the exclusive judges of the weight and sufficiency of the evidence. You are not bound to decide in accordance with the testimony of any number of witnesses which does not produce conviction in your minds, against a less number. The direct evidence of one witness, who is entitled to full credit, is sufficient for proof of any fact in a civil case."

The defendant argues that it was not required to produce conviction in the minds of the jurors upon the proposition that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. This argument is to borrow trouble. The instruction was not reasonably susceptible of the meaning placed on it by the defendant. All of the instructions were to be read together. The trial court correctly instructed upon the matters of burden of proof, preponderance of evidence, and on the subject of contributory negligence.

[3] Acting upon the request of the plaintiff, the trial court read to the jury passages from the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517, as amended). Still claiming that the plaintiff had pleaded special negligence and not general negligence, the defendant asserts that the giving of instructions regarding these passages in the Motor Vehicle Act was erroneous. We think the contention is without merit. The pleadings were broad enough to authorize the proof. Evidence on these matters was introduced without objection. It is too late at this time to claim that either the evidence or the instructions covered subjects not within the issue.

We find no error in the record. The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PARRA et al. (Cr. 1727.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Nov. 15, 1928.

Criminal law ⚡683(1)—Testimony as to things occurring after automobile was abandoned held properly admitted in rebuttal, in prosecution for violating Vehicle Act (Vehicle Act, § 146).

In prosecution for violating the Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) § 146, admission of testimony as to things occurring after car was abandoned by defendants held not error, where such evidence came out only by way of rebuttal to testimony of appealing defendants.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Elliot Craig, Judge.

Gilbert Parra and another were convicted of violating the California Vehicle Act, § 146, and they appeal. Affirmed.

H. M. Dalton, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John L. Flynn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Warner I. Praul, of Los Angeles, for the People.

YORK, J. The defendants appealing, Gilbert Parra and Frank Olazabel, were tried and found guilty of violation of section 146 of the California Vehicle Act (St. 1923, p. 517) as charged in an information filed by the district attorney of Los Angeles county, but were acquitted of the charge of grand theft, also therein contained. There were two others charged in the same information, who were both found not guilty of the charge of grand theft, but one of whom (Joe Young) pleaded guilty and the other (Villarreal) was found guilty of violating section 146 of the Vehicle Act.

The first contention of appellants is that it was prejudicial error for the court to admit testimony as to certain things which occurred after the car had been abandoned by all of the defendants, particularly objecting to the testimony of a police officer. However, this evidence came out only by way of rebuttal to the testimony of the appealing defendants that they went directly to their home and that neither of them accompanied the others to the place where the machine was finally abandoned, or where the other defendants got into an altercation with parties not connected with the suit.

As to the second objection, that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict as to appellants, an examination of the entire transcript discloses there was sufficient circumstantial, if not direct, evidence to show that the defendants were guilty of violating at least that part of section 146 of the Vehicle Act as follows:

"Any person who assists in, or is a party or accessory to or an accomplice in, any such stealing or unauthorized taking or driving, shall also be deemed guilty of a felony."

The judgments against the defendants Gilbert Parra and Frank Olazabel, respectively, are hereby affirmed.

SAN BERNARDINO NAT. BANK et al. v. JONES et al. (Civ. 3583.) ★

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 16, 1928.

Hearing Granted by Supreme Court Dec. 13, 1928.

1. Waters and water courses ⚡154(1)—Purchasers, observing underground pipe which ran from spring to house on property, were not put on inquiry as to another's easement in water.

Purchasers of patented land, taking it with knowledge of underground water pipe from spring extending into house on property were not put on inquiry as to easement in use of water through pipe line, acquired by third party from purchasers' predecessors in title.

2. Easements ⚡22—Purchaser is bound to take notice only of what reasonably careful inspection would disclose, relative to easements.

Purchaser of land is bound to take notice only of what a reasonably careful inspection would disclose, as regards question of constructive notice of easement.

3. Waters and water courses ⚡154(1)—Recorded conveyance of water from tunnel, which examination of record title of lots purchased would not disclose, held not constructive notice to purchasers.

Recorded conveyance of right to use water developed in tunnel "in block 4, section 18," from defendant's predecessors to predecessors of plaintiff, held not to constitute constructive notice of existence of easement to defendants purchasing lots, since examination of record title of lots would not have disclosed conveyance.

4. Waters and water courses ⚡158½(1)—Conveyance from defendants' predecessors of water developed in land purchased by defendants held inadmissible to prove plaintiffs' easement, where defendants had no actual or constructive notice thereof.

In action to establish right to use of water from spring on defendants' land, under conveyance from defendants' predecessors in title, conveyance giving right to use of water developed in tunnel in block was inadmissible to prove plaintiffs' easement, where it was not shown that defendants had actual knowledge of conveyance, or of its recordation; and where conveyance was not constructive notice as to the particular lots purchased by defendants.

5. Waters and water courses ⇨154(1)—Purchaser is chargeable with constructive notice of contents of patent reserving vested water rights.

Purchaser of property is charged with constructive notice of contents of patent reserving vested water rights and rights to ditches and reservoirs.

6. Waters and water courses ⇨154(1)—General reservation in patents of vested water rights therein does not give notice that water right has in fact vested.

Reservation in patent to government land of vested water rights and rights to ditches and reservoirs, where inserted in all patents, does not give notice that any water right has in fact vested or accrued.

7. Easements ⇨22—Grantee under conveyance takes subject only to vested rights of which he has actual or constructive notice.

Grantee under conveyance from government or private individual takes property subject to vested rights of others of which he has actual or constructive notice, but takes free of secret easements of which he has no notice, either actual or constructive.

8. Vendor and purchaser ⇨229(1)—Purchaser put on inquiry is chargeable with "constructive notice," if inquiry becomes duty which, if followed, would lead to knowledge of true situation (Civ. Code, § 19).

Whatever puts purchaser on inquiry as to a particular fact amounts to "constructive notice," provided the inquiry becomes a duty, and, if followed, would lead to knowledge of facts by ordinary diligence, under Civ. Code, § 19.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, Constructive Notice.]

9. Easements ⇨22—Purchaser of patented land need not make neighborhood search for secret easements, of which no suspicion arises from reasonably careful inspection of land (Civ. Code, § 19).

Purchaser of patented land is not required to make neighborhood search for secret easements in exercise of due diligence under Civ. Code, § 19, where reasonably careful inspection of land discloses nothing to create suspicion that such an easement exists.

10. Waters and water courses ⇨154(1)—Evidence held not to support finding that defendant purchasing land was chargeable with notice of plaintiffs' right to water from spring under conveyance from defendants' predecessors (Civ. Code, § 19).

In action to establish right to take water from spring on defendants' land, evidence held not to support finding that defendant purchasing land with knowledge of small flow of water apparently conducted to house on premises for domestic use, was chargeable with notice of facts putting him on inquiry as to existence of plaintiffs' rights under conveyance from defendants' predecessors in title, under Civ. Code, § 19.

11. Waters and water courses ⇨154(1)—Right to water from spring on another's property and right of way for pipe line constitute "easements" (Civ. Code, § 801).

Right to use water from spring on another's land, and right of way for pipe line to convey the water, constitute "easements," under Civ. Code, § 801.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First, Second and Third Series, Easement.]

12. Easements ⇨21—Grantor of easement, who conveys servient tenement unconditionally for value, passes title free from easement, where purchaser takes without notice (Civ. Code, § 19).

If grantor of easement for valuable consideration unconditionally conveys servient tenement to another who takes without notice and without knowledge of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry under Civ. Code, § 19, purchaser will take land free from burden of easement.

13. Easements ⇨21—One acquiring easement from government has no greater right than grantee from private owner, where servient estate is acquired by innocent purchaser without notice.

One holding easement under grant from government is in no better position than grantee of private owner, where innocent purchaser for value acquires servient estate without actual or constructive notice of easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; G. R. Freeman, Judge.

Action by the San Bernardino National Bank and others against W. J. Jones and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Jones, Hoyt & Rifkind, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. Respondents have filed a petition for a rehearing and have reargued some of the questions discussed in the briefs upon which the appeal was originally submitted. In order the more fully to discuss such questions, it is ordered that the opinion filed herein October 17, 1928, be set aside, the judgment of this court made at that time reversing the judgment of the trial court to stand, and that the following opinion be substituted for the one stricken out: The trial court found that the plaintiffs are the owners of the north half of section 19, township 2 south, range 1 west, San Bernardino base and meridian; that the defendants are the owners of lot 8 and a part of lot 9 in section 18, bounded on the south by the plaintiffs' land; that "while said lots 8 and 9 were still government land * * * plaintiffs' predecessors entered in and upon said lot 9 and constructed a tunnel at a spring thereon, and thereby developed water in said tunnel, and conveyed said water" through a pipe line "from said spring and tunnel to and across said lots 9 and 8 * * * to the said lands of plaintiffs"; that "ever since the construction thereof, except when interfered with by the defendants, the said plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest have maintained said tunnel and pipe line and have taken and diverted and used" on plaintiffs' land "the water flowing therefrom"; that the predecessors in interest of the defendants had notice and knowledge of such diversion and use; that the "defendants acquired said property (lots 8 and 9) on or about the 17th day of October, 1923, with notice and knowledge of facts and circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry as to the existence of the rights, claims and ownerships of said plaintiffs in and to the tunnel situated in said portion of said lot 9 and the water flowing therein and the pipe line leading therefrom and of said right of way, and that by prosecuting such inquiry said defendants would have learned of the existence thereof." On these findings and others which need not be stated, judgment was entered quieting plaintiffs' title to the tunnel and pipe line and the use of the water flowing from the tunnel and enjoining interference therewith by the defendants. The defendants have appealed from the judgment.

[1,2] The spring and the tunnel referred to in the findings are on the defendants' land. It appears from the evidence that the flow of water therefrom is very small. A concrete bulkhead was constructed in the mouth of the tunnel, by one of plaintiffs' predecessors, in 1906, causing the water to accumulate in a small reservoir, thereby providing "more water by storing it, for the house and for stock use." An underground pipe, at some places three-fourths of an inch in diameter and at other places an inch, extended from the reservoir in a general southwesterly direction about 300 feet to a house on lot 8 and thence in the same general direction approximately 1,500 feet to a house on the plaintiffs' land. This house was over 800 feet from the north line of plaintiffs' land. When the defendants examined lots 8 and 9 before purchasing the land, a water pipe extended into the house thereon, but it was "stopped up" and the "sink and faucet had been taken away." The water from the tunnel was flowing over the bulkhead and going to waste. No pipes were visible, except at the house on lot 8, and there was no evidence on the property to indicate that the water had ever been taken to other lands than lots 8 and 9. About the time the purchase was completed the defendants' grantor, who was in possession, caused a faucet to be placed in the pipe at the house and water from the reservoir to flow through the same. The defendants had paid the full purchase price of the property, $1,600, and had been in possession for some time before they first learned that the water had ever been taken to any lands other than lots 8 and 9. Prior to that time they were without notice or knowledge of any facts to put them on inquiry. The fact that water was conveyed from the tunnel to the house on lot 8 was not sufficient to put them on inquiry to ascertain whether the water was carried to the lands of others, but the natural inference from the situation as they found it was that the tunnel was designed for supplying water to the house upon the land they were purchasing. A purchaser of land is bound to take notice only of what a reasonably careful inspection would disclose. Pollard v. Rehman, 162 Cal. 633, 635, 124 P. 235; Duvall v. Ridout, 124 Md. 193, 92 A. 209, L. R. A. 1915C, 347; Rollo v. Nelson, 34 Utah, 116, 96 P. 263, 26 L. R. A. (N. S.) 326; 41 A. L. R. 1445.

O. A. Turner, who acquired the Jones land July 30, 1922, testified:

"I went over the property to see whether or not I would accept it on a deal I had. * * * I went up to the tunnel and found that the water was flowing over the walls of the tunnel, I looked around the house and found a water pipe visible along the side of the house and around the corner and up to the end of the house, and I went in the house and I found that the faucet had been taken off and a block put in the place of it. * * * There were two separate orchards. I went over both orchards lengthwise and crosswise."

The witness further testified that there was nothing to indicate that "any water from that spring or tunnel was being used any place other than on the Jones land at that time." June 14, 1923, he sold the land to John Turner. The latter testified:

"I went up and examined the property with a view to improving it. That was about the 24th of June, 1923. * * * I went all over it and examined it very carefully. I examined the water conditions, and the trees on the place, with the object of improving the place. * * * The water was running over the dam and going to waste, going down on the orchard and on the place. * * * The pipe at the house was stopped up there. * * * There was a pipe at the house. * * * It came out of the ground near the house and laid on top of the ground and up in the house, and a sink and faucet had been taken away. * * * In September, 1923, I stayed there and lived there about two weeks and worked on the place. * * * I cleared up the old brush and weeds, * * * (over) all the cultivated part, about 10 acres."

The witness also testified that he found no pipe running south from the Jones house and that he had no "knowledge of any claim to that water right by any one else." John Turner sold the land to the defendants September 29, 1928. Mrs. Jones testified, relative to her examination of the property prior to its purchase by herself and husband, as follows:

"We walked up to the tunnel. * * * The water was running * * * over this dam in the tunnel, a little bit; and that was all you could see. * * * You could not see any pipe at all, only the one that came in the house and went in through the side of the house. * * * We walked around over the orchard. I don't think I went over in the far orchard, but I walked around some in the one where the house is. * * * It is on our ground, between the stone house (the house on plaintiffs' land) and our house. * * *

"Q. Did you see any ditches, pipes or other conveyances of any kind? A. I did not see anything. * * * There was no pipes; there was only the one that ran around the house and up to the house. * * *

"Q. Did you make any investigation to see where the water went? A. No, sir; because the tunnel was flowing right over and I didn't think about it going anywhere else."

The witness further testified that she "never heard anything about" any claim of right to use the water elsewhere than on the Jones land until several months after payment had been made in full for the land. Mr. Jones testified that before making the purchase he walked over the land on two different occasions and examined it carefully; that "that little pipe that run in the house was the only pipe I seen"; that water "was running over the top of the bulkhead"; that he walked "all over the lower land, * * * over both orchards," one orchard being between the Jones house and that of the plaintiffs; that the land below the Jones house "is level ground, only it is a little rolling"; that he did not see "any pipe line, flume, or ditch or trough"; that, when the last payment was made on the purchase price, he did not "know that the plaintiff or any one else ever had used or claimed a right to use any of the water on any land other than that "he had purchased." The water was not running through the pipe to the plaintiffs' place during the period of time mentioned by these witnesses.

[3, 4] Plaintiffs introduced in evidence, over the defendants' objection, a written conveyance of the right to the use of the water developed in a tunnel in "block 4, section 18," from defendants' predecessors to the predecessors of the plaintiffs, dated December 15, 1904, and duly recorded. The parties to that conveyance may have intended to describe the tunnel here in question, but no attempt was made to show that the defendants had any notice or knowledge thereof. An examination of the record title of lots 8 and 9 would not give any information as to the conveyance in question, and its recordation was not constructive notice to the defendants. Davis v. Ward, 109 Cal. 186, 189, 41 P. 1010, 50 Am. St. Rep. 29; Treadwell v. Inslee, 120 N. Y. 458, 24 N. E. 651. In answer to the defendants' objection that "the conveyance of water rights on lot 4 would not in any way give notice of water rights on lot 9," the trial court said: "I think it goes to the weight of the evidence simply." Without proof that the defendants had knowledge of the conveyance or of its recordation, the conveyance did not in any manner tend to show that they had notice of the plaintiffs' claim to the use of the water, and the conveyance was not admissible for that purpose.

[5-7] Patents containing the usual reservations of "any vested or accrued water rights * * * and rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights" were issued to the defendants' predecessors in title and duly recorded. Of course, the defendants were charged with constructive notice of the contents of these patents. Since this reservation is general, and is inserted in all patents, regardless of whether any water rights have vested or accrued, it certainly cannot be construed as notice in any particular case that such a water right has in fact vested or accrued. A grantee, whether the conveyance be made by the government or a private individual, always takes the property conveyed subject to all accrued or vested rights of others of which he has actual or constructive notice, whether the conveyance expressly reserves such rights or not. Witherill v. Brehm, 74 Cal. App. 286, 296, 240 P. 529. It would be a departure from the principles of equity to hold that the grantee of one who has acquired title to land from the government takes it subject to secret easements of which he has neither actual nor constructive notice.

[8, 9] The purpose of the recording acts is that a purchaser of land "may rely on the record title to the property, in the absence of actual knowledge of the title in fact, or of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry in respect thereto." 23 R. C. L. 197. "Every person who has actual notice of circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man upon inquiry as to a particular fact, has constructive notice of the fact itself in all cases in which, by prosecuting such inquiry, he might have learned such fact." Civ. Code, § 19. "Whatever puts a party on inquiry amounts in judgment of law to constructive notice, provided the inquiry becomes a duty, and if followed would lead to the knowledge of the requisite facts by ordinary diligence and understanding." Prouty v. Devin, 118 Cal. 258, 260, 50 P. 380, 381. Ordinary diligence certainly does not require a purchaser of patented land to make a neighborhood search for secret easements in the land where a reasonably careful inspection of the land discloses nothing to create even a suspicion that such an easement exists.

[10] There is no evidence in the record tending to support the finding of the trial court that the defendants had "notice and knowledge of facts and circumstances sufficient to put a prudent man on inquiry as to the existence of the rights" claimed by the plaintiffs. The uncontradicted evidence shows that there was nothing visible or apparent on the Jones land to put the defendants on inquiry. The testimony of the defendants and two of their predecessors in title is to the effect that they knew of no such claim prior to acquiring title. Granting that the burden of proof was on the defendants to show want of notice, and that it is within the province of the trial court to determine the credibility of witnesses, nevertheless, in a case such as this, where the undisputed physical facts lead to the natural conclusion that the small flow of water was conducted only to the house on the premises for domestic use, and there is no evidence whatever tending to show that the defendants were otherwise put on inquiry, the finding that they had knowledge of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry cannot be upheld.

[11, 12] Plaintiffs' right to the use of the water in question and the right of way for their pipe line constitute easements. Civ. Code, § 801; Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co, 56 Cal. 11, 13; Smith v. Hawkins, 110 Cal. 122, 125, 42 P. 453; Henrici v. South Feather Land etc., Co., 177 Cal. 442, 446, 170 P. 1135; Witherill v. Brehm, supra. If the owner of an easement "fails to have the conveyance for such easement legally recorded, it remains good, nevertheless, against the grantor of the easement. But if the grantor of the easement, in such case, for a valuable consideration, afterwards unconditionally conveys the servient tenement to another, who takes without notice, * * * and with no knowledge of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry concerning it, he will take the land free from the burden of the easement." Pollard v. Rebman, supra; Mesmer v. Uharriet, 174 Cal. 110, 116, 162 P. 104; Powers v. Perry, 12 Cal. App. 77, 82, 106 P. 595. In the case last cited, the facts in many respects were similar to those of this case, and it was there held that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding that the purchasers of the land on which the spring was located had knowledge of facts sufficient to put them on inquiry. Among other cases holding that, under similar circumstances, an innocent purchaser for value takes title free from secret easements are the following: Blake v. Boye, 38 Colo. 55, 88 P. 470, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 814; Jobling v. Tuttle, 75 Kan. 351, 89 P. 699, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 960; Butterworth v. Crawford, 46 N. Y. 349, 7 Am. Rep. 352; Treadwell v. Inslee, supra; Shevchuk v. Kotchik, 96 Or. 181, 189 P. 399; Scott v. Beutel, 23 Grat. (Va.) 1; Miller v. Skaggs, 79 W. Va. 645, 91 S. E. 536, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 929.

Respondents rely on the case of Cave v. Tyler, 147 Cal. 454, 82 P. 64, as establishing the doctrine that, where appropriation of water has been made on government land by one person and the land is later acquired by another, all subsequent purchasers of the land take title "subject to the existing appropriations, whether they had notice or not." No such doctrine is either stated or discussed in that case, but the court said:

"The sole question to be determined by the court below was whether or not the present right of the plaintiffs had accrued and vested prior to March 3, 1871, and then included all the water to the extent of twenty-five hundred inches."

It may be stated further that the appropriation and diversion of water in that case was not hidden or secret, but was made openly in the usual manner and could have been ascertained readily by following the course of the stream. In Le Quime v. Chambers, 15 Idaho, 405, 98 P. 415, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 76, also relied on by respondents, it appears that the plaintiffs developed the water of a spring on government land to the extent of "about one-fourth of a cubic foot per second," and thereafter continuously conveyed the water through a pipe line to his own land, where it was used for domestic purposes and irrigation. Thereafter the defendant acquired title to the land from the government. The question there presented was whether in fact the land on which the spring is located was a part of the public domain at the time of the appropriation, not whether the defendant had notice of the appropriation. The fact that all the water of the spring, amounting to one-fourth of a second foot, was continuously diverted through the pipe, was clearly sufficient to put on inquiry any one who made even the most superficial examination of the land.

[13] The plaintiffs and their predecessors held the easement in question under a grant from the government. No reason appears for holding that they are in any better position than a grantee of a private owner would be, where an innocent purchaser for value acquires the servient estate without notice, actual or constructive, of the easement.

The judgment is reversed.

LINCOLN v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 6158.)

District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Nov. 19, 1928.

1. Attorney and client ☞56, 57—Judgment suspending attorney is self-executing, and is not suspended or superseded by appeal.

A judgment suspending an attorney from practicing for stated period is self-executing, and an appeal therefrom does not have effect of suspending or superseding such judgment.

2. Judgment ☞650—Generally, judgment, to be admissible to prove facts therein recited, must be final (Code Civ. Proc. § 1049).

Generally, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1049, judgment, in order to be admissible in evidence for purpose of proving facts therein recited, must be final judgment in cause, and, if action in which judgment is rendered is still pending, judgment is not final.

3. Attorney and client ☞53(1) — Judgment suspending attorney from practice held admissible in subsequent proceedings charging attorney with practicing during suspension period, though appeal from judgment was undetermined.

Judgment suspending attorney from practice for stated period being self-executing and not suspended or superseded by appeal, in subsequent proceedings against attorney charging that he engaged in practice of law during period of suspension, judgment roll of judgment of suspension was admissible in evidence, notwithstanding appeal from such judgment was undetermined.

4. Mandamus ☞4(1) — Mere errors do not warrant issuance of writ of mandate.

Mere errors are not sufficient to warrant issuance of writ of mandate.

5. Attorney and client ☞57 — Proceedings against attorney for violating judgment of suspension held properly continued until determination of appeal from such judgment.

In proceedings against attorney for engaging in practice during period for which he had been suspended by prior judgment of suspension, court did not err in continuing cause until there should be determination of attorney's appeal from judgment of suspension.

Application by Walter Gould Lincoln for writ of mandate to be directed to Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Carl A. Stutsman, Judge, to compel entry of a judgment. Writ denied.

Walter Gould Lincoln, of Los Angeles, in pro. per.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., and R. H. Purdue, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMPSON, J. On December 8, 1924, a judgment was rendered in the respondent court adjudging that the petitioner herein "be suspended and precluded from practicing as an attorney at law or as an attorney or agent of another, in and before all courts, * * * in the State of California, * * * and from practicing as an attorney or counsellor at law in any manner * * * for the period of one year from and after December 24, 1924." An appeal was taken from this judgment and still remains undetermined. On July 13, 1927, another accusation was filed by the Los Angeles Bar Association against the petitioner, consisting of three causes of action, the first and second counts of which charged that the accused engaged in the practice of law during the period of suspension, and the third count charged the embezzlement of funds belonging to a client of petitioner. This cause went to trial before the respondent judge on June 27, 1928, and after evidence was offered in support of and in opposition to the accusation, and only after the cause was reopened for the express purpose, the bar association offered in evidence the judgment rendered on December 8, 1924. An objection was interposed by the accused and sustained by the court, whereupon the court, after the suggestion had been made that the case be continued, stated:

"I may say, as I have said before, that I cannot find anything in the evidence offered by the Bar Association to support the third accusation, which involves in my opinion, acts of moral turpitude. I do think the allegations of the first and second counts of the accusation have been sustained. The amount and the extent of the judgment of the court should be left, I think, until the decision of the appellate court; because if the appellate court finds that the decision should be reversed, then manifestly any decision rendered now would be unjust to the accused. On the other hand, if the decision be affirmed, I see no reason at all why the defendant should not be all the more punished, having in mind the recent decision of the court.

"The matter may be continued as counsel may suggest, with the opportunity to the accused, if the judgment of the appellate court be adverse, to present such character witnesses as he may desire for the purpose of diminution of the judgment of the court."

And in response to a query of the petitioner whether he understood correctly that judgment was to be in his favor on the third count, the court further stated:

"And in favor of the Bar Association on the first two. But I am not prepared at this time to sign any such judgment, and I do not think the record should show that a judgment is ordered, because manifestly that would be unsupported by the proof. The view I take of the offer of counsel for the Bar Association, of this judgment roll, is such, that the judgment would be without any support in the evidence, and manifestly would be reversible."

The continuance was then ordered.

We have quoted at some length from the record in order to make clear that there is no room for the difference of opinion between counsel concerning the action of the court. It is made manifest from the statements just taken therefrom that the respondent judge, being impressed with the conviction that the judgment roll was inadmissible, ordered the entire cause continued until after the determination of the appeal, indicating to counsel that, when the judgment had become final and admissible in evidence, the judgment would then be in favor of the accused on the third count and adverse to him on the first and second counts.

The petitioner seeks the writ of mandate from this court compelling the respondent court to enter judgment without waiting for a determination of the appeal. His argument in this behalf is that no cause of action existed at the time the charges were filed, and, further, that the case was completely tried and the prosecution rested without having proved a cause of action. The respondent, on the other hand, asserts that the court was well within its rights in continuing the cause until the judgment roll should become admissible. This argument is grounded upon authorities which hold that judgments suspending or disbarring an attorney are self-executing, and hence the cause of action had accrued at the time the charges were filed, although the evidence was inadmissible.

[1] We are first then to inquire concerning the character of the judgment and the effect of the appeal therefrom upon it. The first authority in California involving a judgment of suspension is that of Tyler v. Presley, 72 Cal. 290, 13 P. 856, in which case the petitioner sought from our Supreme Court the writ of mandate compelling the superior court to allow him to practice in the last-named court, for the reason that the Chief Justice had allowed a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States and citation had been issued and served and bond filed, and hence the order of suspension was superseded. The court said:

"When the judgment is rendered, and, no process is required to be issued for its enforcement, no supersedeas is allowed. In fact, there is no necessity for such a writ. There is nothing to stay or supersede. * * *

"The order disbarring Tyler needs no process to execute it, and it stands unaffected by the writ of error."

And again the court says:

"The judgment or order stands as it was rendered, and the effect is to suspend the applicant for the writ in this case from the practice of his profession."

Another judgment of suspension was considered in the case of In re Graves, 62 Cal. App. 168, 216 P. 386, upon an application for the writ of supersedeas, in which it was re-announced that the judgment was self-executing—operating "directly against petitioner without the necessity for process or proceedings of any kind for its enforcement." To the same effect, see Walls v. Palmer, 64 Ind. 493, and for judgments of similar nature. Dulin v. Pacific W. & O. Co., 98 Cal. 304, 33 P. 123; Rogers v. Superior Court, 126 Cal. 183, 58 P. 452; Clute v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 15, 99 P. 362, 132 Am. St. Rep. 54; Hellman Com. Tr. & Sav. Bank v. Alden (Cal. App.) 268 P. 688. It is obvious from these authorities that the appeal did not have the effect of suspending or superseding the judgment of suspension, but that, regardless of the outcome of the appeal itself, the petitioner here was by the self-executing character of that judgment suspended for one year from and after December 24, 1924. His status for that period of time was as effectually determined as though there had been no appeal.

[2-4] We are therefore next to consider whether the judgment was admissible in evidence for any purpose. The general rule is not in doubt. It is that:

"A judgment, in order to be admissible in evidence for the purpose of proving facts therein recited, must be a final judgment in the cause, and if the action in which the judgment is rendered is still pending, necessarily the judgment is not final." (Italics ours.) In re Blythe's Estate, 99 Cal. 472, 34 P. 108; Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 66 P. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290, and authorities there collected.

It should be noted, however, that the reason for the rule is found in section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure which says that:

"An action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied."

It is to be observed, as it was in the concurring opinion of Justices Harrison and Patterson in the case of Naftzger v. Gregg, 99 Cal. 83, 33 P. 757, 37 Am. St. Rep. 23, that this section does not purport to prescribe a rule of evidence, but determines the condition of the action after judgment has been rendered. It is also said in this opinion:

"There are many cases in which a judgment is admissible in evidence at any time after its entry."

We also direct attention at this time to the closing words of the section, "unless the judgment is sooner satisfied." It is apparent from what we have already said concerning the self-executing character of the judgment involved, that the suspension terminated at the end of one year from December 24, 1924, and, of course, was thereby satisfied. It becomes of more or less importance to note this instance in our effort to determine whether there are exceptions to the general rule already announced. Without stopping to analyze in detail the case of Cook v. Rice, 91 Cal. 664, 27 P. 1081, where a judgment declaring that the plaintiff was not entitled to possession of certain lands was received in evidence before it became final, we quote from the opinion upholding its allowance as follows:

"It was not necessary that it should be final, in the sense that it was not liable to be reversed on appeal. It was enough that the judgment was in force, not suspended by an appeal or otherwise, and that while in force, it finally disposed of the controversy."

In California Bank v. Graves, 129 Cal. 649, 62 P. 259, there was an application for a writ of assistance, following a judgment of foreclosure and sale thereunder, although there was an appeal from the judgment. The Supreme Court held that the judgment roll was properly admitted for the reason that, upon appellant's failure to file a supersedeas bond, the execution of the judgment was not stayed, and gave as its authority Montgomery v. Tutt, 11 Cal. 190. While holding that an action, the foundation of which was an order settling the account of a guardian, was premature because the order had not become final when the action was commenced, in the case of Cook v. Ceas, 143 Cal. 221, 77 P. 65, the court took occasion (in commenting upon authorities to the general rule) to use this language:

"The effect of these numerous decisions is not in the least impaired by the fact that in some cases, and for some purposes, an appealable judgment may be offered in evidence. It may, of course, be offered in evidence whenever the mere fact that it has been entered is material; as, for instance, in support of a plea in abatement, or to show the regularity of an execution."

From the discussion so far, it appears that exceptions to the general rule have always been recognized in California, and we now consider two cases which bear more closely upon the one at bar. In both of the authorities, Jenner v. Murphy, 6 Cal. App. 434, 92 P. 405, and Sewell v. Price, 164 Cal. 265, 128 P. 407, the status of the plaintiff as a judgment creditor was of supreme importance, because each case was one to set aside a conveyance alleged to be fraudulent, and in both instances the status could only be shown by judgments which had not become final. In the first case (Jenner v. Murphy, supra) an appeal was pending, and yet the court held:

"It is true, that pending an appeal, the judgment was not final, but it was nevertheless a judgment. It was entered as the code provides it should be. It entitled the plaintiff to a writ of execution. It was admissible in evidence for the purposes of this case."

The other case (Sewell v. Price, supra) follows the rule. It may be asked why, if the judgments were there admissible for the purpose of establishing the status of plaintiffs as creditors, it is not admissible here to determine the status of petitioner as suspended from the privilege of practicing. As we have already observed, the judgment operated directly upon petitioner, and he was in fact and in law suspended regardless of the subsequent determination of his appeal. Nor can it be argued that this works an injustice upon petitioner, for the reason that he is not only presumed to know the law as announced in Tyler v. Presley and in Re Graves, supra, but also it was his duty to obey the mandate of the judgment of the superior court until it was set aside or reversed on appeal. It is evident therefore that the respondent court was in error in holding that the judgment roll was not to be received for the limited purpose indicated. Mere errors are not, however, sufficient to warrant the issuance of the writ of mandate. 16 Cal. Jur. p. 822.

[5] Proceeding upon the assumption that the judgment was inadmissible the respondent court continued the cause until there should be a determination of the appeal. Except for the fundamental error noted, there was nothing improper in this procedure. It is said in Smith v. Smith, 134 Cal. 117, 66 P. 81, in discussing a somewhat similar situation:

"A much better mode to secure the benefit of the evidence, and to avoid a conclusion which may prove unjust, is to move for a continuance, as suggested in Rose v. Superior Court, 65 Cal. 570 [4 P. 577], and Brown v. Campbell, 100 Cal. 635 [35 P. 433, 38 Am. St. Rep. 314]."

In the instant case the court adopted the procedure suggested in these opinions, and by the force of their voice the petitioner is concluded.

Writ denied.

tion of respondent, in his favor, against the sureties for such amount." The defendant's appeal was dismissed, judgment was, more than three months thereafter, entered against the sureties, from which they appealed, and the respondent now moves to dismiss the latter appeal.

It is contended by appellants that the original judgment was declared void by the Supreme Court, and that hence the surety bond was without consideration and void; that the judgment from which the instant appeal was taken was not alone void because it was taken ex parte, but also for the reason that the main judgment was invalid.

[1, 2] That section 942 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires provision in such an undertaking for entry of judgment against the sureties upon motion, and that the motion may be made ex parte, is too well settled to require further discussion. Gray v. Cotton, 174 Cal. 256, 162 P. 1019; Duerr v. Sloan, 50 Cal. App. 512, 195 P. 475. That, under the circumstances here presented, sureties have no right of appeal for the reason that the judgment entered against them is in effect a consent judgment, is equally well settled. Judnick v. Judnick, 47 Cal. App. 380, 190 P. 480; Duerr v. Sloan, supra.

Since no appeal from such a judgment may be taken, an appellate tribunal is without jurisdiction to consider its merits.

Ford, Johnson & Bourquin, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing is denied.

In his brief the plaintiff did not specify any act of defendant claimed to be negligence. In his petition for a rehearing plaintiff asserts that the defendant violated the provisions of subdivision 2 of section 113 of the Motor Vehicle Act (1 Deering's Gen. Laws 1923, p. 1886), and that defendant failed to use ordinary care. Rush v. Lagomarsino, 196 Cal. 308, 237 P. 1066. The statute relied on refers to places "when the driver's view is obstructed." In this case there is no evidence that the driver's view was obstructed. The statute relied on limits speed to 15 miles "in traversing" an intersection. To traverse means "to pass across, pass over, cross in traveling." Cent. Dict. As defendant traversed the intersection the record wholly fails to show that he did so at a speed of 15 miles or more.

In his petition the plaintiff states that the driver of the truck "admits that when he entered the intersection of the two streets he was traveling at a speed in excess of that allowed by law, and he admits that he saw and realized then that a collision was inevitable if he did not stop, and admits that at the speed he was traveling he could have brought his truck to a stop in time to avoid the accident—very quickly—within 20 feet. * * * " The claim is stated strongly. The vice rests in this: That the record does not sustain the claim. The driver testified that when traveling 17 to 18 miles he could stop in 20 feet (Tr. 103); that he was so traveling when he was at the intersection (Tr. 150); that he there reduced his speed (Tr. 150); that when he saw the Ford swing into his path the witness blew his siren, put on both brakes, and swung to his right (Tr. 206-233); that when he so swung the witness was at the point marked H-14 (Tr. 232); that is a point 15 feet inside of the intersection and about 30 feet from the point of impact; that when the witness swung to his right was when he discovered that a collision was imminent (Tr. 206); at that same instant, so the testimony of that witness runs, the truck was moving 13 miles per hour or less (Tr. 234); or, as the testimony of the driver of the Ford runs, the truck was then traveling about 10 or 15 miles per hour (Tr. 21).

The record discloses no act of negligence on the part of the defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Charles R. Barnard, Judge.

Action by Edna E. Giffin against the Supreme Lodge of the Fraternal Brotherhood. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Michael F. Shannon and Thomas A. Wood, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

B. M. Benson and Cecil E. Edgar, both of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. [1] The plaintiff sued the defendant to recover a judgment for monies alleged to be due under a benefit certificate alleged to have been issued by the defendant. The latter appeared and answered. Later a stipulation of facts was executed. A trial was had thereon before the court sitting without a jury. The court caused a judgment to be entered which was in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed and brought up what purports to be the judgment roll, including a purported copy of the stipulation. The defendant filed its brief June 7, 1928, and therein it presented many facts not shown by the stipulation. On June 27, 1928, the respondent filed her brief and therein made one point—the defendant had failed to follow the method prescribed by sections 953a, 953b, 953c, of the Code of Civil Procedure. She also made a motion to affirm the judgment. The presentation of the appeal and of the motion came on for hearing August 2, 1928. At the same time the defendant suggested a diminution of the record. The motion and suggestion were heard. The suggestion of the diminution of the record was accepted, and the clerk of the trial court was directed to certify the absent documents. The motion to affirm was denied. Permission was granted to file additional briefs. Thereafter, August 13, 1928, the clerk of the trial court sent to the clerk of this court four documents marked "Exhibit A," "Exhibit B," "Exhibit C," and "Exhibit D." No one is certified in any manner, nor does any certificate accompany the lot. On August 16, 1928, the respondent filed another brief in which she again attacked the record as not conforming to the law and in which for the first time she replied to the points made by the defendant. On September 4, 1928, the appellant filed another brief in which it contented itself with the assertion:

"The stipulation of fact having been adopted by the trial court as its findings of fact, it thereby became a part of the judgment roll and was properly before the court in the clerk's transcript."

True, but the assertion does not aid the defendant. The clerk's transcript contains what purports to be the stipulation of facts. But that stipulation refers to four several documents as being attached to it, whereas nothing is attached to the copy of it which is inserted in the transcript, and there is nothing before us showing that any document was attached to the original stipulation, or, if it was, what it was. In his certificate to the transcript, the clerk certifies that the transcript contains "a full, true, and correct copy of the original: * * * Stipulation of facts * * * and of the whole of such originals. * * * Now, the exhibits above referred to are not certified, are not authenticated by any affidavit, and they do not break down the force of the clerk's certificate just quoted. He sends us exhibits which are numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4—the numbers are scratched, and they are re-marked A, B, C, and D. But none is certified. Every presumption is in favor of the judgment as rendered. The record before us does not tend to break down that presumption.

However, the judgment must be affirmed if we go into all of the documents, whether they are regularly before us or otherwise. Briefly stated, the facts are as follows: John W. Giffin held a benefit certificate in the Fraternal Brotherhood. The certificate recited, among other things, that its provisions did not apply "unless said member is in good standing * * * at the time of the death of said member." For the month of December, 1926, Giffin became delinquent in his dues. On January 25, 1927, he paid his dues down to the last day of February, 1927. On February 4, 1927, the insured died. It is now claimed that after being delinquent in December that Giffin was never reinstated. The answer is, the record does not show the fact. In the stipulation of facts it is recited that the dues and assessments were paid. In the stipulation there is no statement whether Giffin was reinstated or was not reinstated. Assuming, as appellant contends, that the proofs of loss, Exhibit C, were attached to the stipulation of facts, it became some evidence. It included the affidavit of the treasurer. Among other things that affiant averred:

"3. That at the date of the said late member first being ill, of the disease, or suffering the injury from which he died, he was a member in good standing in Victory Lodge No. 1073 of The Fraternal Brotherhood and that he continued in good standing until the date of death on the 4th day of February, 1927."

[2] When a suspended member is fully reinstated, the by-laws provide that such fact will be certified to the treasurer of the local lodge. He is therefore a qualified witness as to who is a member in good standing. If any act or acts were necessary to reinstate the deceased as a member in good standing, we must assume from this record that the event had taken place. It follows that there was some evidence sustaining the implied finding that deceased was a member in good standing at the date of his death.

[3] The appellant's contention is that under the provisions of the by-laws a delinquent member is ipso facto suspended and so remains until he is reinstated. Turning to the by-laws, we find that a member who is delinquent for less than 60 days may tender his payments and the local treasurer may accept the same, but such payment will be received under an implied warranty that the member was at the date of the payment in good health; but, if it transpires that he was not, then such member's tentative reinstatement becomes inoperative from the date the supreme officers get notice of the fact that the member was not in good health on the date of the payment of the delinquent dues. Broadly construed, this latter provision may be construed as providing that a member who was delinquent on his second payment and while sick paid up such fines and dues in less than 60 days, and thereafter made all other payments for 25 years, will find he was during the whole of that time a suspended member. In other words, the member would have paid assessments and dues for 25 years, and the Brotherhood would have received and held the same, but the member would get nothing. One who would claim that a contract should be so construed must needs make clear proof. This defendant has not done so.

The judgment is affirmed.

The cause was regularly placed on the calendar for oral argument on November 1, 1928. No appearance was made for appellant at the time the case was called for hearing. Pursuant to the provisions of section 1253 of the Penal Code, the judgment and the order are affirmed.

95 Cal. App. 75

MARTIN v. McMAHAN et al. (Civ. No. 3085.)

District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Nov. 20, 1928.

1. Contracts $\S$ 229(3)—Where owners changed plans to increase cost of building, architect is entitled to compensation, notwithstanding provision limiting amount if cost exceeded certain figure.

Where architect's plans are changed by owners to increase cost of building after being drawn as contemplated by parties in first instance, architect is entitled to compensation, notwithstanding provision limiting compensation if cost exceeded certain amount.

2. Appeal and error $\S$ 1071(1)—Omnibus finding may be disregarded where other findings sustain judgment.

Omnibus finding may be disregarded where trial court had found all that was necessary to sustain judgment in other findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Eugene K. Martin against John McMahan and another, doing business under the firm name and style of McMahan Furniture Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellants.

Dorsey & Campbell, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

PLUMMER, J. The plaintiff had judgment in this action for the sum of $1,800, the amount found due from the defendants for and on account of architect's fees. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

The action is for services as an architect, performed by the plaintiff for the defendants, based upon the following writing, to wit:

"Service Order

"From McMahan Furniture Co.

"To Eugene K. Martin, Architect, Bakersfield, California.

"Your office is hereby authorized to render full professional services in connection with the construction and completion of a store and apartment building as per plans now in our files. This building not to exceed $60,000.00, your compensation will be $150.00 and no more if building cannot be built for this sum.

"Located at _____

"Plans to be property of McMahan Furniture Co.

"Payments will be made per schedule of the American Society of Architects.

"Signature:

"Owner, McMahan Furniture Co.

"Legal Representative, J. I. McMahan.

"City.

"Date 5/1/22."

After finding that the architect's fees should be calculated at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the cost of the building, the trial court found as follows:

"That plaintiff prepared the plans and specifications in accordance with said agreement; that the plans and specifications so prepared by plaintiff were accepted by said defendants and as so accepted called for the expenditure of less than Sixty Thousand Dollars ($60,000.00), to-wit: for Fifty-five Thousand Dollars ($55,000.00); that the building was erected by the defendants according to the plans and specifications so prepared by plaintiff, save and except that the apartments on the second floor as shown by the plans and specifications were omitted by the defendants in the erection of said building; that the plans and specifications prepared by the plaintiff were the only plans and specifications used by the defendants in the erection of said building; that the contract price for the erection of said building was Thirty-nine Thousand Dollars ($39,000.00); that plaintiff did not supervise the construction of said building; that the defendants have paid plaintiff on account the sum of One Hundred Fifty Dollars ($150.00) and no more; that by the terms of the contract plaintiff is entitled to receive as compensation for preparing plans and specifications five per cent. of Thirty-nine Thousand Dollars ($39,000.00) or Nineteen Hundred Fifty Dollars ($1950.00) no part of which has been paid, save and except the sum of One Hundred Fifty Dollars ($150.00); that there is now due, owing and unpaid from defendants to plaintiff the sum of Eighteen Hundred Dollars ($1800.00)."

The trial court also made an omnibus finding which is in the words and figures following:

"That all of the allegations of plaintiff's complaint not inconsistent with these findings are true and all the denials in defendants' answer not consistent with these findings are untrue."

The contention is made upon this appeal that under the contract the plaintiff was entitled only to the sum of $150, for the reason that after all the changes in the plans, made at the request of the owners, the lowest bid for the construction of the building was for the sum of $68,000. The record, however, shows the following, and amply supports the finding of the court: That when the plans were completed for the construction of the building as originally designed, a bid was received for the erection of the building at a cost of $55,000. The record shows that after this bid was received a number of changes were made at the request of the defendants, and bids again called for, and, as herein stated, the lowest bid for the erection of the building was $68,000. Following the receipt of this bid the defendants eliminated from the building a number of items relating to the upper stories thereof, and then, using the same plans, obtained the construction of the building for the sum of $39,000. Based upon this record, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to this compensation at the rate of 5 per cent. upon the cost of the building, that being the rate contemplated in the contract where it provides "that payment will be made per schedule of the American Society of Architects."

[1] While the law is well settled that where the agreement provides for a building not to cost more than a certain sum, the architect is not entitled to compensation under a contract such as was signed by the parties in this case, it also seems to be pretty well settled that if, after the plans are drawn as contemplated by the parties in the first instance, they are so changed by the owners as to increase the cost of the building, the architect is entitled to compensation. 5 C. J. p. 262; Benenato v. McDougall, 166 Cal. 405, 137 P. 8, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1202, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 871.

[2] The final objection of appellants is based upon the omnibus finding hereinbefore set forth, the contention being that it is impossible to ascertain what allegations in the plaintiff's complaint are inconsistent or consistent with the findings, and also, what denials in the answer filed by the defendants are, or are not consistent, with the findings. If this were the only finding made by the trial court, appellants' contention would be well founded. The trial court, however, having found all that was necessary to sustain the judgment, the omnibus finding may be disregarded. This is amply shown by the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Turner v. Turner, 187 Cal. 632, 203 P. 109, and the cases cited on page 635 of the same volume (203 P. 110).

Finding no merit whatever in the defendants' appeal, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.
